tion of it; and almost invariably, where one has been sent, they write for the other part of the work. They urge it as one of the most important works printed by Congress. I have never sent a book without receiving in return a direct acknowledgment, or being solicited for one by other persons who are cognizant of its receipt. I deem it one of the most important matters in the action of Congress, that these books shall be distributed throughout the whole country. The people are gratified with them. They find them greatly useful. Not a day occurs that I do not receive applications for them. I believe some three or four applications have been made to me to-day for Patent Office seeds and Patent Office reports.

If they are distributed here they will go without any incumbrance greater than would incidentally arise from such a quantity of books being sent; but I really look upon it as one of the most important measures that Congress can adopt in relation to their constituents. If gentlemen do not choose to dispose of their books in that way, and let them remain on hand with them, they are useless to their constituents; but if they are disposed to distribute them it can be done here; it is a very convenient matter. I should be very sorry to see a matter so important to agriculture and the improvement of the condition of the country generally, particularly the farming interest, smothered in this way. Gentlemen are not bound to distribute the books; but to those whose constituents are interested in obtaining the information that is communicated through this medium, it is very important; and I insist that the people of Texas are not so enlightened but that they will be greatly benefited by the aid of the agricultural portion at least of the Patent Office report. I should be sorry to see a branch of so much importance suppressed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. IVERSON, resulted—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Evans, Fitch, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Pugh, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Yulee—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, King, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

NAVAL RETIRING BOARD.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the consent of the Senate to take up the resolution I introduced some time since, for the purpose of setting it for some future day—making it the order of the day for Tuesday next. ["No!"]

Mr. GREEN. Do that to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the resolution to which the Senator refers?

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution in relation to the retiring board. I desire merely to make it the order of the day for Tuesday next, not to conflict with any business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the motion? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the joint resolution be made the special order for Tuesday next, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to consider the expediency of limiting the franking privilege of the executive and legislative departments on printed matter.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, when the hour arrived yesterday which was specially assigned for the consideration of executive matters, I was interrupted at that point at which I was about to express my opinions of what had been said by the Senator from South Carolina in relation to the character of the laboring classes at the North. I was remarking that the Senator from South Carolina had mistaken the character of our laboring men—I speak of those who are "hiring manual laborers," for that is his expression, in its modified form. I think the Senator has fallen into an error in his estimate of the character of our laborers. It may have arisen from a variety of causes. Our Government was indeed an experiment. It was established for the purpose of testing the capacity of man for self-government. Anterior to that period of time, during which Governments had existed which were called free, there had been none which had founded their institutions upon the principles upon which ours were proposed to be based. Under the freest governments that had ever existed, there were prerogatives and rights secured to power, and laws creating privileged classes; but it was the object and intention of the founders of our Government to do away with such a state of things, which had existed theretofore in every Government in the world. Ours was to be a Government resting on the consent of the governed. That was the object. We sought to take away the prerogatives which gathered around the governing power, and to establish a Government amongst us that should elevate man intellectually and politically to that sphere and to that position to which he was justly entitled.

When the Senator from South Carolina undertakes to draw imaginary distinctions between classes of laborers, he goes back to the old, the worn, the rotten, and the discarded systems of ages that have long since passed. I tell that Senator what is true, that we draw no imaginary distinctions between our different classes of laborers—none whatever. "Manual laborers!" Well, sir, who are the manual laborers of the North, that are degraded and placed beside the slave of the South by the Senator from South Carolina? Who are our manual laborers? Sir, all classes in our community are manual laborers; and, to a greater or less extent, they are hiring manual laborers. They constitute, I affirm, a majority of our community—those who labor for compensation. I do not know, I confess I cannot understand, that distinction which allows a man to make a contract for the service of his brains, but denies him the right to make a contract for the service of his hands. There is no distinction whatever between them. We draw none; we make none. Who are that class of citizens in our community who are its hirelings? That is the term. I do not know whether he designs it as opprobrious; but that is the term with which he designates our laborers of the North. This is modern Democracy!

Who are our "hiring manual laborers" of the North? Sir, I can tell that Senator that they are not the mud-sills of our community. They are the men who clear away our forests. They are the men who make the green hill-side blossom. They are the men who build our ships and who navigate them. They are the men who build our towns, and who inhabit them. They are the men who constitute the great mass of our community. Sir, they are not only the pillars that support our Government, but they are the capitals that adorn the very pillars. They are not to be classed with the slave. Our laboring men have homes; they have wives; they have little ones, dependent on them for support and maintenance; and they are just so many incentives and so much stimulus to action. The laboring man, with us, knows for whom he toils; and when he toils he knows that he is to return to that home where comfort and pleasure and all the domestic associations cluster around the social hearthstone. Northern laborers are "hirelings," and are to be classed with the negro slave!

Besides that, the men who labor in our community are the men whom we clothe with power.

They are the men who exercise the prerogatives of the State. They are the men who, after having been clothed with power there, are sent abroad to represent us elsewhere. They do our legislation at home. They support the State. They are the State. They are men, high-minded men. They read; they watch you in these Halls every day; and through all our community the doings of this branch, and of the other, are as well understood, and perhaps even better, than we understand them ourselves. I affirm that, throughout our community, the proceedings of Congress are more extensively and accurately read than even by ourselves. These are the men who are to be classed by the side of the slave! I think it is true that, in about every three generations at most, the wheel entirely performs its revolution. The wealthy man of the North, the wealthy man of any community, finds wealth at the end of two or three generations departing from the hands that accumulated it; and those who commenced life without means, and were "hiring, manual laborers," in their turn, by their industry, accumulate that wealth. That is the operation of things all around us. You rarely find a fortune continuing beyond three generations in this country, in the same family.

That class of our community, constituting a very large majority, has been designated here as hiring laborers, white slaves! Why, sir, does labor imply slavery? Because they toil, because they pursue a course which enables them to support their wives and their families, even if it be by daily manual labor, does that necessarily imply servitude? Far from it. I affirm that the great portion of our laborers at the North own their homes, and they labor to adorn them. They own their own homes, and if you will visit them you will find in nearly all of them a portion, at least, of the literature of the times, which shows that they read; you will find there evidences to satisfy you beyond all doubt that they are intelligent, and that they are in truth and in fact precisely what I have described them to be—the pillars of the State, the State itself, and the very ornaments and capitals that adorn the columns. With them the acquisition of knowledge is not a crime.

I have quoted all that the Senator from South Carolina has said on this point for the purpose of giving the widest circulation I can to the declarations he has made. He has mistaken, I doubt not, the character of our laborers by judging them from what he has seen in his own vicinity, and what, in my judgment, is produced by that very state of servitude which is there existing. It is my duty to vindicate our laborers. My only regret is that I can do it no more efficiently.

Mr. President, I occupied yesterday more of the time of the Senate than I proposed to do, and I will now hasten on with the few suggestions I design to make this morning; and I trust I shall not weary the Senate. I come now to the last proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, which I propose to examine. He told us that the exports of a country exhibit its true wealth. I do not wish to misstate the Senator; and if he will give me his attention for a single instant, I will state his proposition as I gather it from his remarks. He affirms that the surplus-product of a country is its wealth, and that that surplus-product is exhibited in the amount of its exportations. I propose to examine that proposition. It is unsound; it is untrue. I do not deny that the exportations of a country may exhibit its surplus product.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. I can very easily explain what I suppose to be the construction the Senator places on that remark; but as the debate on Kansas is limited, I do not wish to interfere with it; nor will I attempt to make any reply to any of the responses that may be made to me during this debate. I intend, however, to take an opportunity, which I have no doubt will be offered to make a general reply, in which I will explain more fully my views than I could do by a detailed response to specific points.

Mr. HAMLIN. I apprehend that I do not misunderstand the proposition of the Senator as he has laid it down. I do not, I think, misquote it. I could read his language to show that, but I need not do so. Now, sir, I assert that the exports of a country may or may not show its wealth, or its surplus of wealth. Is it not true that a country may produce a given article and export it all, receiving in return whatever they may purchase with it, and consume all that is received in return? Is it not equally true that a country may produce that which it consumes and consume it all? I should like to know what would be the difference between two communities—the one producing what it consumes and consuming it; the other raising and exporting a raw material and then consuming the whole amount of that raw material in the articles that are returned in exchange? What is the difference between these two communities in point of wealth? None whatever. But while the southern section of this country is principally an agricultural country; and while I know they furnish in the aggregate a very great amount of our foreign exportations, consisting of articles in a raw state, it does not follow that all those exportations are excess of wealth, after paying their own debts, after supporting their own families, after paying their own taxes, after liquidating all the variety of demands which they are obliged by law to pay. Because the South exports $100,000,000 of cotton, it does not follow that those $100,000,000 are a surplus, any more than because the North produces its $800,000,000 of manufactured articles, it follows that it has thereby produced that much of surplus.

What, then, is the true indication? What is the truth of this matter? If the Senator from South Carolina will tell me, if he can by any process ascertain, how much you export, and just how much you expend, then he and I will both arrive at what is the surplus left; but until he can tell me that, neither he nor any other person can give the surplus of the country. When I tell that Senator what is the amount that we manufacture at the North, and what is the amount that we annually use, then, and only then, he can tell me what is the net surplus. I know of no method by which this is to be arrived at mathematically; it cannot be. What are the evidences? We must look at the community, and we must gather from the community, and from all the facts that present themselves, the best evidence to show what is the surplus of the country, whether it arises from exportation or from home production.

Now, what is the truth in relation to the productions of the South? If the position assumed by the honorable Senator be correct, it must be indeed wealthy; it must indeed exceed in its net products any country on the face of the globe, or any country that has ever existed. But, sir, I believe that when that Senator shall look carefully into the matter, he will find—indeed he says so in his speech—that they consume their part of the importation of $333,000,000, and which are principally paid for by their exportations. Take that statement of the Senator himself, and I think it is a perfect answer to his whole position. He says they export a certain amount, and then he says they eat that up, or their proportion of it; and if they eat up their proportion of it, they eat up the whole amount of it. What are the evidences by which we are to gather what is the surplus wealth of a country, which arises from exportations or home productions—I mean the net wealth, the net surplus, because it is not a matter of any importance whatever whether we produce it ourselves or whether we send it abroad, and receive in exchange what we do not produce. If we consume the whole, in either case the result is just the same. I think that the South do not, in truth or in fact, produce any large sum beyond that which they consume; and I think the evidences all around us show pretty conclusively that they have no such surplus as is claimed.

I propose to read an extract from a work written upon slavery by a southern man—a man devoted to the institution—for the purpose of showing the manner in which the soil of the South has been deteriorated by a long-continued process of cropping. This work gives an opinion, which I doubt not is generally accurate, of the character of the country. I read from the work of Mr. Tarver, of Missouri, on the industrial resources of the South and the West:

"Examples may be found in our own country of States having become poorer by a steady perseverance in an unwise application of their labor. Such is the case in the Atlantic States south of the Potomac, as I think will be granted by every intelligent and candid individual who is acquainted with the country, and I think it will be admitted that these States are poorer than they were twenty years ago. There is a small increase in the number of laborers, and there may have been something gained by skill; but the great source of all wealth in an agricultural country—the soil—has been greatly deteriorated and diminished.

"If one acquainted with the present condition of the Southwest were told that the cotton-growing district alone had sold the crop for fifty million dollars per annum for the last twenty years, he would naturally conclude that this must be the richest community in the world. He might well imagine that the planters all dwell in palaces, upon estates improved by every device of art, and that their most common utensils were made of the precious metals; that canals, turnpikes, railways, and every other improvement, designed either for use or ornament, abounded in every part of the land. He would conclude that the most splendid edifices, dedicated to the purposes of religion and learning, were everywhere to be found, and that all the liberal arts had here found their reward and a home. But what would be his surprise when told that, so far from dwelling in palaces, many of these planters dwell in habitations of the most primitive construction; that, instead of any artificial improvement, this rude dwelling was surrounded by cotton fields, or probably by fields exhausted, washed into gulches, and abandoned; that, instead of canals, the navigable streams remain unimproved; that the common roads of the country were scarcely passable; that the edifices erected for the accommodation of religion and learning were frequently built of logs, and covered with boards; and that the fine arts were but little encouraged or cared for? Upon receiving this information, he would imagine that this was surely the country of misers—that they had been hoarding up all the money of the world, to the great detriment of the balance of mankind. But his surprise would be greatly increased, when informed that, instead of being misers and hoarders of money, these people were generally scarce of it, and many of them embarrassed and bankrupt. I think it would puzzle the most observing individual in the country to account for so strange a result. No mind can look back upon the history of this region for the last twenty years, and not feel convinced that the labor bestowed in cotton growing has been a total loss to this part of the country. The country of its production has gained nothing, and lost much. More than all, in the transportation of its produce, it has transported much of the productive and essential principles of its soil, which can never be returned, thereby sapping the very foundation of its wealth."

Such is the opinion of a very distinguished man from the State of Missouri. It is that state of things which might be presumed to exist, and would necessarily exist, in any community whose consumption equaled its production. Now, let me read an extract from a speech delivered by Governor Wise during his canvass in Virginia:

"Commerce has long ago spread her sails, and sailed away from you. You have not, as yet, dug more than coal enough to warm yourselves at your own hearth; you have set no tilt-hammer of Vulcan to strike blows worthy of gods in your own iron-foundries; you have not yet spun more than coarse cotton enough, in the way of manufacture, to clothe your own slaves. You have no commerce, no mining, no manufactures. You have relied alone on the single power of agriculture—and such agriculture."

"The landlord has skinned the tenant, and the tenant has skinned the land, until all have grown poor together."

I should not adopt the line of argument I propose, but for the course pursued by the Senator himself. He sets down the exports of the country at $279,000,000, excluding gold and silver. Of that sum, he claims, $158,000,000 are the clear productions of the South. He then says there are $80,000,000 productions of the forest, bread-stuffs, and provisions exported. Of these articles he assumes the South make one third; that, added to the $158,000,000, makes the exportations of the South $185,000,000, leaving for the North but $95,000,000, or a little less. To these exports of the South, so ascertained, he adds, for articles sent to the North, $35,000,000; thus making the surplus productions of the South $220,000,000. He treats the articles sent North in the same manner as foreign exportations. I think that is right, because it is just as much an export from the South to the North as it would be if it were to a foreign country; for whatever may be there produced, if sent out of the limits of the State, and an equivalent is returned, what matters it to the producer whether he gets his return from a neighboring State or a foreign country? I think the Senator, therefore, is clearly right in that respect. He makes his total amount of southern exportations $220,000,000, I think. Am I right?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. And that he assumes is the net production of the South. In the first place, in his basis of calculation, he excludes, in the exportations, gold and silver. Now, I should like to know why gold and silver are not productions of a country as much as cotton, rice, or tobacco. I take all the exports of the country, including everything which we send abroad, which is not of foreign growth, and reexported. I take everything which is the production of the country as showing the true amount of what we export. I affirm that I might with just as much propriety contend here to-day that the importations show the surplus wealth of the country, as that the exports of the country show that surplus wealth. The one would be just about as true as the other. You export a given amount. What does it show? You say it shows what you produce; but is it any evidence of what you consume?

With just as much propriety I might contend that the importations of the North show conclusively what is its surplus wealth, as you can presume the exportations of the South show what is its surplus wealth. Neither is true, and I make no such presentation with any purpose of insisting upon it as true, but I do it for the purpose of demonstrating the fallacy of the gentleman's own position.

What were the exportations during the last year? The exports for the year ending June 30, 1857, from the free States, were $174,049,048; and from the southern or slave States, $164,936,017, showing an excess of exportations from the northern States over the southern States of $9,113,031. This table shows all the exports. It includes gold and silver, which are as much a part of the production of your country as any article you can name. It is exported from the North. It is dug out of the mines in California; but I do not care where it comes from for this purpose. It may come from a foreign country. If we get it, we either produce it by digging it, or we buy it in exchange for what we have to sell, and before we export it abroad it is in our hands, and it is the evidence of just so much wealth. Nay, sir, it is the standard of all other commodities. It is the standard all over the civilized world. It is the standard by which all other values are measured.

Now, then, the exportations of the North exceed those of the South; but the Senator from South Carolina, after fixing the exportations of the South to foreign countries and to the North at $220,000,000, gives to the North $95,000,000 of exports. On that, or assuming the exportations North and South as equal, he says we at the North produce about twelve dollars per head, while at the South you produce $16 66. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that he has done injustice to his own State; he has done injustice to his own section, because he has limited their production to $16 66 per head, per annum. Why, sir, it is vastly more than that.

Mr. HAMMOND. I did not say the production; but the export production amounted to that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the gentleman had accumulated the whole wealth of the country into its exports, and said that yielded to the population a sum equal to $16 66 to each individual at the South. I say that the Senator, if he had assumed that position, would not have done justice to his own section, because the productions which they do export by no means constitute all the wealth of that section of country, as I shall proceed to show. They are not a moiety of them. I do not know, indeed, that they are one fourth part of them. They are a great way below the aggregate. The importations into the country last year were, in the aggregate, $319,405,432 to the northern States, and $41,484,709 to the southern States; leaving a balance of $277,920,723 in favor of the North. Does that show a surplus at the North of that amount over the South? Surely it does not. I make no such pretension; but still I affirm that I might with just as much propriety insist that our capacity to pay for imported articles was as good evidence of the net surplus of that section as the Senator can contend that the amount which the South export is their net production. It is not true in either case. The productions of the country, North and South, are vastly greater than is shown by exportations or importations, or both combined.

Where, then, sir, are we to find the true evidences of what constitute the net productions of any country? The Senator from South Carolina does not like the census tables. He complains frequently of them. Well, sir, they were arranged, if not by a gentleman from his own State, by a very distinguished southern man, whose opinions, whose sympathies, whose predilections, are all with him.

Mr. HAMMOND. The Senator will allow me, in justice to that gentleman, to say that, although he arranged, he did not take the census.

Mr. HAMLIN. He did not take the census; but the arrangement of the returns and some of the conclusions, which are deductions based upon judgment, were made by him. The census of the South was taken by southern men; the census of the North was taken by northern men; and then the calculations which were required were made by Mr. De Bow, a very distinguished man—a good deal of a financier, I am willing to admit, but with all the prejudices that would surely arise in his own bosom in favor of the South. I therefore go to his tables for the purpose of presenting what are the evidences of the prosperity of the different sections. I think they afford the best evidence that we can lay our hands upon as to the surplus of the different parts of the country.

Mr. TOOMBS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is a matter of no consequence in reference to the argument; but I want to put a fact right; and that may be of some consequence. The census was compiled, and it was very well done, indeed, by Mr. Kennedy—not by Mr. De Bow. He came in just before the publication, and had nothing to do with the agricultural statistics. I am not complaining of them. I think they were very badly taken in some places. But a vast amount of matter was collected, for which Mr. Kennedy is entitled to credit, and he claims it justly. Little or nothing of it was done by Mr. De Bow; for he did not come in until they were nearly all prepared for publication.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know very well that Mr. Kennedy was originally at the head of the bureau of census statistics. I was brought into frequent communication with Mr. De Bow after his appointment, and it is my recollection that the whole matter underwent his revision. But it is not material; nor is it material that there may have been some things omitted from the census returns. The facts there presented, we cannot avoid, and I am confident are correct and reliable.

Now, I put the question, what are the best evidences that we can have of what is the surplus production of a country? Its exports may be one, its imports may be another; but I insist that there are still other and important evidences which go to show what is the surplus production of a country. First, its schools; second, its progress in population; third, its agricultural productions and its improved state of agriculture; fourth, its manufactures; fifth, its ships; sixth, its railroads; and seventh, its capacity for war. There are others—these are the principal ones. The latter three are those which are offered by the Senator from South Carolina himself, as the evidence of the wealth of a country. I read from what that Senator said:

"You may estimate what is made throughout the country from these census books, but it is no matter how much is made if it is all consumed."

I grant that.

"If a man possess millions of dollars and consumes his income, is he rich? Is he competent to embark in any new enterprise? Can he build ships or railroads? And could a people in that condition build ships and roads, or go to war?"

The exhibition of the wealth of a country is to be found in those three things. I add to them those which I have named. I propose to show briefly, mainly but not wholly, from the census statistics, what has been the progress of the various sections of country on all the great branches to which I have alluded, and which I affirm show conclusively its prosperity; and I come first to schools. The census of 1850 shows that in the free States there were then 3,179 academies and private schools; in the slave States, 2,797. Their teachers in the free States were 7,175; in the slave States, 4,913. Their pupils in the free States were 154,893; in the slave States, 104,976. Their annual income in the free States was $2,457,372; in the slave States, $2,079,742. The total amount invested in schools and in colleges in the free States was $2,940,125; in the slave States, $699,079. The number of public schools in the free States was 62,433; in the slave States, 18,509. Their teachers in the free States, 72,621; in the slave States, 19,307. Their pupils in the free States, 2,769,901; in the slave States, 581,861. Their annual income in the free States was $6,780,337; and in the slave States, $2,719,534. The number of libraries, other than private, was, in the free States, 14,911; in the slave States, 695. The number of volumes in those libraries in the free States, 3,888,234; in the slave States, 649,577. That is one evidence of the intelligence of a country, and the intelligence of a country is one index of its prosperity. It is an index of a surplus, because a surplus is required to support schools.

Next, as to the progress of white population. In 1790, at the first census, there were, in the northern States, 1,900,976 white people; in the southern States, 1,271,488. In 1820 there were, in the northern States, 5,030,377 whites; in the southern States, 2,808,946. In 1850 there were, in the northern States, 13,238,670; in the southern States, 6,184,477. It will be observed that in 1790 the white population of the North exceeded that of the South about half a million; and in 1850 the white population of the North was 13,238,670; that of the South, 6,184,477. In 1790, at the first census, Virginia had a population of 748,308 whites; New York had a population of 340,120; giving Virginia a surplus of 408,188, or a little more than two to one in population over New York. How was it in 1850? In 1850 the population of New York was 3,097,394; that of Virginia 1,421,661, giving, in favor of New York, an excess of a little more than two to one, reversing precisely the ratio of population existing between those two States in 1790. I affirm that that is another evidence of the prosperity of a country, and of its actual wealth; because wealth goes along pari passu with population, unless there is some particular cause to prevent it.

I offer next a statement showing the number of farms and plantations, acres of improved and unimproved land, cash value of farms, average value per acre, and value of farming implements and machinery, in the free and slave States, according to the census returns for 1850. Number of farms and plantations—free States, 877,736; slave States, 564,203. Acres of improved land—free States, 57,688,040; slave States, 54,970,427. Acres of unimproved land—free States, 50,394,734; slave States, 125,781,865. Cash value of farms—free States, $2,143,344,437; slave States, $1,117,649,649. Average value per acre—free States, $19 83; slave States, $6 18. Value of farming improvements and machinery—free States, $85,736,658; slave States, $65,345,625.

That shows conclusively that we improve our farms, that we add the surplus of our products to the value of our lands. It proves conclusively that while we do not cultivate so large an area, it is in value exceeding that which is cultivated at the South, and it is this improved condition of our agriculture and this improved condition of our farms that shows the prosperity of our country. I shall not stop to comment on these figures. Indeed, if I were to deal in figures of rhetoric, they could add no force to these figures of arithmetic.

I next, as another and one of the best evidences which I think I can present to the Senate of the surplus product of the country, exhibit a table which shows the amount of live-stock and its value in 1850, and the value of all the agricultural productions. I find that in the free States the whole amount of agricultural productions and the value of live-stock (and we know that our friends of the South exceed us in agriculture) is $709,177,527, and in the slave States $634,570,057. While our southern brethren exceed us in agriculture relatively, still it will be seen that in the aggregate, upon every point we exceed them. Our population is twice as large, but then we are bound to dig in our sterile land and in our cold and forbidding climate, and I think the exhibition of a surplus of products, on the part of the North, shows that we have more surplus after the consumption which is required for our people than is found at the South.

But, sir, I come to another table, which shows the number of individuals and establishments engaged in manufactures, the amount of capital invested in such establishments, the value of the raw material used, the number of hands employed, the annual wages paid, the annual product, and the annual profit of such manufactures in the free and slave States, according to the census returns of 1850. Number of individuals and establishments—free States, 93,721; slave States, 27,645, Capital—free States, $430,240,051; slave States, $95,029,879. Value of raw material used—free States, $465,844,092; slave States, $86,190,639. Hands employed—free States, male, 576,954; female, 203,622; slave States, male, 140,377; female, 21,360. Annual wages—free States, $195,976,453; slave States, $33,257,560. Annual product—free States, $842,586,058; slave States, $165,413,027. Annual profit, according to De Bow—free States, $376,741,966; slave States, $79,222,388.

The amount of manufactured articles is more than $842,000,000 at the North; at the South, $165,000,000; and the annual profits at the North are $376,000,000; at the South, $79,000,000; leaving an excess of profits on manufactured articles at the North of about $300,000,000.

For the purpose of measuring the surplus wealth of the respective sections, I come now to test it by the rules which the Senator from South Carolina himself has laid down. He asserts that the surplus products of a country are to be exhibited in the capacity of its people to build ships and railroads and to go to war. These are the indications of the prosperity and of the surplus revenue of a country, as advanced by the Senator himself. While I do not admit that they are the only indications, I acknowledge that they are great and true ones; and while I contend that other great branches of industry to which I have alluded are equally sure and certain indices of the prosperity of a country, still, when I come to the very standard that he himself has erected, I find a state of things which I shall now present. Where is the navigation of the country? Who has the capacity to build ships? That is the first point made by the Senator; and I answer that amid the cold regions of the North, where we can do little else, we build ships. We can come down with them to you, and carry your products, and I trust you will allow us to do so when we carry them as cheap as anybody else. Of the tonnage of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1857, we have 4,102,491 tons; the South 338,352 tons; showing in favor of the North more than twelve tons to one. The tonnage built at the North during the year ending June 30, 1855—and I take these tables from our latest reports on commerce and navigation—was 528,844 tons; built at the South, 52,959 tons; being about ten to one.

I find, from the last reports which I can obtain, that in the northern States, which embrace an area, as we all know, of some 200,000 square miles less than the South, we have 17,855 miles of railroad, while at the South they have 6,559 miles, or nearly three miles to one. I find that the canals in operation at the North are 3,682 miles, and at the South 1,116 miles. That is the standard by which the Senator himself has sought to measure the surplus products of the country. I think they are very true evidences, not conclusive, not embracing all the elements, but still they are the best of evidence to enable us to form a correct judgment of the surplus of any country, so far as they go.

I come next to the capacity of the country for a state of war; and I find, from the report of the Secretary of War, made May 10, 1790, that there were furnished, during the revolutionary war, to the Continental line and regular militia, from the northern States 218,544 men; from the southern States 71,140 men. Massachusetts alone furnished 83,092, being some 12,000 more than were furnished by the whole South.

Mr. BENJAMIN. You are wrong.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not wrong, my friend will allow me to say. I have not, however, completed my whole statement. I say that, to the Continental line and to the regular militia, the quotas furnished are as I have named them. But, in addition, there were what were called estimated or conjectural militia returned in the report of the Secretary of War. It was a class of militia that was called out for temporary purposes, and to be used at specific points. Many of them were used to protect the Virginia Legislature, then, I think, called the House of Burgesses. Many of them were used in South Carolina to protect her legislative department when in session. That class of conjectural militia amounted, from the northern States, to 30,950; from the southern States, to 76,810. For the regular service, either of militia or Continental line, I have stated the number made by the Secretary of War to Congress in his report. I refer to the report of General Knox, when he was Secretary of War.

But, sir, the Senator from South Carolina speaks with great emphasis of the capacity of the South for a defensive war. Was not the revolutionary war a defensive war? It surely was not an aggressive war. I know that southern men are noble, proud, gallant, and courageous. It is true of all our people. The coward is the exception to the rule, whether you go North or South. We have very few people North who are great cowards enough to be cowards, nor have you many at the South. We are a gallant people. I respect my southern brethren highly, and I am making these comparisons only because the Senator from South Carolina, as I thought, undertook to measure the productions of all northern States, and to show the evidences of its prosperity, or want of prosperity, as based upon an exportation of $95,000,000. He certainly did it. I have no doubt the South have capacity for a war of self-defense; they are a brave people; but I think, nevertheless, that there is not quite that harmlessness, and not quite that safety in its peculiar institution, which he says. I think the evidence of patrols all over your States, and all your institutions for discipline—I will use no other term—in your own city, show conclusively that you have some fear that one day a cry will be raised that will break upon you rear like an alarm-bell in the night; and I cannot avoid the inference that you cannot have quite that capacity, even in a war of defense, which you would have but for that very thing.

In the war of the Revolution this same State of South Carolina was called upon by the Continental Congress to furnish her quota of troops; she was asked to supply 13,800 for that war, and she did supply 5,508. Massachusetts supplied 62,000 for the Continental line. I find that in 1775 South Carolina was asked to supply no men, and she supplied none. I do not find the requisition made upon her in 1776, but she supplied 2,969. In 1777 the requisition or quota demanded of her by the Continental Congress was 4,080, and she supplied 1,650. In 1778 the quota demanded of her was 3,132, and she supplied 1,650. In 1779 no requisition was made. In 1780 the requisition was for 3,32, and she did not supply a man. In 1781 the requisition was 1,152, and she did not supply a man. In 1782 the requisition was 1,152, and she did not supply a man. In 1783 the requisition was 1,152, and she did supply 139. I think these are the best evidences as to the condition of our whole country. I know you of the South have a climate more favorable than ours. I have quoted no table here for the purpose of disparaging the South. God forbid. Whatever may be her prosperity, I glory in it; but when you undertake to arraign her against the North, and to disparage the North by diminishing her productions to an exportation of $95,000,000, I think I am justified in coming here and quoting facts and figures, showing what I think is pretty conclusive evidence of our prosperity and of the surplus which we really produce. But for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina I certainly would not have gone into this view of the matter.

Mr. President, I pass now from the consideration of this subject to discuss very briefly the practical question that is before us. I would very gladly go over the whole field as it presents itself to my mind; but I have already trespassed too long on the time of the Senate to do so. I therefore propose to state, succinctly as I can, the points which I think are material, and the reasons which will control my vote at least, if not the votes of others, upon the bill before us.

First, I object to yoking the living with the dead. You passed an enabling act, as you called it, for Minnesota. I attach no sort of importance to any act in relation to a Territory which authorizes her to adopt a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union as a State, except this: when Congress voluntarily passes a bill prescribing the terms to a Territory, and saying that, if she will adopt and follow them, she shall be admitted, it imposes an obligation upon us to do so in good faith. If she does not substantially follow the provisions of the enabling act, she is entitled to no benefit from it. If she does, as a matter of good faith, she is entitled to admission under its provisions. We did so by Minnesota. If, therefore, she has substantially followed the line which we marked out for her, in good faith, in honor, and in honesty, we are bound to admit her.

We did nothing in relation to the Territory of Kansas, and she comes here, therefore, with no implied obligation upon our part to admit her. We may do so. I do not think it is of any earthly importance whether we authorize a Territory to form a State constitution or not. The question with me, and the only question, is, is the instrument before us the constitution of the people of the Territory? I learned a great many years ago, and it is a doctrine I shall carry with me to my grave, that governments are founded upon, and derive their powers from, the consent of the governed; that governments are instituted for the people. If the people of a Territory come here with a constitution, I only desire to know that it is in truth and in fact their will. If it is their will, and everything else is right, I will vote for their admission. If it is not their will, I do not care whether you have passed enabling acts, I do not care whether they have made their constitution with or without enabling acts, I will not vote for their admission. The two cases are here sought to be connected. Why? Is it to make one carry the other? Is it for the purpose of forcing Kansas into the Union upon the back and by the strength of Minnesota? You cannot avoid that conclusion.

Then I come to the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH] an amendment which, in my judgment, amounts to just nothing at all. I shall not pause to read it; but I think it commences by saying that "nothing herein contained shall prevent the people of the State of Kansas from amending their constitution." What does the word "herein" refer to? This bill that we are passing. If you adopt that amendment, it will be ineffective entirely. There will be no efficiency or power in its language. There is nothing in the bill, one way or the other, on the point. The question is as to the power under the constitution. If his amendment had said that nothing in the constitution shall prevent the people of that State from altering or amending it, there would have been some force in it; but the amendment of the Senator says, "nothing herein contained." "Herein" refers to the bill before us, and surely there is nothing therein contained on this point. The question is as to the power which the people have under the constitution. If they have it, we cannot take it away. If they have it not, we cannot impart it.

Then comes the amendment which is proposed by my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.] That amendment meets the objection. Whether it is wise or unwise to adopt such an amendment, I shall not now stop to inquire. I will, however, say that I do not hold that we have any right to make constitutions; we have a simple right to admit States; still we have a right to determine upon what terms and conditions we will receive a partner into this Confederacy. We may reject her because we do not like the terms on which she proposes admission. I do not care what those terms are; if, in the judgment of a majority of Congress, the terms are not satisfactory, we may reject her, and we may continue to reject her until the terms on which she presents herself are satisfactory. There has never been a State admitted into this Union upon which we have not imposed terms and conditions. You have provided that they shall not tax your public lands, and the taxing power lies at the basis of every government. It is the food on which a government must live; but you deny them the right. It is a condition which you have wisely imposed, and you had a right to impose it.

That is the way in which the bill is practically presented to us here to-day. I shall now run over the line of argument which I had proposed to discuss, but which I will not for want of time. In 1854 we were quiet, and there was no ripple upon the political sea. All was quiet, and the agitations that had disturbed the country had ceased. Then the demand was made that the Missouri compromise line should be repealed; and what for? For no other purpose on God's earth than to extend slavery. That was its object. I do not mean to accuse every Senator who voted for it of having that design specifically in his mind; but I judge of acts by their results. I judge of acts by what we have a right to infer must be their natural and necessary result. If they did not mean to extend slavery, why repeal it? What good did it do? They did mean it; that was the public meaning; that was the intention and the design of the bill; and it was for that purpose that the compromise line was repealed. First, a government was set up in that Territory by a class of men who invaded it. Nobody doubts it, nobody denies it, who has any regard for correctness. After a successful usurpation in this Territory, your Government sent in troops to support that government which had thus been set up in usurpation; and just so often, and just whenever any Governor that you sent there, coming from the North or the South, had learned what was the true state of things, and had fraternized with the majority of the people there, he was either dismissed or compelled to resign for fear of dismissal.

Then I come to this very act that is presented here as evidence of what was intended as to the institutions of the Territory. I take the dismissal of the last acting Governor, Mr. Stanton, as still another evidence. No sane man doubts that there would have been a collision in that Territory if he had not called together the Legislature for the purpose of affording the people such relief as they thought they might rightly demand, and as could get, under legislative action. I take it, that nobody doubts that but for his calling the Legislature together, there would have been a collision; but because he did, he subjected himself to the displeasure of the powers that be, and he was dismissed. Why dismissed? Simply, and for the reason, that he wanted the people of the Territory to express their opinion upon a subject in which they had such a deep and vital interest. It has been the grave-yard of Governors, and it will be the grave-yard of the present Governor, if you keep him there much longer. I never spoke to the man; I do not care who he is; I do not care how corrupt a man is who goes out there; but when he mingles with the masses, and sees and feels what is there exhibited, he will come, if he is not a devil incarnate, to the same conclusion that every Governor has who has been there—that there is a right which belongs to those people, and that he will aid in maintaining it. A constitution has been formed in Kansas, and this bill proposes to accept it as the constitution of the people of Kansas. Have they formed it? That is the allegation. How did they form it? They formed it by virtue of an enactment which emanated from the Territorial Legislature. In my judgment, that was well enough, if it were the act of the people. All depends on that. Indeed, if the constitution was framed in a mass meeting, or by delegates elected, even without law, and it were still the act of the people, it would satisfy me. All would depend on that. Of course, the will of the people must be so expressed that there can be no doubt upon the point.

But I hold that your Territorial Legislature may pass all the laws they choose to pass for the formation of a State constitution; they may form constitutions in any way they choose; but until they receive the approval of a majority of the people upon whom the constitution is to act, they are no better than so much blank paper with me. When the people of the Territory approve it, it is to be regarded as binding; and I do not care myself how they approve it; I do not care whether it is by a vote at the polls, or by an expression of their opinions sent here to us by petitions; but I want to know the fact of their approval, and I want to know it in such a way that there shall be no reasonable doubt about it; and when I get the fact I am satisfied. Strictly in a legal sense, neither of these methods may be correct; but in the equitable view which I take, either method will answer if the constitution receives the approval of those persons interested in it. That is all I demand; and, so far as the people of the Territory can act, that is all they can do.

Another thing: that constitution can take effect only when the Territory is admitted as a State by us. Then it goes into operation—not till then. Suppose Congress had authorized Kansas to frame a constitution; suppose Kansas had done so; suppose an undoubted majority of all the people of that Territory had approved that constitution, and she had come here; still it could not take effect until we had admitted her. Suppose in that case we, for some cause, sufficient in our own judgment, should reject her: would that constitution amount to anything? Certainly not. It is the admission of the Territory as a State that gives vitality to the constitution.

Now, is this constitution that of the people of Kansas? It is no such thing. The people repudiate it. It was conceived in sin, and was brought forth in fraud. It has never been submitted to them by the parties who made it.

Whether slavery should exist in the Territory by virtue of the constitution, or whether the article in the constitution should be stricken out, and slavery should exist under the schedule to the constitution, was what was submitted. It was slavery either way. On that proposition some six thousand votes, or more, were returned, where it is now proved but about two thousand five hundred were given.

It is now asserted that the convention which made this Lecompton constitution having failed to submit it to the people for rejection or approval, it could not be afterwards done by the Territorial Legislature. I deny that doctrine entirely. The vitality, the legal shape of the constitution, may come from the convention; but why do we submit it in any case to the people? Simply and only for the purpose of learning whether it is their act. That is all we want to know. It mattered not whether submission was on the 21st of December or on the 4th of January. At any time, any hour, before we are called upon to act, the people of the Territory have a right to express their approval or disapproval of that instrument. The only object of submission is to learn the will of the people. So that we get that will before we act, is all that is necessary. That will is expressed in the vote given on the 4th of January.

The President, in his message, tells us that he has not heard what the vote on the 4th of January was; but we all know, as certainly as we know any fact of a general character, that, on the 4th of January, there was an overwhelming majority of the people of that Territory reprobating, rejecting this very instrument. They scorn to recognize it as anything of theirs, or any instrument which ought to be binding upon them.

Now, sir, we are about to have this constitution forced on the people of the Territory of Kansas. What will they do? God only can tell. I do not know. I have no advice to give them; but I can say this: the people in that country have come from all sections; they embrace the Huguenots of the South, who left their country to enjoy religious freedom on this continent, as well as the Puritans of the North; they embrace the Cavaliers of Virginia, who came into this country to establish a Government which should secure them in their rights; and I do not believe that the spirit of the Puritans, the Huguenots, or the Cavaliers is quite yet extinct. If Congress shall undertake, in its power, to force a constitution and a State government upon that people, when it has only a right to admit States, not to make them, they are a people who are only fit to be slaves, and they will only be slaves, if they do not resist it to the last extremity. I put it to any Senator, and I ask him what would he do, standing in a community where he knew Federal bayonets were about to force upon him a government which was to deprive him of his rights? I ask any one who is about to vote for this great wrong, what would he do? Would he not resist it to the bitter end, and to the last extremity? If he would not, the blood of the Anglo-Saxon race does not circulate in his veins. I believe they will resist it; I believe they will do what is their duty; and if they do, I only desire to add, that the responsibility must be with those who have placed them in such an emergency. If men fight for their domestic altars, you must not complain of them for doing it, when you have forced that emergency upon them; nor, let me add, must you blame those who shall rally to their support. But I cannot enlarge upon these matters as I would. I must leave them, with a brief allusion to one other point.

Mr. President, this is all to be done under the "forms of law." I have heard this phrase "forms of law," until it has become painful to my ear. Forms of law! Will you tell me of the worst despotism that ever existed, that did not rest upon forms of law? Will you tell me of the wickedest act that has ever been perpetrated by any government, that has not been done under the forms of law? We sit not here, sir, in the capacity of a court to adjudicate and to construe the laws that have been made; we are here for the purpose of exercising our power upon broader principles of equity than those which belong to courts; but still all courts which administer laws are clothed with equity powers. All courts are clothed with equity powers to prevent a greater wrong.

"It is a common saying, and a true,
That strictest law is oft the highest wrong."

Forms of law! Why let us rather see to it that the substance of the law is executed and justice done.

We are clothed with equity powers beyond those which obtain in a court; and we are making laws; we are not administering them. We ought at the mere suggestion of wrong to these people, to go to the very basis, and ascertain whether we are about to perpetrate a wrong and force upon them a government which is not their own. But, sir, instead of that we are here day after day with petty juggling and pettifogging, claiming to proceed under the forms of law, forgetting the substance. What is the substance? What is the right? What care I here in making laws, for what may be a form? What is the substance? What is the great equity of the case; and as a legislator it is my duty to apply myself to that. What is right? what is just? Let that be done and all will be well.

Forms of law! God knows there is nothing but form in it. Forms of law! Long years ago the mother country undertook to oppress these colonies by forms of law, but not as unjustly as we have ruled the people of Kansas; and she persecuted that great and noble patriot, John Hampden, under the forms of law, and for his love of liberty. There is one other act which has been perpetrated under the forms of law, to which I will allude, and then I shall have done.

Under the forms of law despotism is created. Under the forms of law, all the wrongs of which the mind of man can conceive have been perpetrated. Under the forms of law, and in the name of liberty, liberty itself has been stricken down. In the name and under the forms of law, the Son of man was arraigned and stretched upon the cross. Under the forms of law you are about to do an act here, unequaled in turpitude by anything that has been recorded in all the progress of time, save that event to which I have just alluded. In all history, save the crucifixion of Christ, there is no act that will stand upon the record of its pages in after time of equal turpitude with this act. The purpose of it is to extend human slavery; and I may well inquire—

"Is this the day for us to sow
The soil of a virgin empire with slavery's seeds of woe;
To feed with our fresh life-blood the Old World's cast-off crime,
Dropped like some monstrous early-birth from the tired lap of Time?"

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short time while I consider the subject before us; not in its general and enlarged relations, but in the limited aspect which it presents as a practical question connected with the legislation of the day.

Mr. President, the most remarkable feature in the discussions and proceedings which have originated here as to the domestic affairs of Kansas, and its right to mold its own institutions in its own way, is, that we are earnestly seeking to intervene, when non-intervention is the great principle upon which we propose to act. We are usurping the consideration of those very questions that were referred to the people of that Territory; and more restrictions and invasions of the rights of the people are sought to be enforced than were removed from them by the repeal of the Missouri restriction. We are questioning the exercise there of the very powers which we have here abdicated, and under the pretext of a parental sovereignty "held in abeyance" and "in trust" for them, to emasculate their great charter of freedom of all its value and its virtues. That famous restriction imposed upon the people of the Territories but one disability—a grievous and an offensive one—a professed bond of peace, but a fruitful source of sectional discord. That was removed, and the question which it had arbitrarily decided was referred to its proper arbiters, the people of the respective Territories. Now, when the people, in the exercise of their highest powers, have determined this question, and seek to give repose to the country, a new element of discord appears; new and fearful issues are presented, as menacing as the old. They have settled this question in the formation of a State constitution, and now the very validity of that constitution is questioned, its provisions assailed, and the form of its adoption denounced. Indeed, almost every objection which is urged here to the admission of Kansas is such as has been already determined by Kansas herself, in her own way; and were that Territory to be denied admission into the Union as a State, it would present the anomaly of conferring rights upon a Territory and punishing her for exercising them; of enabling them to "form their domestic institutions in their own way," and then quarreling with them because they had not formed them in "our way." It would be to transfer the discords of Kansas to the Halls of Congress, and make national issues of Kansas quarrels; and, in the spirit of jealous and captious power, review the internal politics of that Territory upon the question of her admission into the Union. Mr. President, let us not mistake the true issue here, and confound the great question between the Union and Kansas with the smaller discords and rivalries of parties and factions there.

A preliminary question arises, which demands a passing notice. The friends of Kansas and Minnesota propose to unite their fortunes and their destinies in the same measure. This is a step in the right direction; and I rejoice that each section, through its national men of whatever party, can in this manner give earnest to each other of their loyalty to a common faith. One is a free and the other a slave State; and each, in the exercise of the acknowledged right to form its domestic institutions according to its own views, has arrived at quite different results, and shaped them in different molds. It may be the last opportunity which is afforded of thus testing the sincerity and integrity of those who profess devotion to the principles of popular rights in the Territories. Such instances have occurred before, and this scheme is not without precedents. Iowa and Florida were admitted together, and in the same bill; while Arkansas and Michigan, though not embraced in the same bill, the historical fact is notorious that they were considered as kindred and dependent measures, and supported by the same influences. This coincidence, of course, is no attempt to revive the idea of preserving the balance of power, by admitting a slave and a free State together. That ephemeral security for the constitutional equality of the rights of the southern States has passed away forever. It was virtually destroyed in the admission of California; and the progress of events renders all hope of the restoration of that equilibrium in the Senate more desperate and delusive every day. The free States of this Union have outstripped the southern States in the march of empire, and the rapid, if not precocious, development of population and formation of States. With their preponderance of population, their large accessions from Europe, and the constant stream of emigration from the southern States to the free States of the Northwest and the Pacific, they have accelerated the laws of population, and established a disparity between the two sections of the Union, which it is in vain to expect will ever be diminished or destroyed. If, in the race of progress, of development, of empire, or aggrandizement, we in the southern States have been distanced, it is a result at which we neither complain nor repine. This great Union is not a partnership of sections, but a Union of States; and, whether slave or free, of republican States. The southern States seek not empire or aggrandizement. In those additions to the Union supposed to have been made under the agency and influence of the southern States, the northern States have had over the lion's share in the benefits which followed.

These accessions were but contributions to the national wealth and strength, to the greatness and glory of the Union. We claim no monopoly of them, but only an equal right to the enjoyment of a common inheritance. Whether this consists of constitutional rights—the security of our institutions, the settlement of the common domain—or the additions of new members to our great family of States, our rights are equal and the same. We would place no part of this national heritage under the dominion of any section, or mold their institutions in conformity with any will but that of the people with whose welfare they are connected. While this union of States, equal in dignity and rights, is preserved, there should be no association but that between equals. Whatever the diversities of institutions, founded in the varied accidents of origin, race, or history, the influences of climate, habits, and pursuits, the spirit of our political associations is that of equals and sovereigns among the States, and one Government as to all national purposes. There is, therefore, an eminent propriety in the associations of these two measures as one, not to suffer in the disasters of a common defeat, but to share a common success. Let them enter the Union as twins. The spectacle has been witnessed in our past history, and it will lose none of its moral or its significance if it is witnessed by us. We shall thus, by one comprehensive and decisive measure, rid ourselves of two subjects of engrossing interest. The country needs repose from this sectional agitation, which threatens to become, if it is not so already, a leprosy and incurable vice in our political system. Let us dismiss from our Halls this national discord over the domestic quarrels of a distant Territory which has come upon us unbidden and uninvited. Let us refer this question to the State of Kansas as a sovereign among her sisters in the Confederacy, and discords must cease, and the law restored to its supremacy. If these anticipations of the future are not realized; if the scenes of strife, of carnage, and revolution, which have convulsed that Territory, and threatened to extend themselves beyond her border, are to be immortal; if Kansas is to bring into the Union no gifts but her discords, with which to embroil sections in her own unhappy strife, it will be because of that mischievous and malign intervention in her affairs from outside her borders that has counseled resistance to law, to her legitimate government, and has incited her turbulent malcontents to rebellion. It will be because there are those who, having predicted the failure of this measure to restore peace, will adopt all expedients to insure that result. If all these causes combined should unhappily succeed in protracting the struggle, and defeat all efforts at pacification, then we shall have acquitted ourselves of our whole duty, and the consequences can take care of themselves.

Mr. President, let not the friends of Minnesota think that she is dishonored or contaminated by the association with Kansas in this form. They both come here irregularly, and both need the same indulgence to enable them to enter the portals of the Union. If Minnesota presents herself under the authority of a previous act of Congress, preparatory to her admission, those who refused at last Congress, to smooth the way for Kansas by a similar mode, cannot now justly arrogate for Minnesota any preëminence of rights on that score. If Kansas brings here a republican constitution, as the triumph of government over faction and revolution, Minnesota has not been free from factional strifes in accomplishing her purpose. Her convention split in twain, upon its assemblage; its two hostile fragments pursuing their labors under separate organizations, each claiming to be the legitimate convention, and each acting for the whole people. They only reached a common result through a joint committee, and adopted the same constitution on separate parchments. If Kansas comes here as a nominal slave State, in defiance of the exploded Missouri compromise, does not Minnesota ask admission with boundaries embracing a portion of the Northwest; which, by the compact with Virginia, was to be carved into only five States? If Minnesota has fortunately obtained the previous consent of Congress to her admission, it does not detract from the obligation of Congress to Kansas to redeem its pledges in the organic act, and in the treaty with France in 1803. They both occupy the same legal footing, and I shall cheerfully vote for both. Each has, in the exercise of these rights—"to form their domestic institutions in their own way"—establish for themselves "republican" forms of government. This enables us to perform our constitutional duty and guarantees, and exhausts our whole power over the subject. All beyond that is usurpation, and invites back here the very mischief to which we thought we had bid adieu forever. It robs the Kansas declaration of rights of its chief virtue, and restores to us the power of intervention, none the less distasteful or offensive because of the spurious pretext of intervening in their affairs to enforce non-intervention.

Mr. President, that I may be intelligible in my remarks upon the main subject of discussion, I must recall some of the history of the Kansas question, and advert to some considerations connected with it. In doing so, I must draw largely on the labors of my colleague on the Committee on Territories, whose finished and logical statement of facts would, if generally known, spare me the labor of attempting to condense them.

The contest in which we are now engaged is but another chapter in the history of the slavery question. The form has changed; the struggle is the same. Eight years ago scenes transpired in this Chamber which many of us remember. No one desires to witness their repetition. How long and how arduous were the labors to put a period to that state of things, are matters of familiar history. We had approached a period in our national career when no one could divine or cared to know its future. Our arms and our diplomacy had given us an empire to govern, and the attempt to organize and fix its political condition and to devote it to the North had unlocked the pent-up elements of discord in our political system, and having escaped the control of the politics of parties, seemed armed only for mischief. The antagonisms of half a century seemed to have been precipitated into a last conflict for supremacy, while the cohesive and conservative ligaments of the Union, auxiliaries of our Constitution, either slumbered in repose or awakened to a task to which they seemed unequal. The country had been dragged to the very threshold of revolution. The great disease of our system, planted at its birth, and matured with its growth, menaced speedy dissolution. I speak of the antagonism, restless and aggressive, of the free States to the institutions of the southern States. If this array had been but a mere paroxysm of party, it would have soon passed, and after the storm we should have hailed the sunshine again; but this antagonism had outgrown its original dimensions, and was fortified by others coinciding with it. The Missouri compromise had boldly avowed and taught the dangerous lesson that there was a North and a South, with hostile systems of institutions, of labor, of philosophy, and religion on its opposite sides. The project was boldly avowed to surround the southern States with a cordon of free States, and forbid the further expansion of the southern institutions; to line our borders with hostile influences, before which the security for property would melt away. To declare the ocean free, that the slave trade between the States might be paralyzed; to make free territory wherever the flag of the Union waved; to convert our forts and arsenals into a refuge for fugitive slaves; and desecrate the stars and stripes of the Union to the ideas and objects of a section. As if to show with what precision this crusade had been planned, a member from Massachusetts congratulated himself that when this consummation was complete, there would be less than two hundred miles between any slave in the southern States and his freedom.

The struggle was for empire and dominion upon the one side, and for self-preservation on the other. Truth triumphed, and this great agitation ended in the declaration of that just and universal principle that States may be admitted into the Union "with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission." This was no triumph of one section over another; it was a triumph of the Constitution over all. The legislation in which it was conceived was confined to Utah and New Mexico, but the principle was universal. It was of necessity applicable to all Territories, and bounded by no latitudes. It was not alone a southern, but an American idea. Sections had been arrayed in the ceaseless hostility of rival systems—defying all pacification, knowing neither peace nor trace, and separated by a broad ground of debatable questions, about which it were folly to suppose they could ever agree. Here was a common umpire, selected by the Constitution, to which this question could be submitted. This was a second declaration of independence—not an act of emancipation. It did not propose to emancipate the slave from his master in the Territories, but to emancipate the Territories themselves from the intervention of the Federal Government. It was the higher freedom of government in the Territories—the freedom of American citizens to shape their own destinies, and to mold the institutions under which they are to live.

Four years later it became necessary to test the value of this great principle of territorial freedom in its application to territory north of the Missouri line. In terms, this had not been repealed by the compromise of 1850. The longer toleration of this restriction was plainly inconsistent with the principles of that act, and considerations of the highest import demanded its total repeal. It was offensive as a statutory reproach of Congress upon the institutions of half the States of the Union. It was anomalous, as prescribing intervention north of the line and non-intervention on the subject of slavery south of it. It was unjust, as conferring a different measure of political rights on different Territories. Northern citizens could go into all parts of the common domain, while southern citizens were restricted by a line. It had arrayed the country in hostile sections, and fostered the idea that they had separate rights in the Union. It was an unmitigated mischief, and by its tendency to create hostile systems developing in opposite directions, had half accomplished the rupture of the Union. The history of its origin ceased to entitle it to respect. It was no compromise. It was accepted by the South as an evil less than that of the alternative—total exclusion from all the common territory. Such was the hard necessity of their condition, that they claimed as a triumph what was a vast sweeping capitulation. It had fulfilled its mission, and its virtues were now gone; it had purchased a peace at the price of a permanent source of discord, and this was its whole virtue. It was therefore repealed, and the Kansas and Nebraska act was passed.

I have indulged in a seeming latitude of remarks upon the chief features of the great discussions and agitations of 1821, 1850, and 1854, in which the subject of slavery in the Territories was the only question; but it forms a part of my purpose to show that this is the only question referred to the people of the Territories, and the only power abdicated by Congress in their favor. It is worth while to repeat the words of this enactment, which provides, in the exact language of the compromise measures of 1850, that "when admitted as a State, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitutions may prescribe at the time of their admission." Again, after declaring the Missouri act inoperative and void, as repugnant to these principles, the purpose of Congress in passing the act is declared in these words:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

To these express recognitions of the perfect freedom of the Territories to form their domestic institutions was added another more general and comprehensive, that the power of the Legislature should "extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States;" and this completed the code of the powers and privileges of the Territories.

Mr. President, too much importance cannot be ascribed to the principles of this enactment. It finally ascertained and rigidly defined the true relation between the Federal Government and the Territories, and traced the line that separates the just powers of the one from the legitimate rights of the other. Regarding the Territories as political communities and embryo States preparing for admission into the Union, and having a clear right under the Constitution to it, it assimilated as far as possible their political rights to those of the States. They were not sovereign, it is true, but they were exclusive masters of their own, in their internal affairs. By an abuse of terms, this application of the principles of self-government to the Territories has been called "popular sovereignty," "squatter sovereignty." Our form of Government admits of no squatter sovereignty, except where there is no Government, and no allegiance superior to their right. I know of no illustration of this right, thus perverted, except that defiant and treasonable attempt, at Topeka, to subvert the Government and authority of the United States, by an independent and revolutionary State government. But that absolute sovereignty, defined to be the supreme power of a State, and which in every government is lodged somewhere, is shared between the Federal and territorial governments. The Federal Government reserving to itself all its national power of admit ting new States, and its necessary incident of instituting temporary governments, as a means to attain that end, is supreme in the exercise of these powers. The Territories, having the right to form and regulate, since this act, all their domestic institutions in their own way, are supreme in the exercise of those rights. Among the great mass, and prominent in it, is this subject of slavery, now also referred to their jurisdiction as a domestic institution—domestic from the nature of the jurisdiction which forms and regulates it, national only in the guarantees and securities with which the rights of property connected with it are invested by the compromises of the Constitution. But for this last feature, which attaches to it the right of property in slaves, through all the common Territories, I should not know of any exemption which it possessed from the power of the Legislature. This subject, with all the domestic institutions, the civil relations of life, the internal polity, the municipal concerns, of the Territory, are alike confided to their own regulation and administration. These are not rights derived from Congress, but only recognized by the form of government which it has instituted for their protection, and which it is the right of Congress to ordain, as a necessary means to their admission into the Union. It is in this sense, and in this only, that Congress is supreme, and that the sovereignty of the Territories is said by the Senator from Illinois to be "in abeyance, suspended in the United States, in trust for the people when they become a State." Among the "rightful subjects of legislation" with which they are clothed, among the "domestic institutions" which they are empowered "to form and regulate," is that highest act of the supreme power with which they are invested—the formation of a State government preparatory to admission into the Union, and prescribing the mode and manner of accomplishing this purpose. When they are to exercise this right, and how to exercise it; when they have outgrown the capacity of a territorial government, and desire the stronger and more vigorous energies of a State government, are questions concerning themselves alone, and no one else. If Congress is to determine that question, then territorial self-government is worse than a shadow, and the Kansas act a delusion. These Territories, as part of the territories acquired from France in 1803, hold our bond to admit them into the Union according to the principles of the Federal Constitution; and it is theirs to decide when they will ask its fulfillment. The acts organizing these Territories contemplate their speedy admission as States, and are adopted as a necessary means to accomplish that result; and it is for them to determine when they will ask that these just expectations shall be realized. These are their high functions to perform; and in their performance they are not subject to the surveillance of Congress—the officious intermeddling of Governors—under no obligation to propitiate the sullen resentments of insurgent factions, nor to accommodate themselves to the views of distant States, but are to be "perfectly free" to carve out their own destinies, "in their own way." It is this which makes them sovereign within the sphere which I have thus described. But on the other hand, there are corresponding rights and powers of the Union to be observed. This is what is meant by the language of the Kansas act—"subject only to the Constitution of the United States." What are these rights and powers of the Federal Government, in which she is also supreme, and which are a limitation upon the unqualified freedom of the Territories? They are these, and no others: The Constitution provides that "Congress may admit new States into the Union"—a discretion converted into an absolute obligation by the treaty with France; and the United States "guaranties to each State in the Union a republican form of government." With the performance of these high constitutional powers and duties, Congress fulfills its treaty obligations, and exhausts its whole powers. Consistently with these principles, a Territory cannot, by her own act alone, either escape from her territorial dependence, set up an independent government of her own upon the ruins of her legitimate government, or induct themselves into the Union, "without the consent of Congress." Such an act would be revolution, like that ordained at Topeka. On the contrary, the whole power of Congress cannot admit a State into the Union against its consent, expressed through its constitutional forms. The admission of a State into the Union is a compact between the State and the Union, in which each acts in perfect harmony in performing its own appropriate functions. It requires the assent of both, and it matters but little which may take the initiative; whether, as in the case of Minnesota, Congress tenders her consent in advance, and invites a State to propose for admission; or whether, as in Kansas, the Territory takes the first step, and presents herself, a State with her republican constitution, and asks admission into the Union. In either case the legal attitude of both is the same. Each requires the consent of Congress to complete her admission. A republican constitution is alike necessary to both, as well as the requisite population. In either case the act of the Territory is the exercise of its whole and highest sovereignty, and valid as such, and for that reason. If admitted, they are States; if not, they remain Territories.

Mr. President, these are the general principles which I entertain as to the true relation between the Federal Government and the Territories. A few facts in the history of Kansas of controlling significance will make their application obvious. On the 30th of May, 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed. It opened a boundless field for American enterprise, and new conquests for American civilization. The western frontier, the advanced posts of our progress was skirted from the Red to the Missouri river with an Indian empire which, secured by the faith of treaties, seemed anchored in the great pathway of commerce and emigration to the Pacific. The march of civilization had been arrested by a line of longitude. This checked for a period the advancing stream of emigration which, coursing with ceaseless and swelling tide, and following the path of the sun, shall meet the reflex of the tide from the Pacific, and mingling amid the crests of the Rocky Mountains, end its mission in completing the circuit of the globe. This barrier was removed. The Indian, unfixed in his home, and forced again upon his retreat to accomplish his destiny, all this vast empire so suddenly unlocked, with its countless capacities and treasures, nine tenths of it was devoted irrevocably, by an irrepealable law of climate, to settlement from the northern States of the Union, and destined inevitably to swell the number of free States; besides which, there lay, too, the recently opened Territory of Minnesota—the Eden of the continent—and the regions hovering around the great lakes and the heads of the Mississippi. Then there, too, beyond the Rocky Mountains, and on the Pacific coast, were Oregon and Washington—all dedicated by this great law of climate to the free labor of the North. Here was a prospect which ought to have satisfied the highest aspirations of those whose whole conception of the objects of the Union consists of the one idea of "free soil." Upon the south of this great empire, the opening of which for settlement could, at any time, and at every period of acquisition, have been defeated by less than the vote of southern Senators, lay the small Territory of Kansas, embraced between three parallels of latitude. It lay immediately west of Missouri, and in close proximity to Arkansas; and, as such, its future political condition was an object of lively interest in the South. The situation of Missouri was peculiar; upon her eastern and northern boundaries she had free States for her neighbors, and to complete the circle of hostile influences, by extending it to her western border, where most of her slave population was congregated, was a step which ought, as it did, arouse her most terrible energies for self-preservation. When the fierce struggle was over which ended in a long delayed act of justice to the South, and the principles of non-intervention were established, it was hoped that they would receive the sanction of the great heart of the nation, and be enthroned in it as an American principle. The southern States of the Union, in the true spirit of this principle, expected only that, in the fair competition for the extension of their form of institutions into Kansas, its settlement and political complexion would be determined by the laws of climate and the agencies of a natural and legitimate emigration. If, in the hazards of a fair contest for supremacy upon this debatable ground, they should be defeated, they would have had the solace of being vanquished in a fair though unequal contest. But this issue was not to be determined in this way. It was not to be settled by those peaceful and natural agencies which had heretofore determined the institutions of other States. The struggle of sections was transferred from the Capitol to Kansas, which henceforth was to be the battle ground. The power of intervention, abandoned by Congress, was taken up by Massachusetts. She, true to her traditions and her Pharisaical instincts, and with a generous oblivion of her own faults, became devoutly concerned for the welfare of distant Kansas. A new scheme of assault upon the southern States was devised. Those who had opposed the principles of the Kansas bill, now professing to accept them, determined to subvert them by a resort to what I am free to say is the most offensive and extraordinary interference of one State in the affairs of another that has marked our history. It was nothing less than, virtually, an armed invasion, under the pretext of peaceful emigration. A new pretext was invented. New England, it was said, had been imprisoned within her regions of ice and granite long enough. Their emigrations were no longer to follow the line of the lakes and of latitude. An error was suddenly discovered in the laws of emigration, and its development was found to be southwest. By a happy coincidence this new gravitation was found to point with unerring index to Kansas, and in conformity with the maxims deduced from the world's history. The march of science, of civilization, and of Christianity, has moved with steady and untiring step from the East to the West, while the wars of ambition and of conquest have carried their desolating scourge from the North to the South. Massachusetts organized that stupendous enterprise, the "Emigrant Aid Society." Its modest title implied that it was but a philanthropic friend of the poor emigrant, while, in its objects and ends, it was destined to be to Kansas what the East India Company was to the Hindoos: Its capital was $5,000,000, of which only $20,000 could be invested in Massachusetts. Its directors, resident in Massachusetts, could each have fifty votes for himself, and as many more by proxy. Sitting there, in Massachusetts, in conclave, upon the affairs of Kansas, they developed and published their plans of operation. They were to contract with some of the "competing lines of railroads" for the transportation of twenty thousand emigrants to Kansas; and while the controlling object of the society was declared to make Kansas a "free State," a keen eye was directed to "the sections of land in which the boarding houses and mills are located." I do not wish to misrepresent the objects and aims of this society, and I shall permit it to speak for itself.

"Organization, objects, and plan of operations of the Emigrant Aid Company; also, a description of Kansas, for the information of emigrants."

"Trustees—Amos A. Lawrence, Boston; J. M. S. Williams, Cambridge; Eli Thayer, Worcester."

"Treasurer—Amos A. Lawrence."

"Secretary—Thomas H. Webb, Boston."

"For the purpose of answering numerous communications concerning the plan of operations of the Emigrant Aid Company, and the resources of Kansas Territory, which it is proposed now to settle, the secretary of the company has deemed it expedient to publish the following definite information in regard to this particular:"

"For these purposes it is recommended, first, That the trustees contract immediately with some of the competing lines of travel for the conveyance of twenty thousand persons from Massachusetts to that place in the West which the trustees shall select for their first settlement."

"It is recommended that the company's agents locate and take up for the company's benefit, the sections of land in which the boarding houses and mills are located, and no others. And further, whenever the Territory shall be organized as a free State, the trustees shall dispose of all its interests there, replace by the sales the money laid out, declare a dividend to the stockholders, and that they then select a new field, and make similar arrangements for the settlement and organization of another free State of this Union."

"With the advantages attained by such a system of effort, the Territory selected as the scene of operations would, it is believed, be filled up with free inhabitants."

"There is reason to suppose several thousand men of New England origin propose to emigrate under the auspices of some such arrangement, this very summer. Of the whole emigration from Europe, amounting to some four hundred thousand persons, there can be no difficulty in inducing some thirty or forty thousand to take the same direction."

"Especially will it prove an advantage to Massachusetts, if she create the new State by her foresight, supply the necessities to its inhabitants, and open in the outset communications between their homes and her ports and factories."

"It determines in the right way the institutions of the unsettled Territories, in less time than the discussion of them has required in Congress."

It will astonish my constituents to know that the next "field" in which they were to extend their operations of manufacturing "free States" was the Indian country west of Arkansas, which they supposed half-abolitionized by the labors of northern missionaries, and the rigid test of the right of Christian communion which they have sought to apply, in exclusion of the slaveholding members of the church. To Virginia, it will be interesting to know that the person who figures as secretary of this mammoth company is one whose name is so intimately connected with the scheme of colonizing Virginia with the free labor from the North, and that the venerable mother of States is probably the next field for their operations.

How many persons were dispatched under those auspices I am not informed. That movement became the nucleus around which gathered all the elements of this newly-awakened fanaticism. The Abolition societies, the church, the universities, all affiliated in the enterprise, and contributed contingents to swell the numbers of this crusade. Every expedient was enlisted to insure its success. The church, forgetting its holy mission, preached its sanction of this sectional crusade from a thousand pulpits, and sacrilegiously commended "Sharpe's rifles" in place of the Bible, as a more potent agent in propagating their fanaticism. The press teemed everywhere with fabulous stories and wicked exaggerations of atrocities of the slave-power in Kansas, and prostituted its powers to inflame the resentments and arouse the worst passions of the people. Contributions were levied from the credulous votaries and partisans of the cause. Itinerant missionaries traversed the country, and filled the lecture-rooms with exciting harangues, while monster mass-meetings assembled, and electrified the country with the wrongs of Kansas. These were the appliances and auspices under which unnatural and forced emigration to Kansas was stimulated. It resembled more an armed invasion than a peaceful emigration; and it is quite clear that more was expected from the arms than the votes of settlers. The character of many of these immigrants was such that their removal was no loss to New England, and still less an acquisition to Kansas. I do not thus characterize all the free-State settlers of that Territory. Some were doubtless honest and orderly citizens, seeking homes and better fortunes in the West. We have been told that association is a form of enterprise common in New England, and that her history affords frequent instances of peaceful colonization in large bodies, armed for self-protection. That is true; but I know of no parallel to this most extraordinary movement. In its avowed objects and controlling features it was a war of Massachusetts against Missouri, without its responsibilities. The sequel is thus graphically portrayed in the report of the Senator from Illinois:

"When the emigrants sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri in large numbers, on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolitionize Kansas as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institutions of slavery within the limits of Missouri. These apprehensions increased and spread with the progress of events, until they became the settled convictions of the people of that portion of the State most exposed to the danger by their proximity to the Kansas border. The natural consequence was, that immediate steps were taken by the people of the western counties of Missouri to stimulate, organize, and carry into effect a system of emigration similar to that of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the avowed purpose of counteracting the effects, and protecting themselves and their domestic institutions from the consequences of that company's operations.

"The material difference in the character of the two rival and conflicting movements consists in the fact that the one had its origin in an aggressive, and the other in a defensive policy; the one was organized in pursuance of the provisions, and claiming to act under the authority of, a legislative enactment of a distant State, whose internal prosperity and domestic security did not depend upon the success of the movement; while the other was the spontaneous action of the people living in the immediate vicinity of the theater of operations, excited, by a sense of common danger, to the necessity of protecting their own firesides from the apprehended horrors of servile insurrection and intestine war. Both parties, conceiving it to be essential to the success of their respective plans that they should be upon the field of operations prior to the first election in the Territory, selected principally young men, persons unincumbered by families, and whose condition in life enabled them to leave at a moment's warning, and move with great celerity, to go at once and select and occupy the most eligible sites and favored locations in the Territory, to be held by themselves and their associates who should follow them. For the successful prosecution of such a scheme, the Missourians who lived in the immediate vicinity possessed peculiar advantages over their rivals from the more remote portions of the Union. Each family could send one of its members across the line to mark out his claim, erect a cabin, and put in a small crop, sufficient to give him as valid a right to be deemed an actual settler and qualified voter as those who were being imported by the emigrant aid societies. In an unoccupied Territory, where the lands have not been surveyed, and where there were no marks or lines to indicate the boundaries of sections and quarter sections, and where no legal title could be had until after the surveys should be made, disputes, quarrels, violence, and bloodshed might have been expected as the natural and inevitable consequences of such extraordinary systems of emigration, which divided and arrayed the settlers into two great hostile parties, each having an inducement to claim more than his right, in order to hold it for some new comer of his own party, and at the same time prevent persons belonging to the opposite party from settling in the neighborhood. As a result of this state of things, the great mass of emigrants from the Northwest and from other States, who went there on their own account, with no other object, and influenced by no other motives than to improve their condition and secure good homes for their families, were compelled to array themselves under the banner of one of these hostile parties, in order to insure protection to themselves and their claims against the aggressions and violence of the other."

And thus was introduced into Kansas that relentless strife, which, with varied incidents and details, and but short periods of repose, has continued to the present time. Through all its phases it has faithfully and consistently preserved its original and distinct features of aggressive policy on the one side, and a defensive policy on the other. It matters not in such a contest that scenes transpired, and that atrocities were committed, by rival parties which it is not fit should be detailed here. Such consequences were inevitable; and those who first provoked and excited the terrible energies of such a strife are responsible for the blows given, and for those received. The Abolition or free-State party there have never abandoned their original purpose of making Kansas a free State by every means, except an obedience to that great principle to which they now profess such devotion. They have declined to resort to the mild mode of determining the great issue by the ballot. They have refused to vote under the laws of the regular government, openly defied its authority, and denounced it as a usurpation. They formed their partisans into a secret military organization, under the captivating title of the "Kansas Legion," which extended its ramifications throughout the Territory. The avowed object of this organization was to make Kansas a free State; and to this end its members were sworn with imposing form and solemnity. This organization, introduced before the first election of a Legislature, was superseded only by the later organization of the militia, under color of law of the new Stanton Legislature. Not only is their military organization distinct, but their political association is that of separate organized factions, outside of the forms of law, and in defiance of its authority. As soon as the election of 30th March, 1855, by an overwhelming majority, installed a Legislature largely pro-slavery in its views, they renounced the ballot-box, denounced the government as a Missouri conquest, and defied its enactments. They assembled a convention at Topeka, without the sanction of law, without the authority of either territorial or Federal Government, and ordained a State constitution and government, which was to be independent of both. And this open treason, the work of mercenaries and invaders, organized into a grand secret military encampment, was set up in hostile rivalry to the lawful government established by Congress. Around this, the idol of their worship, they have rallied all their strength, and all their devotion, to maintain it. From that time they have been a separate people, acting under their own organization, hostile to the regular government, and never yielding its obedience, or participating in its administration. Can a people who have thus ostracized themselves complain of a grievance which they have taken no pains to avert? Can they complain that the constitution was never submitted for approval to those who had repudiated it in advance, and owed allegiance to its rival? Such complaisance to the rights of popular sovereignty is an instance of extreme devotion to that principle that was not expected by the Topekaites, even at the hands of Governor Walker.

The very first Legislature of the Territory, elected on the 30th March, 1855, passed a law for taking the sense of the people upon the question of forming a State government, which, by a large majority, was determined to be in favor of the proposed measure. Thus all parties coincided in the propriety of the change of government. On the 19th February, 1857, the Legislature passed a law for the calling of a convention, taking a census, and providing for a registry of all the bona fide voters of the Territory. It provided with the most anxious care and with studied impartiality in all its features, for attaining the true and final expression of the popular will, and attempted to secure the ballot against all invasion of its integrity. This law was vetoed by the Governor because it did not provide for submission of the whole constitution to the people for ratification, but was passed by the requisite majority, notwithstanding. This act pursued substantially the provisions of the Senate bill, introduced by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] had admitted to be fair in its provisions. In neither was there any provision submitting the constitution to be thus formed for popular ratification. This was at least a significant fact of the intentions of those who desired to make a constitution, and no one could be surprised by the result. In taking the registry of voters, every obstacle was interposed to defeat the execution of the law. In some counties the officers were openly resisted, or intimidated from the performance of their duty, while in others the registration of fictitious names frustrated the objects of the law. The result, after all, showed a legal registration of nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one voters in eighteen counties, while in fifteen others, believed to contain less than fifteen hundred votes, no returns were made at all. Many of these last were but geographical divisions of territory on the map, without settlements, and attached, for all civil purposes, to other more populous counties. They were, of course, omitted in the apportionment of delegates. Elections were held in all but these counties, disfranchised by their own willful act, and their legitimate right to participate in the election was thus transferred to others. The Republicans, as a party, took no part either in the registration of voters or in the election of delegates. The convention assembled and formed the constitution, republican in form, which she has presented for our consideration; and this has opened again, in another form, in all its length and breadth, that great periodical agitation which seems doomed to continue until its legitimate and inevitable consequences shall follow and terminate it forever. That convention made their work complete, and referred but the one all-engrossing subject to the people, that of domestic slavery. On the 21st of December last this vexed question was decided at an election in which all had the right to vote, and the result proclaimed to the world. It is one which puts at rest all the fabulous boasts of the countless majorities of free-State men with which a credulous public has been entertained for the last two years. The figures are brief but decisive. For slavery, 6,226, against it, 569.

And now let me briefly review the prominent objections urged against the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. They are all comprehended in the idea that it is not "the act and deed" of Kansas. Indeed, the pretension is now openly avowed, which would subordinate this entire proceeding of a people from the just rank of an act of sovereignty to a mere petition for the redress of grievances. Her past history is all explored, an inquisitorial scrutiny is instituted into her domestic affairs, and her institutions subjected to unfriendly criticism, that pretexts for her exclusion may be multiplied. This is all intervention of the most odious and offensive character in Kansas affairs. We have reserved to ourselves no such powers; Congress has expressly resigned that pretension, and conferred it on the Territories. By thus investing Kansas with the right to form her institutions, we agreed not to fashion them for her. In allowing her to form them in her "own way," we agreed not to interfere in the mode or manner in which she did so. Whence do we derive this power of going behind her constitution to adjust conflicting equities of rival parties, in an act of admission? It is claimed that there are great irregularities in the whole proceeding. That may be true, but they were such as afforded us no right to complain. We had not, as in the case of Minnesota, prescribed a mode of forming a constitution, and thus afforded a standard by which irregularities could be tested. Kansas was thus left to ordain her constitution after her own prescribed forms. If, in so doing, irregularities occurred, frauds were perpetrated, counties unrepresented or disfranchised, or injustice done to minorities they are all questions of political responsibilities between the government of Kansas and the people. In all her proceedings she acted in strict conformity to her laws, in subversion to the existing government, and in violation of no allegiance to the Federal Government. Her constitution is the work of the people in their sovereign capacity. It is the act and deed of the people, executed and authenticated according to the forms through which they speak. It is the act of the people expressed through their accredited government; and who doubts that it is in accordance with the sense of all the people who ever acknowledged allegiance to it? As an act of the people, it was final and conclusive upon us. If it is not, then there was some mental reservation in the Kansas and Nebraska act, or new doctrines have been ingrafted upon its original construction.

The objections to the constitution, in detail, are easily answered, and it shall be briefly done. It is no longer pretended that a preparatory act of Congress is essential to the right of admission of a new State. It does not alter the right of a State; it prescribes a form of proceeding which is sometimes "More honor'd in the breach, than the observance."

Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, and California, were all thus admitted; the essential requisites to legitimate such a proceeding are that it should originate with, and be conducted in, subordination to the authority of the local government, established or recognized by the Government of the United States. This was the doctrine of the Senator from Illinois; and he traces a parallel and finds a fancied resemblance between the Lecompton and Topeka constitutions. He denounces them both as revolutionary, and as attempting to set up governments independent of the local government of the Territory. For this purpose he seizes upon that section which declares that "this constitution shall take effect and be in force from and after its ratification by the people." He omits to notice the provision that suspends the convening of the Legislature, and the entrance of the State officers upon the discharge of their official duties until after the admission of the State into the Union, and that all the officers of the Government are still there and in authority. Equally untenable is that objection which has of late acquired such importance—the failure of the convention to submit the whole constitution for popular approval. This is a new phase of popular sovereignty, and a new construction of the Kansas bill. A majority of the States of the Union have been admitted under constitutions which were not so approved. Others have been submitted. No one questions their validity now. I am not aware of any necessity which requires that the people can exercise sovereignty only in one form. Their sovereign right to institute government is not sovereign after all, if they cannot exercise it in their own mode. I know of no reason which requires a constitution to be submitted more than a law, or a treaty, or any other act of the supreme power of a State. Our forms of government are representative republics, rather than popular democracies. Indeed, the representative principle pervades our whole political system. The sovereignty of the people is claimed to be inalienable, but it is quite consistent with this view, that it can be exercised by representatives and agents. Whether exercised by the people directly themselves, or in any other mode, or by any other agency, it is still the act of the people. When the people elected the convention, they invested that convention with their whole power; and when the convention ordained a constitution complete, it was the act of the people, and as binding as if submitted directly to them. When the slavery clause was submitted to, and decided by, a popular vote on the 21st of December, the last feature of the constitution was added, and the work finished. The act of the special session of the Legislature, which authorized the popular vote on the 4th of January, was a usurpation, as it employed its limited authority to contravene a previous sovereign act of the people. It could have no such right until that proposition should be disposed of by Congress.

The Senator from Illinois contends that the act of the "convention was not an exercise of sovereign power; that, inasmuch as it was convened under an act of the Legislature, it derived its whole authority from it, and possessed no more than the Legislature conferred." It would be a sufficient answer to this, that the Legislature is supreme within its just range of powers, and that the calling of this convention was "a rightful subject of legislation." But that is not all. The convention derived its authority from the people, and exercised it in their name; while the Legislature lent only the sanctions of law and authority, and prescribed the forms under which this potent voice of the people was to speak. Nor is it true that the people had no opportunity to express their wishes on the adoption of a constitution. If it is said that a large number of counties were disfranchised, I answer that their inhabitants defied and frustrated the law, and willfully refused to exercise their rights. If it is said that they were unrepresented in the convention, I answer that they voluntarily excluded themselves from the apportionment by failing to return a census. Whatever may be said of these preliminary steps, it need not be said that, on the 21st of December, they had no opportunity to vote. The convention had submitted the slavery question to a direct vote of the people, and the whole people. Congress had referred that subject to the people of the Territories to settle in their own way, and now they determined upon a direct appeal to the people. It had been claimed that the free-State men were in an overwhelming majority. Here was an opportunity to test it, and finally measure strength with their rivals. Census and registration laws were now like things of the past, and every one was invited to the polls. Executive proclamations and manifestoes were put forth, imploring the Republicans to vote. At one time they were told that the convention would be legal, and its action final, and asked to participate in its election. Governor Walker committed the grave error of supposing that he spoke for the Congress of the United States, in assuring them that the whole constitution should be submitted to a vote of the whole people; or if not, it would and ought to be rejected by Congress. The adherents of Topeka neither trusted his assurances nor acted upon them. They voted neither upon the election of delegates nor upon the slavery question. They abdicated their share in the government, and thus authorized the voting majority to speak for them. They were neither deceived nor surprised by the result. It was what they both anticipated and desired.

A kindred objection—one belonging to the same class of which I have been speaking—is the wholesale charge of fraud, which is alleged against all the proceedings of Kansas. It is not to be denied, it will not be questioned here, that frauds, atrocities, and irregularities have been perpetrated on both sides. It would be strange, indeed, if it were not so. Could it be expected that a Territory, thus harassed and vexed with internecine strife, often on the very verge of revolution, and always in a terrible conflict between excited parties, would not have presented irregularities in the form in which its laws were administered? It would be hopeless to expect that kind of absolute fairness and perfect impartiality which might be hoped for under a different state of circumstances. Here were elections decided in the short intervals of peace, during short periods of truce between contending parties; and Senators expect, and gravely contend here, that parties are to cease a bloody strife and conduct elections with perfect integrity and a strict observance of all the nice forms of law! Irregularities were inevitable; and I am only surprised that so few have been manifested and proved. Doubtless there were frauds on both sides. It is said there were frauds at the Delaware Crossing, at Shawnee, at Kickapoo, and at other places. Have the proceedings on the opposite side escaped all suspicion and all reproach of that kind? How do Senators account for the significant disparity between the votes for different classes of officers at Lawrence, and for the magnitude of the vote at Leavenworth, that swelled so suddenly? The inevitable result of the state of things which prevailed in Kansas led to frauds in Kansas. I have no doubt of it. The pro-slavery party there, however, are the party who sustain the cause of law and order in that Territory. If they have learned the tactics of their enemies and turned their own weapons against them, the pro-slavery men were not the first to provoke that contest, or to inaugurate that condition of things. If, in a disreputable contest of that kind, the party who have lived outside of the pale of the law have been beaten by their own weapons, it does not lie in their mouths to complain of it as an act of injustice to them.

But, sir, I may remark of this objection, as of the former, what power have we over it? Whence do we derive the power to investigate election frauds in Kansas? Some of those which have become the subject of so much criticism relate to the election of State officers and members of the State Legislature—a matter which the Constitution has placed beyond our reach. The Legislature of Kansas, like every legislative body, can inquire into frauds and irregularities affecting the election of its members. It is the only proper judge of that question. It would be a monstrous pretension and usurpation of authority here, to contend that these local matters are to be decided by the Congress of the United States, and that, too, while we are performing the elevated constitutional duty of inducting a sovereign member into the Confederacy of States.

Mr. President, it is a little curious to notice the development of the different phases of this question. Those who opposed the extension of the Missouri line in 1850, were its strenuous advocates when it was proposed to repeal it in 1854. Those who then thought that the people should receive their institutions ready formed to their hands by Congress, are now loyal to the opposite extreme of popular sovereignty. The Republicans in Kansas decline the opportunity to right their fancied wrongs on the 21st of December; but two weeks after vote against the whole constitution. They denounce slavery in Kansas, yet refuse to vote it away. They declaim against their government as a Missouri usurpation, yet vote down the State government which was to supersede it; and thus continue the territorial condition where slavery has a constitutional existence. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that, with them, there is no purpose to settle this issue, but to keep it open as long as it can influence the passions or feed the excitement of fanaticism.

Another argument, which has, in turn, been enlisted to serve a purpose, is that which prescribes the mode of amending the constitution. It is worth while to give the exact language of this disputed clause. It is contained in the schedule, and provides that—

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention, and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall at its next regular session call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose Representatives; said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

This, it is said, is a prohibition of all amendment before the year 1864. Sometimes it has been used as one of the facts arrayed to show a disposition upon the part of its framers unfairly to place their work beyond the reach of reform or innovation, as they at the same time declined to submit the entire constitution for popular approval. The Senator from Illinois, in his minority report, attempts to prove that this provision is a prohibition of all amendment, except in that mode which is "revolution if successful, and rebellion in case of failure." He knows no means by which that "overwhelming" and fabulous majority of ten thousand free-State men can assert their right, except by the "terrible right of revolution;" and argues that the President holds out delusive hopes of a reform or change in the constitution by suggesting a resort to an impracticable scheme. It is to be wished that this provision had the virtue which has been ascribed to it. It would be but a reasonable regulation, and, at most, but a short postponement of the great right of peaceful and lawful revolution. Many of the older and earlier constitutions, springing from a period convulsed by the throes of the Revolution, or molded under the auspices of men whose patriotism has been elevated above either reproach or suspicion, contained either similar provisions or maintained significant silence upon the subject. The time has been when stability of government and of law was considered no mean virtue in our institutions, and when the organic law of States was exempt from the sudden caprices, and ruthless innovations by which the institutions of to-day are marred or unmade on to-morrow. The time has been when these attempts, futile though they often were, to lend a short life to organic law, were respected, and the constitutions which contained them were deemed and accepted as republican in form. But whether such specific provisions, either regulating or partially limiting the inherent right of altering or abolishing forms of government, be void or valid, it is evident that they never seriously stood in the way of change when the people, acting under the forms of law, have willed it. The President, in his message, has referred to the great State of New York, now governed under the new constitution made in direct opposition to the form prescribed by its predecessor. The State of Rhode Island, until quite a recent period in her history, had remained under the government of a royal charter, which, I am informed, contained no provision for its own amendment. Under it the people lived and prospered, bore their part in the Revolution, and acceded to the Union. Yet this old charter, venerable for its antiquity, if not respectable for its wisdom, was finally superseded when the ideas and necessities of a later progress had outgrown its capacity for good government. The States of Ohio and Indiana contained prohibitions respectively against amendment, the first for twelve, and the second for ten years; yet the latter was changed within the prohibited period, and all of them in pursuance of a form prescribed by law, and without a resort to the "terrible right of revolution." Indeed, in the past history of our State constitutions, they have probably too often illustrated the views of the President in his late message, that the people "can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure," and that "the will of the majority is supreme and irresistible when expressed in an orderly and lawful manner."

The chairman of the Committee on Territories, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] in his report of March 12, 1856, on the affairs of Kansas, in reviewing the history of such of the States as had formed constitutions without the previous authority of Congress, redeems them all from illegitimacy by the assurance that, "in every instance, the proceeding has originated with, and been conducted in subordination to, the local government. Attorney General Butler, in the case of the admission of Arkansas, justifies the proceeding of the Territory in forming a constitution, without the previous assent of Congress, on the ground that such measures be commenced and prosecuted in a peaceable manner, and in strict subordination to the existing territorial government." These were all instances of a change from territorial to State government; but the principle extracted from them illustrates the efficacy of every appeal for a change of government to the sovereignty of the people, when prosecuted under the forms of law and in subordination to the existing government. These modes of changing constitutions, so familiar in our political history, can solve the problem and relieve the Senator's doubts, and enable the people of Kansas to know "how they are to exercise that great indefeasible right," of which the President speaks when he says "they can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure." The free-State party, so lately denounced by Governor Walker as "insurgents," seem to have a keener appreciation of their "inalienable rights" than the President, and their practical attempts to assert them have gone far beyond the suggestions in his message. In their hot haste to reverse the lawful decision of the people on the 21st December, and inaugurate "a reign of terror," they anticipated and outstripped the views of the President. They did not await the action of the State Legislature, after admission into the Union, to inaugurate proceedings for a change of the constitution, but attempted to accomplish it by a surprise, in a Legislature called for a specific purpose, precipitated into a premature birth by one

Governor, and betrayed into their hands by the extraordinary action of the other. If it be true that the partisans of a free State have this "overwhelming majority," no barrier in the constitution, no safeguards protecting the rights of property will long restrain them in their mad career. Frenzied by their first taste of power, they have, during the short life of their called session, economized the opportunity, and perpetrated the greatest amount of mischief in the shortest period of time.

The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Vermont, arriving at the same result by a different form of logic, yet find themselves in happy accord upon the peaceful results and redeeming virtues of the October election. The Senator from Illinois says, "that from the day on which the members elected in October assembled and organized as a legislative body, all the opponents of the Lecompton constitution have recognized the government as valid and legitimate, acknowledging their allegiance to it, and their determination and duty to sustain and support it." The Senator from Vermont says, "that the people of that Territory, in the late territorial election, have reclaimed their rights, and that territorial government is, for the first time, now moving peaceably on in its legitimate sphere." Their first act was to attempt to defeat the Lecompton constitution, formed under the auspices and authority of the territorial government, and to inaugurate a new convention; and that is called "acknowledging their allegiance to the territorial government, and their determination and duty to sustain it." What a wonderful magic in this October election! Men who had been arrayed in armed hostility and open rebellion against the territorial government for years, while in a minority, succeeding at last in installing themselves in power, are suddenly transformed into peaceful citizens and loyal partisans of the territorial government, acknowledging their "allegiance" to themselves! Their second act was to organize the armed militia of their partisans, and place them under the control of a reckless adventurer and ruthless agitator; under whom, as we are informed, a systematic persecution, by murder, confiscation, and plunder, of the pro-slavery party prevails, before which pale the atrocities of the Danites of Utah. And this is called "moving peaceably on in its legitimate sphere of promised freedom." Should this process of extermination and exile, which is fast depopulating the Territory, continue, there will be but little difficulty in altering the constitution. They will soon attain that condition "where the public sentiment in favor of change is unanimous, or approaches so closely to unanimity as to silence all opposition;" and in such case, the Senator from Illinois admits that "constitutions and governments have been changed without violence or bloodshed." The people, says the President, "can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure;" can any one doubt that "at least it is so in" Kansas?

But, Mr. President, if it belongs to us in our limited sphere to go behind the constitution, and look at the motives of the men who framed it; if it is permitted to us to weigh the considerations which, in a vexed and protracted struggle to restore peace and order to a distracted country, may have counted with the members of the convention, is it fair to denounce, as a fraud and a grievance, the attempt, if such it was, to give a short-lived vitality of six years to the work which they were doing? What real or imaginary grievance was there that could not be endured for that short period? Was it a vice in the constitution that it proposed, at least a short truce to the conflict which had made the land a desert and the government an anarchy? If it was believed that this provision of the schedule was intended to infringe, to qualify, or invade the fundamental principles declared in their bill of rights, it was but a proposition of peace tendered to the people at a time when it was unknown which party would prevail in the final decision of the great question submitted to them; and whichever might be the victor in the contest, it proposed a short acquiescence of the vanquished in the result.

Mr. President, undue importance has been ascribed to this feature in the constitution of Kansas. It will figure far more here than there. If it does not, it will not be for want of the promptings which emanate from this great metropolis of agitation, inviting strife and revolution, and sounding the notes which are echoed in every nook and corner of the Union. Does any one undertake here to say that this is a just cause of complaint there? It has been truly said that those who preach to the world of its misgovernment will find many listeners; but is it not a gratuitous patriotism which invents grievances for those who never feel them? Will this constitutional restriction stand one moment in the way of those who wish to overcome it? Will this great faction, whose numbers of late have swelled with such wonderful development—whose past history affords no instance where it has scrupled at the means where the end was to be attained—hesitate to overleap this feeble restraint? No. Those who are in open array and in armed defiance of the whole authority of the constitution will not stop to criticise an obnoxious feature of it. Those who desire the restoration of peace, the reign of order, and the supremacy of law, will not complain; while those who would perpetuate this anarchy and make the strife immortal, would soon overcome this frail barrier.

In the remarks which I have just made, I have treated this clause in the constitution as if it was a restriction imposed by the people on themselves, and a suspension of the general right of amendment to the constitution until the year 1864. There are certain fundamental principles of American organic law, which I hope and trust are, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable. There are other provisions which find a place in our constitutions which should be subjected to change and reform when the will of the people, duly expressed, demands it. This great and universal principle of American organic law is contained in the bill of rights. It declares "that all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have, at all times, an inherent and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper." This is one of those fundamental principles of which I have said that they should be eternal. It is a logical necessity of our form of government. If it is wrong, then representative and republican governments are wrong. This right is essential to self-government; and while I would deprecate a too frequent resort to its exercise, and would always limit that, in subordination to the forms of law, yet it is one which is first in importance, and it is better that it should be subject to abuse than to limitation. This right is theirs to exercise "at all times," and cannot be postponed or suspended for a moment. If it can be suspended for a period, it can be indefinitely postponed; and thus constitutions would be perpetual, and forms of government immortal. If this language of the constitution is hostile to, or inconsistent with, the bill of rights, it must to that extent yield to its superior authority. This is one of those original and reserved rights of the people, not delegated or alienated by the people, neither surrendered nor suspended, but withheld from the grant which makes up the just powers of government, and which are enumerated in the Constitution. In this contest for supremacy between reserved rights and delegated power, it is easy to determine which is the higher and which the subordinate law.

I hold, however, that there is no real hostility between these provisions. The conflict is more plausible than real. The one is the declaration of a great principle of American fundamental law, the other the mere regulation of the "manner" of the exercise of this right. Indeed, the latter clause does not form any part of the constitution, but is one of the articles of the "schedule" which provides against the inconveniences arising from a change of government. It finds no place in, and forms no part of the constitution, the great charter, prescribing the powers of government, and regulating their exercise. The right to alter the constitution "in such manner as they may think proper," is one of the rights retained to the people; and this so much condemned clause of the schedule only prescribes that manner after the year 1864. Until then, the right is untrammelled, and without prescribed form for its exercise. After that time, I agree that the Senator from Illinois may be right in stating the judicial rule of interpretation "that when a constitution prescribes one mode of amendment, it must be understood and construed as having thereby precluded all other modes, and prohibited all other means of accomplishing the same object." Suppose, however, some other peaceable mode of change be successfully adopted: is not the constitution thus adopted the supreme law of the land, and are our constitutions, thus adopted, legitimate governments or successful revolutions? It is not for us to express controlling views to solve this problem. In admitting Kansas as a State, we trust her to her own destinies, and accomplish our whole duty.

Mr. POLK obtained the floor.

Mr. MASON. I am perfectly aware of the great importance of getting through with this question; but the honorable Senator who has just risen has newly come among us, and I presume it would not be agreeable to him to begin almost his first speech in this body at this late hour of the day. Knowing that he would take the floor, I took the liberty of conferring with him on the subject, and I am disposed to think that it would be more agreeable to him to speak to-morrow. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this question until to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I beg to suggest that the time for the consideration of this subject is very short; and if honorable gentlemen on this side of the Chamber are the first to propose adjournments and postponements when their friends are ready to go on, they will have no right to complain of the course which may be taken by gentlemen on the other side. Unless the Senator from Missouri, exercising the right which, I believe, has been exercised several times on the other side, shall himself urge us to defer the consideration of this subject, so that he may be heard to-morrow, I shall feel bound to vote against the postponement. I hope the bill will not be postponed; but if he requests that it shall be, in order that he may be heard to-morrow, I shall ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to the consideration of executive business; on the contrary, I shall cheerfully concur in that; but I protest against its being left to the honorable Senator from Missouri to decide whether he shall speak now or to-morrow. I think, as I have already said, that it would be more agreeable to him to go on to-morrow, and I think Senators would prefer to hear him then.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to submit a motion, by general consent, that from and after to-morrow we take a recess daily from four o'clock to six o'clock until this question be disposed of. We want to close it next week; and if we do, I believe it will be necessary to take a recess every day until we get rid of it. I cannot submit the motion for a recess, I know, unless by general consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I give notice that I shall make the motion to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present motion is to postpone the further consideration of the bill before the Senate until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. STUART. I hope it will be allowed to go over as the unfinished business, to come up at one o'clock to-morrow. We should have time to dispose of our morning business. If we assign this bill for half past twelve o'clock, it may produce confusion, and there is scarcely a day when we have a quorum at that early hour.

Mr. GREEN. I am very anxious to afford the largest latitude to debate on this question, for it is the great question. This morning, out of courtesy, and for the purpose of getting through certain matters before the Senate, I permitted it to go over, and lost about half an hour; and I want to get that half hour back. I therefore insist on the postponement of the subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I shall be glad to see the Senator get the half hour back in any proper way; but I think we shall gain nothing, while we shall interfere largely with business, by undertaking to fix this subject for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow. I therefore trust that the Senator will yield to the suggestion, and let it pass over as the unfinished business.

Mr. POLK. Of course, I am disposed to conform myself, in all my action in the Senate, as far as I may be able to do so, to the wishes of the body. I would prefer not to go on this afternoon, and I state that, especially, because it has just been suggested to me by another gentleman that there is a Senator who is willing to go on this afternoon—the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not know that I shall make any speech, now or at any time.

Mr. POLK. I mean your colleague.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not wish to go on. I do not care to speak. I do not know that I shall have one word to say on the question. I am ready for the vote, I am sure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to postpone the further consideration of this subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope this question will be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock. If there is any important business under consideration before half past twelve o'clock, I suppose this question can go over until one o'clock, by the consent of the Senate. But I have sat here, listening to the speeches that have been made, as I have done to all the gentlemen who have spoken on this question; and I dislike to remain here five or six hours during the day, for the purpose of hearing more than two gentlemen speak on the same day. I have listened attentively to the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Arkansas; and I think we have had speeches enough to-day. I am very willing to vote to proceed to the consideration of this question to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have paired off with the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Foster, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Yulee—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, and it was agreed to.

So the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. R. ECKARD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] was entitled to the floor.

EXCUSED FROM SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. MASON. I ask the House to be excused from further service upon the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I trust the House will not allow the gentleman to be excused. The gentleman is too valuable a member to be excused.

Mr. MASON. I do not wish to take up the time of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS.] But, sir, it is impossible for me to discharge properly the duties appertaining to that committee. There is no law regulating the number or compensation of the employés of the House, and it is not consistent with the knowledge which that committee has on the subject, without any law, without an order with respect to the accounts presented, to pass upon them. Although there are complaints made against the late Clerk of the House of Representatives for extravagance, the employés of the present House are exceeding, both in expense and numbers, those of any former House. The House has refused to regulate them by law, and it is impossible for us to tell what should and what should not be sanctioned. I do not make the request from any feeling which I have on the subject.

Let me state further: the late Clerk of the House is now here with a committee of investigation into frauds and corruptions connected with his affairs. That committee, as I understand it, is about bringing its labors to a close. We have returned from that committee accounts to the amount of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars. They are presented to the Committee of Accounts to be audited. We do not know whether they ought to be passed or not. He has a right to have these accounts settled immediately. He has been detained here a long time already, and he wants to settle his whole affairs without further delay. These accounts, as I have stated, come before the Committee of Accounts for settlement. We have not the confidence of the House, and we do not want to take the responsibility, in the face of this state of things, to pass upon these accounts. They show far more extravagance than we have heretofore had.

Now, sir, I think these accounts should be referred to a new committee. The House has the right to command its committee. The committee should act in accordance with the wishes of a majority of the House. The House has the right to have a committee which shall act in accordance with its wishes, and it is due to the House, therefore, that a new committee should be appointed.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to know whether this debate will come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that point when it shall arise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion. I will not take more than a minute.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. If this debate is to come out of the time of the gentleman from Iowa, he has the right to interrupt it and assume the floor at any time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose, as the gentleman from Kentucky had the floor by unanimous consent, of course it does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LETCHER. Of course it does not.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not yet heard the decision of the Speaker upon that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that, inasmuch as the gentleman from Kentucky was permitted to submit his motion by unanimous consent, it will not come out of the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was about to submit to the gentleman from Kentucky that he withdraw his application for the present, and that on Monday, if he can get the floor, he make the motion that the bill the other day referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be taken up for the purpose of settling the compensation and number of the employés in the offices of the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House. I appreciate the condition of the Committee of Accounts. Their duties must be very annoying and troublesome. It is almost impossible for them to discharge their duties when there is an absence of law regulating the powers of the heads of these bureaus—if I may so style them—as to the number of appointees they may have, and as to the amount of compensation their appointees shall receive. The committee ought to have some law to guide them; and it does appear to me that the House could do no less than to say how many appointments the Doorkeeper, the Clerk, and the Postmaster, respectively, shall have, and the compensation that each shall be entitled to. Now, I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky, I appeal to the members of the Committee of Accounts, who, I am sure, must be embarrassed, because of the confusion which necessarily grows out of the fact that there is no law regulating this subject, when there should be a law—I say I appeal to them to let this matter rest until they can get an opportunity to ask the sense of the House upon the question of regulating the matter by law.

Mr. FLORENCE. If I understand the request made by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, it has no reference to any present purpose.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I object to all this debate, if it is out of order. There is no question before the House, but the simple application of a member to be excused from serving on a committee.

The SPEAKER. A motion is pending to excuse a member.

Mr. FLORENCE. I was about to say that the chairman of the Committee of Accounts does not ask to be relieved because of any difficulty under the present arrangement of the employes of the House. I understood him to say that the difficulty existed in settling the accounts of the late Clerk; and hence I do not understand the relevancy of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not responsible for my friend's understanding; for the gentleman from Kentucky did make the statement.

Mr. FLORENCE. I remarked that I did not so understand him, and upon that I erected my superstructure; and a pretty good corner-stone I think it is.

Mr. MASON. I say, then, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he totally misunderstood me, if he understood me to say that the difficulty did not have reference to the law.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman stated that the accounts of the late Clerk imposed upon them labors which they could not undergo.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then the gentleman went on to say that, until the matter of the employes of this House was regulated by law, they could not understand exactly where they stood; and that, until the House chose to regulate their number and compensation by law, he was not disposed to remain upon the committee. My understanding is, that there is a certain fixed number of persons under the rules or law of the House; and I understand that the Committee of Accounts have the entire control of the employes, except those authorized by law, and that they have exercised that power; and the gentleman has, I think, reflected upon the judgment of this House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a question of order. I ask if this debate, in reference to the number of employes of this House, is in order upon this application to be excused from serving upon a committee?

Mr. FLORENCE. I think myself it is not; but as the gentleman from Alabama went into that subject, I thought I could follow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not think it is in order; but let me go on in reply to the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot proceed except in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am very much troubled, then, how to go on. [Laughter.] I thought the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] opened up this whole debate, and I thought I could travel after him. If I cannot, the gentleman from Alabama could, and I thought I might travel after him.

The chairman of the Committee of Accounts desires to be relieved from the arduous duties of that committee, because the number of employes is not regulated by law; and he says that unless the House does fix the number and their compensation, he does not know exactly how to act in reference to those now employed. I say it was a reflection upon the judgment of the House which did not choose to act upon the subject when it was submitted to them by the Committee of Accounts, but took upon themselves the responsibility to which they are entitled, to put the matter off for investigation in order that they might arrive at a correct conclusion. They postponed it because the proposition submitted by the committee did not meet the approbation of the House, and did not harmonize with their sentiments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I do not want to say anything more. I did not intend to interpose any objection to the withdrawal of the gentleman from the Committee of Accounts. I desired simply to urge an objection which I thought ought to be urged against the conclusions of the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish simply to state that I shall vote against excusing the honorable gentleman from Kentucky from serving upon the Committee of Accounts. It is a very important committee, one which stands at the very door of the Treasury; one which supervises the expenditures of this House, and regulates its contingent fund; a committee of exceeding responsibility, and I know of no member of this House who is better qualified for the arduous and responsible duties of that committee than the gentleman from Kentucky; and the very reason which the gentleman assigns as a reason why he should be excused, operates upon my mind directly adverse to the object he has in view.

In reference to the matter of the accounts of the late Clerk, it will be recollected that when the committee was raised, it was stated explicitly upon the floor that it was not intended to supersede the action of the Committee of Accounts. It could not have that effect, because it was necessary that those accounts should pass that Committee of Accounts before they can be audited at the Treasury.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. It is, that the gentleman from Tennessee cannot argue the facts connected with the accounts of the late Clerk, upon the motion of my colleague to be excused from service upon a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit to the ruling of the Chair with cheerfulness. I therefore conclude what I have to say by remarking that I must dissent from granting the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. I call for the previous question.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman withdraw the call for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will for the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. The chairman of the select committee [Mr. MAYNARD] upon the accounts of the late Clerk, misunderstood me, if he understood me as disposed to shrink from an examination of those accounts.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not so understand the gentleman at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are hardly in order.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], in stating his understanding of the question, totally misunderstood what I had stated in reference to the whole affair. He says that I cast some slur upon the House for not passing our bill. I do nothing and ask for nothing except for practical action on this subject. I stated that when these large accounts of the late Clerk were before the committee, a part of the committee refused to act. Now, either the Committee of Accounts have to govern the employes of the House, or the employes have to govern the committee.

I will state one fact in connection with this matter. After the vote of the House, the other day, the arrangements of the folding-room were changed back to what they were before the committee ordered an alteration to be made. A member of the committee told you, the other day, that the whole amount for the expenditures of the folding-room of the House for the year had been already thrown away or given away.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky is taking too much latitude.

Mr. MASON. I will only say, then, that one of the employes in the folding-room told us, "we have beaten you in the House, and we will change the arrangements of the folding-room back to what they were before you interfered." Now, they must be under our guidance, or we under theirs. Unless the House take this matter under their direction, it is impossible for the Committee of Accounts to protect the contingent fund of the House, or to perform their duties in a manner satisfactory to themselves or to the country.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What would be the effect of a motion to lay the pending motion on the table? It would leave the gentleman from Kentucky still in the committee, would it not?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am satisfied that the public interests require that the gentleman should remain where he is; and I therefore move to lay the motion to excuse the gentleman upon the table.

Mr. RUFFIN. I hope my colleague will withdraw that motion until I can make an explanation, as I am a member of the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. RUFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee of Accounts, I wish to say a few words in explanation of my course, and but a few. I have sought the floor ever since its action upon this question, with a view of asking the House to excuse me from service on that committee. I notified the House, in the few remarks which I submitted in the discussion of the bill proposed by the chairman of the committee, that I should not go into that committee room, and serve in the dark; that I was not going to compromise my character by passing accounts when I did not know whether they were just or unjust; that we did not know how many lawful officers there were about this House; that some had been appointed in one way and some in another; that we had to send our clerk to hunt through the Journals of the House for the last fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, to know whether this officer or that officer was employed under authority of law; and that we asked the House to fix the number of its officers. I cared nothing about the compensation. I felt no particular attachment to that portion of the bill. But we asked the House to fix the number of officers and the compensation they were to receive, and to let the committee know what they were to do. Since that day I have not been into the committee room, and I do not mean to go there again until this matter is fixed by law. I intend to ask the House to excuse me from further service on that committee, and I expect the House will excuse me; but if not, I do not intend to go into the committee room again. I am on another important committee, the Committee on Public Lands, and I shall go there and try to do my duty to my constituents and to the country. When I was appointed on the Committee of Accounts, I went into the committee room with the intention of doing my whole duty, and I have done it. I have neglected the business of my constituents in the Departments and elsewhere, to go, morning after morning, into this committee room, and on Saturdays, when the House has adjourned over, I have gone into the folding-room.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman shall confine his remarks to the propriety of excusing the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. RUFFIN. I am doing so.

The SPEAKER. The question is, whether the gentleman from Kentucky shall be excused?

Mr. RUFFIN. Well, I was arguing that the gentleman from Kentucky should be excused. I have never known an instance in which the House has refused to excuse a member who asked to be excused, and I think that the gentleman from Kentucky has given ample and sufficient reasons why he should be excused. So far as I am concerned, I have been willing to investigate all the accounts that might be sent before the committee, if the House would place the matter, by law, upon a proper footing, and let us know what we are to do hereafter.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does he know of any other gentleman in this House who would do better upon that committee than the gentleman from Kentucky and himself?

Mr. RUFFIN. I presume, as the House takes one view of this matter, and the gentleman from Kentucky and myself take another view of it, that it is right that the House should have gentlemen upon that committee representing its views. I have never been in the habit of auditing accounts in this loose way, and no account shall ever be passed by me unless I know something about it. And whether the House excuse me or not, I do not expect to go into that committee-room again.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if a member of a committee, after the House has refused to excuse him, should refuse to act on that committee, he could not be sent to jail under the previous question for a contempt of the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. I call the previous question upon the motion to excuse my colleague.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to excuse Mr. Mason.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochran, Cornuz, Cox, James Craig, Curtis, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Durfee, Elliott, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Garrett, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, J. Morrison, Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hickman, Hoard, Houston, Hughes, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leach, Lecky, Leiter, Letcher, Loveloy, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, George Taylor, Underwood, Waldron, Ward, Warren, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Bliss, Bocock, Braxton, Burns, Campbell, Clawson, Clingman, Cobb, Cockerill, Coffax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, English, Farnsworth, Foley, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Knapp, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Murray, Olin, Potter, Powell, Reagan, Robbins, Royce, Scott, Seward, John Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wood, and Zollicoffer—77.

So Mr. Mason was excused.

Pending the vote,

Mr. DOWDELL stated that his colleague, Mr. Moore, was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. CURTIS took the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to allow me the floor to introduce a bill for reference?

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but I feel it my duty to proceed.

Mr. RUFFIN. I rise to a privileged question. I move to be excused from serving on the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a privileged question, or a question of privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to have a motion entered, and that is to reconsider the vote just taken. I shall not ask action on it now.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor; but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] has the right to have his motion entered.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to allow me to present a report from the select committee to whom the Lecompton constitution was referred. I will state that it is not my object to ask to have it acted on to-day; but I simply wish to present the report, and to ask to have it printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is not my object to have the report acted on to-day; but I intend to move to postpone its consideration to a particular day.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to this debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I give notice, as the report has been ready for a week past, that I shall have it printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object to the presentation of this report, unless it comes regularly in order on a call of special committees for reports.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And perhaps special committees may not be called in two months. I will take the responsibility myself of having it printed and sent before the country.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

BILL TO RAISE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to be permitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Curtis] to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs this question in reference to this bill: whether, if the House devote the whole of this day to its consideration, it will probably be disposed of to-day?

Mr. MORGAN. I object to all this conversation, and all this discussion; and I ask for the regular order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I suppose that, with the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I have a right to ask the question.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I owe it to myself and to the House, before going into the advocacy of this bill, to show, as I hope to do, that there is occasion for an increase of the Army of the United States. So far from desiring, however, to increase the permanent force of the country, I am ready to meet that question whenever it comes up. As one of the Committee on Military Affairs, I believe that there is no occasion for an increase of the regular Army of the United States, unless there be, as I think there is, actual rebellion and war in the country, calling for some adequate force to meet and repel it.

In considering the bill before us, I shall, in the first place, undertake to show that the Mormon rebellion is a serious, imposing, and terrible offense against the law, and that it needs repulsive measures. On that basis, and on that alone, I advocate the passage of the bill now before the House. In the second place, I shall undertake to show what kind and what amount of force is necessary for the occasion.

What is the condition of this Mormon rebellion? I think that the House should, in justice to itself, in justice to the country, in justice to the Mormons, present the evidence against the Mormons for the purpose of showing that they are now in hostility against this Government, and that, therefore, there is a necessity for sending troops against them.

Gentlemen will look over the history of the last six months they will see that about the 1st of August last one of our agents, Captain Van Vliet, of the United States Army, was sent to Utah for the purpose of buying stores for the Army going in that direction. What was the reply that he received from the Mormons? He was told in substance, by Brigham Young, the acting Governor, that they should not come into the valley; that no officer should take his position; that his power was supreme, and that he put this Government at defiance. Captain Van Vliet, in the most courteous and kind terms, told him that it was not the design of the Army of the United States to make war against Utah or his people; but that they came, on the contrary, to establish the law and the constitutional rights of the Government. On that ground he placed the advance of the Army towards Utah. But he was replied to in terms, not to be misunderstood, that this Army should not come to Salt Lake valley; that they would be resisted to the last extremity. This acting Governor of Utah placed himself on the ground that his power was supreme, and that the Government of the United States could not displace it. In a few weeks after that he commenced to rally a force—a military force, not a civil one. This was the condition of things in August. In September we find that he has raised an army and placed it under the command of a lieutenant general, and sent his proclamation by that commander—wearing the insignia of his rank—intimating distinctly that he was prepared for war, not for civil measures. This was in September last. I ought to read here the proclamation of Brigham Young and the report of Captain Van Vliet. They are as follows:

HAM'S FORK, September 16, 1857.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to report, for the information of the commanding general, the result of my trip to the Territory of Utah.

In obedience to special instructions, dated headquarters Army for Utah, Fort Leavenworth, July 28, 1857, I left Fort Leavenworth July 30, and reached Fort Kearney in nine, traveling days, Fort Laramie in ten, and Great Salt Lake City in thirty-three and a half. At Fort Kearney I was detained one day by the changes I had to make, and by sickness, and at Fort Laramie three days, as all the animals were forty miles from the post, and when brought in all had to be shod before they could take the road.

I traveled as rapidly as it is possible to do with six mule wagons; several of my teams broke down, and at least half of my animals are unserviceable, and will remain so until they recruit. During my progress towards Utah I met many people from that Territory, and also several mountain men, at Green river, and all informed me that I would not be allowed to enter Utah, and if I did I would run a great risk of losing my life: I treated all this, however, as idle talk, but it induced me to leave my wagons and escort at Ham's fork, one hundred and forty-three miles this side of the city, and proceed alone.

I reached Great Salt Lake City without molestation, and immediately upon my arrival I informed Governor Brigham Young that I desired an interview, which he appointed for the next day. On the evening of the day of my arrival, Governor Young with many of the leading men of the city, called upon me at my quarters. The Governor received me most cordially, and treated me during my stay, which continued some six days, with the greatest hospitality and kindness. In this interview the Governor made known to me his views with regard to the approach of the United States troops, in plain and unmistakable language.

He stated that the Mormons had been persecuted, murdered, and robbed in Missouri and Illinois, both by the mob and State authorities, and that now the United States were about to pursue the same course; and that, therefore, he and the people of Utah had determined to resist all persecution at the commencement, and that the troops now on the march for Utah should not enter the Great Salt Lake valley; as he uttered these words, all there present concurred most heartily in what he said.

The next day, as agreed upon, I called upon the Governor, and delivered in person the letters with which I had been intrusted.

In that interview, and in several subsequent ones, the same determination to resist to the death the entrance of the troops into the valley was expressed by Governor Young and those about him. The Governor informed me that there was abundance of everything I required for the troops, such as lumber, forage, &c., but that none would be sold to us.

In the course of my conversations with the Governor and the influential men in the Territory, I told them plainly and frankly what I conceived would be the result of their present course; I told them that they might prevent the small military force now approaching Utah from getting through the narrow defiles and rugged passes of the mountains this year, but that next season the United States Government would send troops sufficient to overcome all opposition. The answer to this was invariably the same. "We are aware that such will be the case; but when those troops arrive they will find Utah a desert; every house will be burned to the ground, every tree cut down, and every field laid waste. We have three years' provisions on hand, which we will 'cache,' and then take to the mountains and bid defiance to all the powers of the Government."

I attended their services on Sunday, and, in the course of a sermon delivered by Elder Taylor, he referred to the approach of the troops, and declared they should not enter the Territory. He then referred to the probability of an overwhelming force being sent against them, and desired all present who would apply the torch to their own buildings, cut down their trees, and lay waste their fields, to hold up their hands; every hand in an audience numbering over four thousand persons, was raised at the same moment. During my stay in the city I visited several families, and all with whom I was thrown looked upon the present movement of the troops towards their Territory as the commencement of another religious persecution, and expressed a fixed determination to sustain Governor Young in any measures he might adopt.

From all these facts I am forced to the conclusion that Governor Young and the people of Utah will prevent, if possible, the army from entering their Territory this season. This, in my opinion, will not be a difficult task, owing to the lateness of the season, the smallness of our force, and the defenses that nature has thrown around the valley of the Great Salt Lake.

There is but one road running into the valley on the side which our troops are approaching, and for over fifty miles it passes through narrow cañons and over rugged mountains, which a small force could hold against great odds. I am inclined, however, to believe that the Mormons will not resort to actual hostilities until the last moment. Their plan of operation will be, burn the grass, cut up the roads, and stampede the animals, so as to delay the troops until snow commences to fall, which will render the road impassable. Snow falls early in this region; in fact, last night it commenced falling at Fort Bridger, and this morning the surrounding mountains are clothed in white. Were it one month earlier in the season, I believe the troops could force their way in, and they may be able to do so even now; but the attempt will be fraught with considerable danger, arising from the filling up of the cañons and passes with snow.

I do not wish to be considered that I am advocating either the one course or the other; I simply wish to lay the facts before the general, leaving it to his better judgment to decide upon the proper movements.

Notwithstanding my inability to make the purchases I was ordered to, and all that Governor Young said in regard to opposing the entrance of the troops into the valley, I examined the country in the vicinity of the city, with the view of selecting a proper military site. I visited the military reserve, Rush valley; but found it, in my opinion, entirely unsuited for a military station. It contained but little grass, and is very much exposed to the cold winds of winter; its only advantage being the close proximity to fire-wood. It is too far from the city, being between forty and forty-five miles; and will require teams four days to go there and return. I examined another point on the road to Rush valley, and only about thirty miles from the city, which I consider a much more eligible position. It is in Tuella valley, three miles to the north of Tuella city, and possesses wood, water, and grass; but it is occupied by Mormons, who have some sixty acres under cultivation, with houses and barns on their land. These persons would have to be dispossessed or bought out. In fact, there is no place within forty, fifty, or sixty miles of the city, suitable for a military position, that is not occupied by the inhabitants and under cultivation. Finding that I could neither make the purchases ordered to, nor shake the determination of the people to resist the authority of the United States, I left the city, and returned to my camp at Ham's fork. On my return, I examined the vicinity of Fort Bridger, and found it a very suitable position for wintering the troops and grazing the animals, should it be necessary to stop at that point. The Mormons occupy the fort at present, and also have a settlement about ten miles further up Black's fork, called Fort Supply. These two places contain buildings sufficient to cover nearly half the troops now en route for Utah; but I was informed that they would all be laid in ashes as the army advanced.

I have thus stated fully the result of my visit to Utah; and, trusting that my conduct will meet the approval of the commanding general,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
STEWART VAN VLIET,
Captain, Assistant Quartermaster.

Proclamation by Governor Brigham Young.

CITIZENS OF UTAH: We are invaded by a hostile force, who are evidently assailing us to accomplish our overthrow and destruction. For the last twenty-five years we have trusted officials of the Government, from constables and justices to judges, Governors, and Presidents, only to be scorned, held in derision, insulted, and betrayed. Our houses have been plundered and then burned, our fields laid waste, our principal men butchered while under the pledged faith of the Government for their safety, and our families driven from their homes to find that shelter in the barren wilderness, and that protection among hostile savages, which were denied them in the boasted abodes of Christianity and civilization.

The Constitution of our common country guarantees unto us all that we do now or have ever claimed. If the constitutional rights which pertain unto us as American citizens were extended to Utah, according to the spirit and meaning thereof, and fairly and impartially administered, it is all that we could ask—all that we have ever asked.

Our opponents have availed themselves of prejudices existing against us, because of our religious faith, to send out a formidable host to accomplish our destruction. We have had no privilege nor opportunity of defending ourselves from the false, foul, and unjust aspersions against us, before the nation. The Government has not condescended to cause an investigating committee, or other person, to be sent to inquire into and ascertain the truth, as is customary in such cases. We know those aspersions to be false, but that avails us nothing. We are condemned unheard, and forced to an issue with an armed mercenary mob which has been sent against us at the instigation of anonymous letter-writers, ashamed to father the base, slanderous falsehoods which they have given to the public; of corrupt officials, who have brought false accusations against us to screen themselves in their own infamy; and of hiring priests and howling editors, who prostitute the truth for filthy lucre's sake.

The issue which has thus been forced upon us compels us to resort to the great first law of self-preservation, and stand in our own defense: a right guaranteed to us by the genius of the institutions of our country, and upon which the Government is based. Our duty to ourselves—to our families—requires us not to tamely submit to be driven and slain without an attempt to preserve ourselves. Our duty to our country, our holy religion, our God, to freedom and liberty, requires that we should not quietly stand still and see those fetters forging around us which are calculated to enslave and bring us in subjection to an unlawful military despotism, such as can only emanate, in a country of constitutional law, from usurpation, tyranny, and oppression.

Therefore, I, Brigham Young, Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Utah, in the name of the people of the United States in the Territory of Utah, forbid—

First. All armed forces of every description from coming into this Territory under any pretense whatever.

Second. That all the forces in said Territory hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's notice to repel any and all such invasion.

Third. Martial law is hereby declared to exist in this Territory from and after the publication of this proclamation; and no person shall be allowed to pass or re-pass into, or through, or from, this Territory without a permit from the proper officer.

Given under my hand and seal at Great Salt Lake City, Territory of Utah, this 15th day of September, A. D. 1857, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-second.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Both these documents go to show the determined spirit of the Mormon leader; that he was determined to resist this Government in every form. That proclamation is, to all intents and purposes, a declaration of war—a war not against the Indian hordes, but against this Government—the Government under which he has for years held office and received pay, and the Government which maintains and supports his national existence. But I will not stop here. I do not stand upon the mere declaration of Brigham Young. Go on to the 5th of October, and what do you see? You see the actual commencement of hostilities by the Mormon army against the army of the United States. Colonel Alexander, then at the head of our forces, after speaking of the communications from Lieutenant General Wells and Brigham Young, says:

"Upon receiving these letters, I prepared for defense, and to guard the supplies near us until the nearest troops came up. I replied to Governor Young's letter, a copy of which I inclose, and have not had any further correspondence with him. On the morning of the 5th of October the Mormons burned two trains of Government stores on Green river, and one on the Big Sandy, and a few wagons belonging to Mr. Perry, sutler of the tenth infantry, which were a few miles behind the latter train. Colonel Waite, of the fifth, though not anticipating any act of this kind, was preparing to send back a detachment to these trains from his camp on Black's fork, when he received, from some teamsters who came in, the intelligence of their being burned. No doubt now existed that the most determined hostility might be expected on the part of the Mormons; and it became necessary, from the extreme lateness of the season, to adopt some immediate course for wintering the troops and preserving the supply trains."

You see property of the United States to the amount of seventy or one hundred thousand dollars destroyed by the Utah forces. If that be not an act of war, what is an act of war? In every view of the subject it is as much an act of war as though the Mormons had charged upon our Army, or committed any amount of absolute hostilities.

I will read to the House a report of the proceedings of Brigham Young, in October last, in his own church. It is from a paper published by a Mormon in my own district, a member of the Church of the Latter-Day Saints. It is therefore, good authority, because the editor says he extracts it from the Deseret News, which, as is well known, is the organ of Brigham Young:

"We have seen files of the Deseret News up to the latter part of October, which indicate plainly enough the determination of resistance to the military, if an attempt is made to enter their settlements.

"From the discourses of Brigham Young we make the following extracts:

"This people are free; they are not in bondage to any Government on God's footstool. We have transgressed no law, and we have no occasion to do so, neither do we intend to; but as for any nation's coming to destroy this people, God Almighty be my helper, they cannot come here. [The congregation responded by a loud Amen.] That is my feeling upon that point."

Here is the argument of Brigham Young:

"If you do your duty, you need not be afraid of mobs, nor of forces sent out in violation of the very genius of our free institutions, holding you till mobs kill you. Mobs? Yes; for where is there the least particle of authority, either in our constitution or laws, for sending troops here, or even for appointing civil officers contrary to the voluntary consent of the governed? We came here without any help from our enemies, and we intend staying here as long as we please."

I read further from his sermon:

"Suppose that our enemies send fifty thousand troops here, they will have to transport all that will be requisite to sustain them over one winter, for I promise them before they come that there shall not be one particle of forage nor one mouthful of food for them, should they come. They will have to bring all their provisions and forage, and though they start their teams with as heavy loads as they can draw, not one can bring enough to sustain itself, to say nothing of the men. If there were no more men here than there are in the Seminole nation, our enemies never could use us up, but they could use up themselves, which they will do. The Seminoles, a little tribe of a few hundred in Florida, have cost our Government nearly one hundred million dollars, and they are no nearer being conquered than when the war was commenced."

This is defiance. You perceive that according to this unequivocal assumption, our army should not come to Salt Lake valley; and that this Government had no right to appoint officers for that Territory. Owing to their remote position, and occupying a strong military position in the mountain passes, relying upon the strength of his locality, and our unfortunate delay in subduing the Seminoles, he boldly defies us. He says that from the position of the Seminole Indians, they have been able to resist the armies of the United States for years; and that he will resist you. He declares war, and commences the work of hostility by overt acts against the Government; and avows his prospect of protracting his hostilities after the manner of the Seminole Indians.

This you recollect was in the month of October. In November following, Governor Cumming, who had been appointed to succeed Governor Young, issued his proclamation, thus warning his predecessor that he was no longer Governor. Governor Cumming thus informs him that, having been regularly sworn into office, the authority of Young as Governor no longer exists; and that he, Cumming, was prepared to exercise the functions of the office. How does Brigham Young act upon the reception of this information? Does he yield to the new appointment made in pursuance of the organic act of the Territory? No, sir; although he himself was appointed under the same organic act, he refused to recognize the appointment of Governor Cumming, and calls together the Legislature of Utah, which, at last advices, December 21, was still in session. In pursuance of his former position declining to recognize a successor, he has issued a long proclamation, ably written, argumentative, reiterating his former position, and avowing his intention to resist to the death any attempt of the Army of the United States to enter that Territory, and adhering to the position that the Government of the United States has no power to appoint officers for that Territory. I present the following closing extract from his message:

"Fully aware, as has been justly written, that 'patriotism does not consist in aiding Government in every base or stupid act it may perform, but rather in paralyzing its power when it violates vested rights, affronts inscribed justice, and assumes undelimited authority,' and knowing that the so-called army, reported to be on its way to Utah, was an undisguised mob, if not sent by the President of the United States, and if sent by him, in the manner and for the purpose alleged in all the information permitted to reach us, was no less a mob, though in the latter event acting under color of law; upon learning its near approach, I issued, as in constitutional duty bound, a proclamation expressly forbidding all bodies of armed men, under whatsoever name or by whomsoever sent, to come within the bounds of this Territory. That so-called army, or, more strictly speaking, mob, refused to obey that proclamation, copies of which were officially furnished them, and prosecuted their march to the neighborhood of Forts Bridger and Supply, (which were vacated and burnt upon their approach,) where it is said they intend to winter. Under these circumstances I respectfully suggest that you take such measures as your enlightened judgment may dictate, to insure public tranquility and protect, preserve, and perpetuate inviolate those inalienable constitutional rights which have descended to us a rich legacy from our forefathers.

"A civilized nation is one that never infringes upon the rights of its citizens, but strives to protect and make happy all within its sphere, which our Government, above all others, is obligated to accomplish, though its present course is as far from that wise and just path as the earth is from the sun. And, under the aggravated abuses that have been heaped upon us in the past, you and the whole people are my witnesses that it has more particularly fallen to my lot, and been my policy and practice, to restrain rather than urge resistance to usurpation and tyranny on the part of the enemies to the Constitution and constitutional laws, (who are also our enemies and the enemies of all Republics and republicans,) until forbearance, under such cruel and illegal treatment, cannot well be longer exercised. No one has denied, nor wishes to deny, the right of the Government to send its troops when, where, and as it pleases, so it is but done clearly within the authorities and limitations of the Constitution, and for the safety and welfare of the people; but when it sends them clearly without the pale of those authorities and limitations, unconstitutionally to oppress the people, as is the case in the so-called army sent to Utah it commits a treason against itself which commands the resistance of all good men, or freedom will depart our nation.

"In compliance with a long-established system in appointing officers not of the people's electing, which the Supreme Court of the United States would at once, in justice, decide to be unconstitutional, we have petitioned and petitioned that good men be appointed, until that hope is exhausted; and we have long enough borne the insults and outrages of lawless officials, until we are compelled, in self-defense, to assert and maintain that great constitutional rights of the governed to officers of their own election, and local laws of their own enactment. That the President and the counselors, aiders and abettors of the present treasonable crusade against the peace and rights of a Territory of the United States, may reconsider their course and retrace their steps, is earnestly to be desired; but in either event our trust and confidence are in that Being who at His pleasure rules among the armies of heaven, and controls the wrath of the children of men, and most cheerfully should we be able to abide the issue.

"Permit me to tender you my entire confidence that your deliberations will be distinguished by that wisdom, unanimity, and love of justice that have ever marked the counsels of our Legislative Assemblies, and the assurance of my hearty cooperation in every measure you adopt for promoting the true interests of a Territory beloved by us for its very isolation and forbidding aspect; for here, if anywhere upon this footstool of our God, have we the privilege and prospect of being able to secure and enjoy those inestimable rights of civil and religious liberty, which the beneficent Creator of all mankind has, in His mercy, made indefeasible, and perpetuate them upon a broader and firmer basis for the benefit of ourselves, of our children and our children's children, until peace shall be restored to our distracted country.

BRIGHAM YOUNG."

The Legislature, called together by him, indorsed the message of Brigham Young, and pledged themselves to aid him in carrying out his desperate views of resistance to the authorities and laws of the United States. These resolutions should also go before the world, and I therefore present them to the House:

Resolutions, expressive of the sense of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, relative to the message and official course of his Excellency Governor Brigham Young.

Resolved, That we unanimously and most cordially, for ourselves and in behalf of the well-known feelings of our constituents, concur in the sentiments and doctrines advanced in the message delivered by his Excellency Governor Young to the Legislative Assembly of this Territory, convened in the Representatives' Hall in Great Salt Lake City, December 15, 1857.

Resolved, That the entire policy and all the acts of his Excellency Governor Young have been able, just, and humane—conducive to and protective of the development of the best interests and welfare both of this Territory and of the General Government, so far as that policy and those acts could accomplish so desirable a result.

Resolved, That we hold ourselves, our means and influence, in readiness to sustain his Excellency Governor Young in every act he may perform or dictate, in accordance with the Constitution and constitutional laws of the United States and the laws of Utah, for the protection of the lives, peace, and prosperity of the people of this Territory.

Resolved, That neither the present nor any other Administration of the General Government shall enforce profligate, drunken, and otherwise corrupt officials upon us at the point of the bayonet; and that the attempt so to do by the present incumbent of the executive chair of our nation has incurred that contempt and determined opposition of all good men which such an act of usurped authority and oppression so richly deserves.

Resolved, That while we deprecate the bitter hostility manifested toward a most loyal and innocent people by the present Administration of the General Government, we will continue to resist any attempt on the part of the Administration to bring us into a state of vassalage by appointing, contrary to the Constitution, officers whom the people have neither vote nor voice in electing; nor shall any persons appointed to office for Utah by the present Administration, either qualify for, or assume and discharge, within the limits of this Territory, the functions of the offices to which they have been appointed, so long as our Territory is menaced by an invading army, (for such an army cannot have been sent to protect either the citizens or the passing emigration, but is manifestly sent to aid in trampling upon American liberty,) nor so long as such appointees are so pusillanimous as to require a numerous armed force to attend their beck to enable them to carry out the traitorous designs concocted for depriving American citizens of their indefeasible and vested rights.

Resolved, That we will at least have our constitutional rights to a voice in the selection of our territorial officers, and in the enactment of local laws for our government.

Resolved, That these resolutions be signed by the members of the two Houses and be printed in The Deseret News. Unanimously adopted and signed, December 21, 1857.

This, sir, is the position of the Mormons at this time. They are in rebellion, in resistance, in a state of war against the United States. They have declared war, and have declared that they will resist the approach of an army, or any other power of the United States; that they are free and independent. I therefore say that an exigency has arisen when the people of a Territory of this country are in a state of open war against the United States, and are therefore guilty of high treason against the Government of the United States. I do not wish to aggravate the offense of the Mormons. I place them upon the ground upon which their own papers place them. But, sir, while I would not aggravate an offense, I cannot treat the matter in any other light than that of a high crime which deserves the calm, firm, fearless attention of the American Congress. Gentlemen must not regard this as the idle boasting of ignorant imbecility—as something that will pass over in a few weeks. I tell them that I do not so regard it. On the contrary, I forewarn gentlemen that it is a painful, perplexing, disgraceful reality, which it becomes us to consider in all its present bearings and all its pending consequences to the peace and honor of our country.

If gentlemen suppose they are to be subdued easily, I tell them they are mistaken. The Mormons are a thousand miles from settlement; they occupy the passes of the mountains; they now number some sixty thousand people; I have seen them from year to year on their march to Salt Lake valley; and from my own personal observation I know they are a powerful and formidable force to encounter. They can at any time muster from five to ten thousand men, fully armed and equipped for war. The position which they occupy in relation to the possession of the soil, their homes, adds a powerful incentive of resistance to the United States authorities. They have not purchased their land. They have not paid for it. They claim the land as the squatters of the West claim. They have not purchased their homes, as you have yours; and they are willing to fight for their homes against a power which their leaders have taught them to believe has purposed to crush and destroy them.

I know that they have heretofore been aggravated by acts of cruelty and persecution. They have been driven from place to place; but, it is to be recollected, these persecutions have been drawn forth by their own folly. I do not propose to speak of anything in the past, except to show the facts incident to the present attitude of affairs. I do not propose to say anything of what has been done, or what has not been done; that is not pertinent to the present question. I say nothing of the plunders that have been committed in years past. We are now in a position where we have no occasion to go so far back. We are obliged to take the question as it is now presented to us. The Mormons have declared war against us; and, as national legislators, it becomes us calmly to inquire how far we are called upon to inflict the fearful penalties due to such crimes. Will you withdraw your army? Will you disgrace your banners which you have sent there by lowering them before such an array of Mormon force? Will you disgrace these men who now stand before your foes—men who have fought the battles of their country in former wars—men who have won honorable distinction in the service of the country in many a well-fought battle. I implore for them the consideration of this House.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I desire to know how many men of the Army are now stationed in Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I reply to the gentleman as far as my information goes, (and I intend to notice this subject again in another part of my argument;) I suppose there are about three thousand men in Kansas, and in the vicinity—some at Fort Leavenworth and some at Jefferson Barracks, but all in striking distance of Kansas. I now proceed to the second branch of my subject, the consideration of the kind of force which ought to be employed. How have we always heretofore acted when occasion called for a military force? We have called upon the regulars and the volunteers, and upon some occasions the militia have turned out. The Government has at sundry times paid for these extraordinary efforts of the militia and volunteers, although they have gone without authority of law, believing they did good service to their country, however irregular and unarmed they have rushed to real or apparent danger. But I speak not of such impulsive gatherings of force, no military calculations should be made for them; I speak of regular volunteers like those who went to Mexico; I speak of such as are proposed in this bill; when I speak of volunteers, I speak of such forces. In former emergencies we have called out regular forces and volunteers. And why not, upon this occasion, act consistent with the course heretofore pursued? We have a large force of regulars in Kansas that can be spared, and this bill proposes to add five regiments of volunteers for the Mormon and frontier service.

Because of the remote position of the field of operations, it will require at least two or three months to convey a supporting force where it can cooperate with Colonel Johnston's forces. It will require sixty days after you actually start your column, on the supposition that you take the army now in Kansas, and make that region or Nebraska your place of rendezvous. If, then, you would reinforce our Utah army, act immediately, for with your earliest efforts, and before you will have reached Colonel Johnston, months will have transpired, and further regrets may be occasioned. We cannot state the exact time that will be required to raise forces not already in service; but if you expect to assist, it is manifest you cannot be too soon about it. You cannot get any force upon the frontier, ready for movement, in less than thirty days. So it may be July or August before you can get a sufficient force in position. This leads me to consider, and prefer the force that can be got there soonest. I therefore recommend volunteers, as I believe them the most available. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] said it was the purpose of the President to call into action all the regulars now in the western part of the United States. I am glad to hear the Government is going to collect all this available force, and put it en route to participate in this Utah service; yet admitting and relying on this, let the Government do the best they can, that force cannot be collected and equipped so as to move forward before the 1st of May; and all the regular force the Government can rally will not, as I suppose, augment the present force to more than three thousand five hundred men. I tell this House, we have got to go into Utah against an opposing force of five or ten thousand, and therefore you should have an active force in Utah of five thousand men.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to inquire of the gentleman how many soldiers there will be, with the army now on its way, and those now in Kansas, provided they were united?

Mr. CURTIS. In reply I will tell the gentleman how I estimate the force which will be necessary to carry on a successful campaign. In the first place you want one regiment on this side of Fort Laramie, and one west of it to sustain the military posts along the route and guard your stores at Fort Bridger. That makes two regiments. You want another movable regiment to guard the transportation of supplies from the frontier to Utah. That is three regiments. In addition to that you may calculate upon a force equal to one regiment of sick and disabled men. That is four. And when you get there you must have five regiments to act efficiently. Is that too much? Five regiments to operate in the enemy's country.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think it is.

Mr. CURTIS. I think not. That makes nine regiments, or say nine thousand men. Now how will you raise this requisite force? In the first place, I suppose that all the regular troops which you can from various quarters collect at a rendezvous which should be at or near Council Bluffs, may amount to three thousand five hundred men; and from all the information that I can get, I apprehend there will not be more than this number. There are now in Utah, under Colonel Johnston, a little more than one thousand men; but when spring arrives, desertions, discharges, and other casualties will reduce it to about this number, making the entire regular force applicable to this service, only four thousand five hundred. We propose by the bill reported by our committee to give the President four regiments of volunteers, which is only eight thousand five hundred men, lacking five hundred of the number which I have estimated as necessary. After allowing all that the bill proposes, the line of operation this side of the valley must be meagerly supplied in order to give the requisite force—five thousand men—to operate in Utah.

Mr. LOVEJOY. What does the gentleman propose to do with five thousand men in Utah valley?

Mr. CURTIS. They are wanted there to prosecute war against five or ten thousand Mormons, which are now, or will be, in arms to receive them. They are wanted to move from point to point as exigencies may require.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Does the gentleman consider that war exists?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Who declared it?

Mr. CURTIS. Brigham Young, as the leader and former Governor of the Mormons, who has put his forces under command of Lieutenant-General Wells.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has the gentleman his manifesto?

Mr. CURTIS. I have it; and, with the consent of the House, I will incorporate a portion of it in my speech. I think it will convince that gentleman, and all others, that the opposing forces are in a state of actual war. But I desire not to be detained or forced from the line of my argument.

The point I was making is that we need the forces provided for in this bill, not for the purpose of increasing the standing Army, but for the purpose of giving to the President of the United States ample power to prosecute this war; for I insist, with regret, that war has already commenced. Gentlemen may smile, and regard it as futile, but three years will not roll around before they will know that the Government has already acted with too much leniency towards this people, now in open and avowed resistance of all the powers of this Government.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I desire to ask the gentleman if we have declared war?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not deem it necessary for this Government to declare war. I take the facts, and from the facts, as I present them to this House, I say war actually exists. I regret that such is the fact. I wish there was any contrary showing, any intimation on the part of the Mormons that they are willing to avoid the dread conclusion. I am intimately acquainted with many of these people; for there are many of the Latter-Day Saints in the West, and there is a constant intercourse between them and their friends in Utah. When they mingle and live with our own citizens, they are quiet, law-abiding, and generally worthy citizens. But when aggregated together, as they were in Ohio, Missouri, Illinois, and as they now are at Salt Lake, they become bigoted, fanatical, vain-glorious; and, regarding the exterior world as "gentiles," they resist all intercourse as interference, and when crimes are committed against gentiles the criminals are shielded by a cloak of fanaticism. This isolation is inconsistent with the nature of our social and political organization; and it always has, and always will, lead to strife, conflict, and ultimate disaster to the weaker party. You have got to meet these Mormons as they are. Why have they a commander-in-chief in Utah? It is to repel your forces; and, I repeat, they are now in hostile array against the Government of the United States, and the only question is, how will you meet them?

Mr. POTTLE. I desire to ask my friend what assurance he can give that the troops, if raised, will be used against the Mormons? And further, if the chairman of the Military Committee in the Senate did not, in asking for these troops, say that they were not asked expressly for Utah, but to uphold the peace of the country?

Mr. CURTIS. I have no authority to guarantee the course which this Administration will pursue. The gentleman knows I do not affiliate with that party. I take the facts before me, and the public documents, which we are bound to respect; I take the President's message; I take the report of the officers of the Army, whom I have known for years, and whose characters are above suspicion, and I tell the gentleman they represent matters as I have presented them. I have it from the Commanding General himself, Lieutenant General Scott, that the order has gone forth, or will go, directing the forward movement of regulars in Kansas for operations in Utah. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] who has the ear of the Administration as intimately as any other gentleman on the Military Committee, and perhaps as frequently as any other gentleman in the House, tells you that the whole force shall be moved from all the West in the Utah column. I take him at his word. If the Administration will dare to neglect the honor of this country by refusing to send out such assistance as is at his command, and such as we deem necessary and proper, let them take the responsibility. Let us do our duty, and hold other branches of the Government accountable for their shortcomings or errors.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I wish to know if the gentleman believes that this Administration will respect its pledges about anything?

Mr. CURTIS. I will not go so far as to impute to the President of the United States a want of integrity in a matter so delicate as that which pertains to his duty as Commander-in-Chief of our armies. I infer, from the inquiry made by my friend from New York, [Mr. POTTLE,] that this temporary military increase is not asked for upon the ground which I have stated; that is, for an expedition to Utah. I will read from his message to show that he does put it emphatically on the ground of the necessity of sending a force against Utah. Let us deal fairly. This is a matter too grave and important to be made a political question of. It is not going to be, and we cannot make it one. It is one in which the whole Republic is interested; and if we differ about it, let us at least meet it honestly and honorably. What does the President say, in speaking of this Utah matter? He says, speaking of the conduct of Brigham Young towards Captain Van Vleet:

"A great part of all this may be idle boasting; but yet no wise Government will lightly estimate the efforts which may be inspired by such frenzied fanaticism as exists among the Mormons in Utah. This is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories; and humanity itself requires that we should put it down in such a manner that it shall be the last. To trifle with it would be to encourage it and to render it formidable. We ought to go there with such an imposing force as to convince these deluded people that resistance would be vain, and thus spare the effusion of blood. We can in this manner best convince them that we are their friends, not their enemies. In order to accomplish this object, it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments; and this I earnestly recommend to Congress. At the present moment of depression in the revenues of the country I am sorry to be obliged to recommend such a measure; but I feel confident of the support of Congress, cost what it may, in suppressing the insurrection, and in restoring and maintaining the sovereignty of the Constitution and laws over the Territory of Utah."

No matter how others have spoken, we must take notice of the matter as stated by the President. If he placed it on the ground of a standing increase of the Army, I would oppose him. I wish gentlemen to notice that the President puts it upon the ground of a Utah expedition; and if he fails for want of adequate force in case we withhold it, he will bring his request as an argument for his justification and our reproach. He does not define the kind of troops. He does not say that he wants regulars. He says he wants four regiments, and I am told this four was a clerical error; that he designed to commend the views of the Secretary of War, who speaks of five. I say this in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] who spoke yesterday as though the President had called for regulars and we are offering him volunteers. Neither does the Secretary of War call for regulars. He says that he wants five regiments, and then he says that experience has proved that regulars are more economical than volunteers. That is all the Secretary of War says. The Commander-in-Chief, General Scott, says nothing as to the kind of troops. He leaves that to the discretion of Congress. I am willing to admit that the Commander-in-Chief, like all Army officers, always looks for an increase of the regular Army when more force is called for. He has spent his life with regulars; and our Army is affectionately attached to him, as he is to the Army—it is natural. He has not studied the advantages of volunteers as some of us who have served with them; and following natural attachments and impulses he would prefer regulars. The wisest and best of men are subject to the common infirmities of our species, and are influenced by similar motives as other men. Our Army officers all entertain a just pride for their profession. Their promotion, their rank, their dominion, all seem to advance with the increase of the regular Army. I wish it was otherwise. I hope the day will come when their rank and promotion and professional prosperity will depend more on affiliation with the volunteer forces of our country. Such an affinity would advance the interests of the volunteers, greatly increase the military power of our country, and check a current of prejudice which seems to increase against our regular Army.

But, sir, I have not raised this comparison of our different kinds of force, and as far as possible I wish to do justice to the volunteers without prejudice to the regular Army. I have attempted to show that you must have at least nine regiments to make a successful campaign in Utah, and that four additional regiments are necessary in order to secure that amount; and time being material, volunteers are most appropriate. I say that volunteers will be most easily and speedily raised. What has been the success of our efforts to increase the Army within the last few years? It will be recollected that a year or two ago Congress passed a law increasing the pay of the officers and soldiers of our Army. It was supposed that after that recruiting would go on with greater activity. And yet we see that the Army is not full. The returns of the Adjutant General for the last year show that the increase of the Army has hardly been equal to the decrease caused by deaths, discharges, and desertion. It seems also that the force has been much below the maximum; and recently the clause in the law authorizing "voluntary enrollments," and authorizing a bounty for such enrollments, has been used to accelerate the enlistments.

I read from the report of the Adjutant General of November 27, 1857:

"The authorized strength of the Army, as now posted, is 17,934. The actual strength on the 1st of July last was 15,764. The number of enlistments made during the year ending June 30, 1857, was 5,509. The number of persons offering to enlist, but who were refused on account of minority and unfitness for service, was 12,375. The number of casualties in the Army by deaths, discharges, and desertions during the year ending June 30, 1857, was 5,729, of which 2,954 were from the last named cause."

This report not only shows the difficulty of enlistments, but it is remarkable that so many were minors, or otherwise so degraded as to be unfit for soldiers.

Mr. POTTLE. I ask the gentleman if he can inform the House where the greatest number of desertions have taken place?

Mr. CURTIS. I cannot say as to that.

Mr. POTTLE. I ask the gentleman if the greatest number of the desertions did not take place in Kansas, and were not owing to the peculiar description of service that the troops were ordered upon in that Territory?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know whether that is so or not. My view in regard to the use of the forces of the United States does not connect it in any shape or form with Kansas. I do not believe that the President of the United States has any right to use the Army of the United States either for a police, or for a posse, or to defend the ballot-boxes of the country. The Army of this country is intended for a different purpose. In our Republic, the ballot-box was substituted for the cartridge-box; and when these negative electrica come together in the same crucible, you will see spontaneous combustion—strife and tumult and civil war are the inevitable consequences. I deplore the act of the President in keeping two or three thousand men in Kansas; and will at any time go for prohibiting the use of our Army or Navy for all such uses. But let us not mix that Kansas subject with the one now before us. We are told that the troops shall be sent to Utah. Let us look the matter in the face, and see whether it is our duty as men and legislators to put under the control of the Executive a sufficient force to execute the law.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman says he has been told that these troops shall be sent to Utah. I would like to know from the gentleman if he can state the date of that determination?

Mr. CURTIS. I would say to my friend from Kentucky that I understood so three weeks ago, in a private conversation with General Scott himself. It was a private conversation on public business, and therefore I suppose it is no breach of trust to speak about it. I understood it to be the policy of the Administration, and the General's purpose, to send the Kansas troops on to Utah as soon as the season would permit. I have heard the same purpose declared by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] whom I suppose to be in communication with the Administration; and I am not disposed to doubt the fact, since it comes so distinctly stated by high authority. If the Administration does not send all the force it can get to Utah, I tell you that the campaign will be a perilous one. The honor of the country will not be sustained, and, in my opinion, the President himself will have reason to deplore such a diversion of these forces. Put the force into the hands of the President, and if he does not send it to Utah, if he does not stand by your eagles, if he does not sustain your laws, hold him accountable for it. Hold up his conduct before the people, and before those who declare now the purpose of the President of the United States to perform his duty by sending the Kansas troops to Utah.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want it to appear that I am defending the Administration. I have no right or inclination to speak of the Administration from any personal knowledge. Other gentlemen, I trust, are better able to defend him than am I. So far as the past course of the Administration is concerned, I leave it to them. I am very far from approving of the retention of troops last year in Kansas; but I speak of the future. I speak of what the Administration ought to do, and what we are led to believe they intend to do; and I trust that, on this subject, the President will act with patriotism, fairness, and fidelity. I repeat, this is not a party question, and I hope gentlemen will not try to make it such. I ask the Republicans of this House especially to recollect that these Mormons have, for years past, been doing violence to good morals. They have raised the standard of liberty to sustain rebellion, and the standard of religion to support licentiousness. They despise our laws, and now declare they will never submit to them. Brigham Young held power for years under the law organizing that Territory, and under that law he should have submitted to his successor. But when he finds, after receiving his salary as Governor for years, that he is to be removed and superseded, he declares the law null and void, and asserts that the Government of the United States has no power to send officers there whom the Mormons themselves have not appointed. In other words, they say that the Government of the United States has no power to remove Brigham Young, who claims to hold his office as Governor by the grace of God, and not by the laws of Congress.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 66.

Now, the question of the kind of force to be sent there has been brought up; and I regret that I am diverted so often from my purpose to discuss that matter. Admitting that this additional force of four or five regiments is necessary for the purpose of quelling the difficulty in Utah, I say that the best force to be sent there is a volunteer force, first, because they can be soonest brought into service. How was it in the Mexican campaign? On the 13th day of May, Congress passed a law calling for volunteers from the different States of the Union. On the 20th of May, in the same year, the proclamation was made in the State of Ohio; and in just one month from that day there were three regiments organized and turned over to the United States, ready for service in Mexico, and enough to form ten or twenty more regiments had been declined. On the 18th of July, they were in Mexico, where they found others from Indiana, Tennessee, Georgia, Kentucky, and other parts of the Union, who had already arrived at Brazos Santiago, and were ready and able to do good service in an enemy's country. Certainly, you cannot organize regulars so expeditiously.

Under a special provision of the Army bill, passed a year or two ago, there is paid to those who volunteer on the frontier the expense of transport from the principal depot of recruits, in the city of New York, to the frontier where the volunteer enlists. This provision may increase the regular regiments, but it is only volunteers that can be raised instantaneously. Within sixty days from the time, there could be raised in this country three millions of volunteers, if the exigencies of the country required such a force—the best elements in the world to mold into an army. Such an army as that would be invincible against any force that could be brought against the country. The military power of the land consists in its vast numerical force, which is ready, on a proper occasion, to rush to your standard as volunteers. And now that you have occasion to have a force in the field, I ask you to look to those whom you can and must rely upon to protect your honor and fight your battles on all occasions of great necessity. Encourage by your acceptance of a force that you see armed, equipped, and well-drilled in almost every city, town, and hamlet of your country.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I ask permission of the gentleman to read some paragraphs from the speech of Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I know that Senator DAVIS puts the necessity for force upon the ground that it is necessary to increase the standing Army. I do not take that ground. I am not concluded by the honorable Senator. I do not believe that to be the true ground. The force is asked for a Utah expedition. I take the ground that it is necessary to strengthen the army in Utah. If I believed what Senator DAVIS says, that it is to increase the standing Army, I would myself vote against this bill. But he has no right to speak for the Administration; he has no right to speak for me; and he has no right to speak for the Committee on Military Affairs of this House.

But gentlemen have said here, and it has been said by the Adjutant General of the Army of the United States, and it has been said in the speech of Senator DAVIS, which the gentleman presented, that a volunteer force is the most expensive force.

The SPEAKER. It is hardly in order for the gentleman to allude to what is said in the other wing of the Capitol.

Mr. CURTIS. I am replying to an inquiry made by my friend from New York, [Mr. Burroughs.] I speak of a pamphlet which I have before me, and with due respect to the Senate.

But I desire especially to notice the report of the Adjutant General of the Army, which I have before me, especially so much of it as supports his argument showing that volunteers cost vastly more than regulars. I have also before me the expression of Mr. Poinsett, when Secretary of War; and also the expression of the opinion of the present Secretary of War, together with the argument of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER:] all attempting to show that volunteers are vastly more expensive than regulars; and upon this array of testimony against the cost of volunteers, it is argued here and elsewhere that regulars shall be called out to meet the present and every other emergency. This argument has been presented and reiterated over and over again, although, as I will show to a mathematical certainty, it is entirely fallacious. The regular Army of the United States has been represented here, by its officers and defenders; but who has represented the volunteers? Who has taken the trouble to look over musty documents to ascertain how figures have been made to show what, at first sight, appears absurd? We have presented to us long bills of expenses of the volunteers. Sir, it is a fearful charge against the volunteers, that they are so much more wasteful and improvident than the regulars as to involve four or six times the expense.

Now, sir, the figures in the report of the Adjutant General, which I have before me, refer to tables erroneously prepared some twenty years ago; and still more erroneously applied to volunteers in Mexico, and volunteers proposed in this bill. So far as this bill is concerned the report of the Adjutant General has not the least force, because we provide that the infantry volunteers shall have the same allowances, in all respects, as regulars; and the mounted forces are also to have the same allowance except, as the horses are to be furnished by the volunteers, forty cents a day is given for the use and risk of this item.

The argument of the gentleman from Mississippi would also seem to extinguish the averment of the Adjutant General, by raising the simple inquiry how it was possible there should be such a difference in the Mexican war, when the pay of volunteers and regulars was the same, and all other supplies and transportations were controlled by officers of the regular Army. He states the number of companies employed in the Mexican war as one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven; and then he refers to a table made out twenty years ago to show that the cost of such a company of volunteers for six months is $2,625. It is the use of this last item that has been the foundation of all the charges of greater cost; but as I design to examine it, I submit a portion of the Adjutant General's report:

"Adding up these three numbers, we shall have eighty-three thousand; and dividing this by sixty-five, or the aggregate of a company of fifty privates, we will get one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven companies; which, multiplied by $2,625, or the difference between the cost of a regular infantry company and one of foot volunteers, for six months, according to the computation of the Paymaster General, in 1838, (see House Document 271, second session, Twenty-Fifth Congress, table A.) we shall have $3,352,125 for the minimum amount expended upon these volunteers over what the same number of regular troops would have cost during the same time. Going through the same calculations with the mounted volunteers enumerated above, observing only that the difference of cost between mounted companies of volunteers and regular troops for six months is greater, amounting to $9,002, we shall get, in the same way, $3,744,832; which, added to the previous amount, leaves $7,096,957 as the clear amount which must have been saved during the Mexican war by the use of regular troops instead of volunteers; and, by making a fair allowance for the unnecessarily large mounted force of volunteers called out, this amount will even go up to $9,021,733. And should we further consider the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces, referred to in the report of the Paymaster General, we may safely assume that not much short of twenty millions might have been saved in the course of the Mexican war by the employment of regular troops in lieu of volunteers; and this is, undoubtedly, an under-estimate."

In the reports of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, volume eighth, report of the Secretary of War, pages 9 and 10, I give the tables from which this magic number, $2,625, is obtained. It is there, in the report of Paymaster General Towson, that it is attempted to show that a six-months' company of volunteers costs the Government $2,625 more than a six-months' company of regulars. It was all wrong, as applied to volunteers then, because the charges against the volunteers include a charge for transportation, while no charge is made for transporting regulars, as though regulars were there without any transportation. But the matter I particularly object to, is the use of this item against the Mexican volunteers, and predicated on it a charge of improvidence and extravagance; alleging their cost at four times as much as that of the regulars.

Now, sir, in respect to the third table, which speaks of the cost of volunteers, it foots up $7,287 69. In order to show what was the cost of a company of volunteers in 1846, in the Mexican campaign, he goes back for twenty years, and brings a statement of what they are said to have cost then. How does that table apply?

The table on page 10, to which I allude, foots up the cost of a volunteer company, for six months, at.....$7,287 69
The table on page 9, relating to regulars, foots up at.....4,662 02

Taking the difference, you have this fatal number.....$2,625

Let us first examine the table which relates to volunteers, and see how it applies to Mexican volunteers. I find three classes of charges which should be erased if you use the table for the Ohio and other ordinary Mexican volunteers. They are: 1st. Charges for transportation. It is obvious that transportation of volunteers cost no more, or not so much, in the Mexican war, since the volunteers were generally gathered nearer the scene of service than the regulars. 2d. An Ensign is charged in the table; and since the law organizing the Mexican volunteers, (see vol. 9, page 10, Statutes at Large) and prescribing the officers, does not include an ensign; and, as my recollection serves me, none were used, that item should be excluded. 3d. Clothing, the same statute, (page 18) prescribes the amount volunteers were to receive—$3 50 per month for clothing, which would be twenty-one dollars for six months; whereas the table used by the Adjutant General charges more and various prices, as shown below. In conformity to these erroneous items the table should be corrected as follows:

Transportation.
Captain.....	$106 20
First lieutenant.....	82 20
Second lieutenant.....	76 20
First sergeant.....	23 39
3 sergeants.....	56 46
4 corporals.....	56 16
2 musicians.....	23 32
1 private.....	11 66
49 privates.....	571 34
	1,005 93
Ensign.....	459 20
Clothing errors.
First sergeant..Charged.....	$36 91
Received.....	21 00
	$15 91
3 sergeants....$36 91—21 x 3=.....	47 73
4 corporals....35 23—21 x 4=.....	56 92
2 musicians....36 75—21 x 2=.....	31 50
50 privates....35 23—21=.....	711 50

This shows that $2,328 69 should be deducted from the cost of volunteers; which, being so deducted, leaves only $4,959; instead of $7,287 69, as the cost of a company of fifty volunteers for six months. This would almost annihilate the fatal number, ($2,625;) but I proceed further. The table on page 8 of the old report, to which I have referred, and which purports to give the cost of regulars, is also erroneous when applied to volunteers of 1846. The error is an under-charge for clothing regulars. To determine the clothing allowed a regular soldier, I have referred to the Army regulations, pages 209, 210; and to estimate the cost thereof, I have had reference to the estimates furnished this Thirty-Fifth Congress. (See Ex. Doc. No. 1, page 187.)

I have taken the allowance for two years, and thus tried to determine a fair average for six months:

First Year.
1 cap, complete.....	$1 45
1 forage cap.....	50
1 dress coat.....	6 93

3 pairs cotton overalls, $1 25 each.....	3 75
2 cotton shirts, 93c. each.....	1 86
2 flannel shirts, 93c. each.....	1 86
2 pairs drawers, 47c. each.....	94
4 pairs boots, $1 93 each.....	7 72
4 pairs stockings, 28c. each.....	1 12

Add commission, insurance and transportation..... 6 59

Average cost of clothing for regulars.....$24 00

The regular force in Mexico was allowed a major and one assistant surgeon more than volunteers were allowed. To make the table right, therefore, so as to show the comparative cost of a regular company, which is to apply as a measure of relative cost for the two kinds of force, it is necessary to charge one tenth of the cost of these officers to a company as its share of that extra expense. Estimating the perquisites, pay, &c., I estimate the cost of a major to the United States at $1,000 for six months, and an assistant surgeon at $700.

Having thus determined the average cost of clothing at $24, and the amounts chargeable for a major and assistant surgeon, I present the following table of items relating to the cost of regulars:

Clothing.
3 servants.....	$24 each=$72
Table B.....	15 each= 45
	$27 00
1 sergeant.....	$24-$17 16=
59 sergeants, corporals, musicians, and privates, each charged $3 too low.....	472 00
Add one tenth cost of additional major to regulars—see act 1846.....	100 00
Add one tenth cost of additional assistant sergeants allowed regulars.....	70 00
Total increase.....	$675 84
	$5,337 86

Taking, then, these corrected items, we have for the cost of a company of regulars for six months.....$5,337 86

For the cost of company of volunteers 4,959 00

Difference in favor of volunteers..... $378 86

I have thus not only over balanced the multiple $2,625, which was used to the cost of volunteers, but I have in its stead a multiple $378 86, which I consider fairly chargeable to regulars. Thus showing that regulars, not volunteers, in the Mexican war, cost the most.

In this estimate I have compared infantry with infantry, because this is the only fair way of making comparisons.

If this showing be right as regards infantry—I believe it to be substantially so—I could proceed in the same way to relieve mounted volunteers from all imputation of excessive cost; and by multiplying by the number which the Adjutant General takes as the equated number of six-months' volunteers of fifty men, I show that by using volunteers, instead of regulars, the Government has saved over a million of dollars in the Mexican war.

What now, Mr. Speaker, becomes of the presentation of all these various officers, as to the expense of volunteers? Instead of being the most expensive they are cheaper, and for economy, therefore, as a general rule, regular volunteers, similar to those used in Mexico, should be preferred by our Government. On the present occasion especially, they should be called first, because they will sooner be mustered and marched to Utah; second, because it will give encouragement to this growing element of our military force; and finally, because they will cost less to the Government.

I regret that my hour does not afford time for me to answer some other reflections against the volunteers; but I trust there are others in this House that will espouse their cause and see that in all matters they are fully and fairly vindicated.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the bill now before us will meet the necessities of a Mormon campaign, and secure the united services of regulars and volunteers, who will, as in former service, unite in sustaining the honor and glory of their country.

Mr. STANTON obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Has the morning hour expired?

Mr. STANTON. I think we had better go on with the consideration of this matter.

TERMINATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Before that motion is put I wish to make a motion to terminate debate upon the bill pending in committee, and I will state to the House that I propose to modify the ordinary resolution for closing debate in such a way that when we are in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the debate is terminated, the bill may be laid aside, in order that we may take up another bill while in the Committee of the Whole, without rising to report the bill. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

Mr. STANTON. Is it in order for the gentleman to take the floor from me for any other purpose than to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The motion to terminate debate takes precedence of the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under a special rule of the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It seems to me that his object and an economy of time would be subserved by going on with the discussion of this subject and coming to a conclusion on this bill. I believe, by continuing the debate to-day, we may take a vote upon it to-morrow morning.

The resolution of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 6) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, shall cease at one o'clock, p. m., to-morrow, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same;) and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending or offered to the same, and shall then lay it aside, to be reported to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was then agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FLORENCE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FOSTER] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, we often hear the inquiry, what have we of the North to do with slavery? Why should we be eternally meddling with the affairs of other people to the neglect of our own? It has been triumphantly asked, have white men no rights, no interests, which demand our concern? Must we be forever engaged in a Quixotic agitation in behalf of negroes?

There was a time, not a great while ago, when such questions, tauntingly thrown in the teeth of the opponents of slavery, were deemed conclusive. They conveyed their own irrefutable answers by implication. But that day has passed and gone. The most stolid are at length becoming sensible that, although we of the North may "let alone" slavery in the severest manner possible, yet slavery will not let us alone.

Our fathers, near forty years ago, entered into a solemn league and covenant with slavery. They divided the common national heritage, and set up landmarks within which the South, by an almost unanimous vote, pledged itself to confine its "peculiar institutions." We all know how this pledge has been kept. We all know that the landmarks have been thrown down in order to establish the newly-discovered principle of "popular sovereignty." We were told that there was no danger of extending slavery. The Missouri compromise line, though sanctioned by Henry Clay, by Mr. Monroe, then the President of the United States, and by his Cabinet, including Crawford, of Georgia, and Calhoun, of South Carolina, was found to be unconstitutional, and must be repealed. The people of the Territories, it was said, in common with those of the States, were sovereign, and had the right to admit or exclude slavery at their pleasure. But at the same time we were assured that slavery would not be extended. That the current of immigration would infallibly give a large preponderance to the friends of freedom, who would be "left perfectly free to form their own institutions in their own way." The strength of the human tide from the free States which has flowed over and around the State of Missouri, in spite of ruffian opposition, was not overrated by the friends of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; but that the people have been left perfectly free to form their institutions has become so notoriously untrue as to extort the reluctant admission of the author of the Kansas bill himself, and to awaken his indignant remonstrance.

Have the people of Maine nothing to do with slavery in Kansas? Have white men no rights in that Territory? Does all belong to slavery and the South? No one inquires what right have Georgia and South Carolina to meddle with slavery in Kansas. By the general consent of the supporters of the Administration, North and South, their interference is legitimate and proper.

We of the North who oppose slavery extension have, by a strange perversion of facts, been called the "negro party," or "negro worshippers." Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look into this matter. We Republicans propose to confine the negro institution to its present limits. We wish to people the new Territories with white men, and to rear up new States with the great institution of free white labor as its basis. Our opponents, on the contrary, desire to flood Kansas and the other Territories with negro slaves. They have avowed in the Halls of Congress, in their numerous organs of public opinion throughout the South, and in some published north of Mason and Dixon's line, that slavery is the normal condition of the laboring class; that no society can be stable and happy without that institution; and in a recent elaborate article, the official organ of the Government, the Washington Union took the ground most emphatically, that the Constitution carries slavery not only into the Territories, but into the free States! The President himself has asserted that the Constitution, without any legislation under it, and even against legislation, carries slavery into all the Territories; and regards it as a great "mystery" that such men as Clay, Webster, Judge Marshall, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, &c., could have entertained a different opinion.

In view of these notorious facts, I hold that, if ever a party in this country deserved to be designated as the "negro party" or "negro worshippers," it is that which adheres to the Administration of Mr. Buchanan.

Shall I offer additional proofs on this point? Let the following extracts from Mr. Buchanan's letter to Professor Silliman, and a paragraph or two from the columns of the Washington Union, suffice. In the Silliman letter, dated August 15, 1857, the President says:

"Slavery existed at that period, [when the Nebraska bill was passed,] and still exists, in Kansas, under the Constitution of the United States. This point has at last been finally settled by the highest tribunal known to our laws. How it could ever have been seriously doubted, is a mystery. If a confederation of sovereign States acquire a new territory at the expense of their common blood and treasure, surely one set of the partners can have no right to exclude the other from its enjoyment by prohibiting them from taking into whatever is recognized to be property by the common Constitution. But when the people—the bona fide residents of such Territory—proceed to frame a State constitution, then it is their right to decide the important question for themselves whether they will continue, modify, or abolish slavery. To them, and to them alone, does this question belong, free from all foreign interference."

The official organ goes much further than the President; but, from the well-known fact that no important article goes into that paper without the advice and consent of the President and Cabinet, the article from which I quote may be regarded as expressing the views of the Administration. It appeared in the Union on the 17th of November last. I have only time to read a brief extract, as follows:

"The Constitution declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.' Every citizen of one State coming into another State has, therefore, a right to the protection of his person, and that property which is recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States, any law of a State to the contrary notwithstanding. So far from any State having a right to deprive him of this property, it is its bounden duty to protect him in its possession.

"If these views are correct—and we believe it would be difficult to invalidate them—it follows that all State laws, whether organic or otherwise, which prohibit a citizen of one State from settling in another, and bringing his slave property with him, and most especially declaring it forfeited, are direct violations of the original intention of a Government which, as before stated, is the protection of person and property, and of the Constitution of the United States, which recognizes property in slaves, and declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' among the most essential of which is the protection of person and property."

This extract is from a long article in the Union. It was evidently prepared with care; and the well-known fact that the editor was selected by the President, and is dependent upon him; that the paper habitually reflects the views and policy of the Administration; renders it next to certain that the article in question had the official sanction. Here, then, we have the deliberate avowal of the doctrine that the Federal Constitution carries slavery into all the free States.

Sir, the historical fact is undisputed, I believe, that the President was reared in the faith of the old Federal party; but I defy the friends of that high functionary to produce from the writings of the most ultra Federalist of the old school, from Hamilton down, a maxim so abhorrent to the friends of freedom and State rights, as is this semi-official pronouncement. It leaves not a shadow of sovereignty to the States; it sweeps away every particle of their reserved rights, and transforms this Federal Union into a consolidated despotism.

This, then, is modern Democracy! Jefferson founded the old Democratic party on the basis of universal freedom and State rights. Mr. Buchanan, claiming to be his successor as the head of the same party, declares its basis to be slavery and consolidation. History cannot furnish a stronger contrast between the principles of two parties than that which I have shown to exist between those represented respectively by Thomas Jefferson and James Buchanan.

In this connection I propose to call the attention of the committee to one of the most remarkable instances of political foresight which has ever come under my observation. In fact, I regard it as a prophecy literally fulfilled, after the lapse of more than the third of a century. The long continued ill-success of the old Federal party, the brilliant termination of the war with England, and the triumphant election of Mr. Monroe, caused a general stampede of the mercenary and spoil-seeking portion of it, who, like rats, deserted the sinking ship. They went over in droves into the ranks of the all-powerful Democratic or Republican party of that day. Mr. Jefferson expressed his apprehensions of the consequences of this accession from the ranks of the enemy in the following remarkable passage, which I find in a letter to the Hon. William T. Barry of Kentucky, dated Monticello, July 2, 1822:

"SIR: Your favor of the 15th of June is received, and I am very thankful for the kindness of its expressions respecting myself. But it ascribes to me merits which I do not claim. I was one only of a band devoted to the cause of independence, all of whom exerted equally their best endeavors for its success, and have a common right to the merits of its acquisition. So, also, is the civil revolution of 1801. Very many and very meritorious were the worthy patriots who assisted in bringing back our Government to its republican track. To preserve it in that, will require unremitting vigilance. Whether the surrender of our opponents, their reception into our camp, their assumption of our name, and apparent accession to our objects, may strengthen or weaken the genuine principles of republicanism, may be a good or an evil, is yet to be seen. I consider the party division of Whig and Tory the most wholesome which can exist in any Government, and well worthy of being nourished to keep out those of a more dangerous character. We already see the power, (the Supreme Court,) installed for life, responsible to no authority, (for impeachment is not even a scare-crow,) advancing with a noiseless and steady pace to the great object of consolidation. The foundations are already deeply laid by their decisions, for the annihilation of constitutional State rights, and the removal of every check, every counterpoise, to the ingulfing power of which themselves are to make a sovereign part."

The Supreme Court being the lever used for the overthrow of the constitutional rights of the States, I will read a few more brief extracts from Mr. Jefferson's correspondence touching this subject. In a letter to Thomas Ritchie, dated Monticello, December 25, 1820, he says:

"The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coördination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone."

In a letter to Archibald Thwait, dated Monticello, January 19, 1821, he says:

"The legislative and executive branches may sometimes err, but elections and dependence will bring them to rights. The judiciary branch is the instrument which, working like gravity, without intermission, is to press us at last into one consolidated mass."

And in a letter to Judge Johnson, dated Monticello, March 4, 1823, he says:

"I cannot lay down my pen without recurring to one of the subjects of my former letter, for, in truth, there is no danger I apprehend so much as the consolidation of our Government by the noiseless, and therefore unalarming, instrumentality of the Supreme Court. This is the form in which Federalism now arrays itself, and consolidation is the present principle of distinction between Republicans and pseudo-Republicans, but real Federalists."

Thirty-five years after the date of the letter to Mr. Barry, we see one of the "opponents" whose "apparent accession" to the ranks of Democracy the sage of Monticello dreaded, installed in the presidential office; and his first official act, his inaugural speech, was a declaration of the paramount authority of the Supreme Court, and of its right to control the coördinate branches of the Government!

It is the characteristic of prophecy, Mr. Chairman, that while it foreshadows events, and the characters of the great actors who are to figure in those events, there is a studied suppression of names, and of specific dates. It is left to posterity to fill up the picture of which the seer gives us a dim, and sometimes uncertain, outline. But in the case before us there can be no such uncertainty. The wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot fail to read, in the events of the last year, a literal and most exact fulfillment of the Monticello prophet's gloomy vaticinations. The Democratic party has been utterly debauched and estranged from the creed of its founder. Slavery is its corner-stone and key-stone. Its only essential policy and principle are slavery and slavery extension; and woe betide the man, be he great or small, who falters on this essential point. A Democrat may differ with his party upon anything else, or upon all else, provided he is sound on the slavery question. I, myself, was read out of the party some nine or ten years ago, because I protested against, and refused to support, the author of the famous Nicholson letter to the Presidency.

I have never regretted the course I then felt called upon to pursue; because I regard that letter as the very source of the whole brood of heresies and humbugs which have since appeared and have proved the ruin of the Democratic party. But mine was a comparatively grave offense. I insisted on the Wilmot proviso, just as Cass and Dickinson had done the year before. Now that we see daily those who have been Samsons in the field and Solomons in the council falling around us, not for sustaining the Wilmot proviso, not for refusing to vote for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, but simply because they are not ready to sacrifice every dictate of honor and conscience which stands in the way of the extension of slavery—in the midst of such scenes, I have every reason to be thankful that expulsion from the party was the extent of my punishment at that day.

Would you have illustrations on these points? Then look around you. Here you have the President himself, who differs with his party, or with the avowed principles of the party, upon the important question of a protective tariff. He has always been a protectionist, and voted for the tariff of 1842. The people, or rather the politicians, of South Carolina were at one time ready to dissolve the Union, rather than submit to his protective policy, of which the President and his Pennsylvania friends have always been the warm and interested advocates. But he is now "sound on the goose," and that great merit atones for a multitude of sins.

Take the national bank question, and the same indifference is apparent. In General Jackson's time it was the touchstone. No friend of that famous institution could claim fellowship with the Democracy in his day. But how is it now? Have we not seen the modern Democrats welcome scores of old-line national bank Whigs to their ranks without asking questions? Have we not seen these new recruits, unwashed and unsanctified, taken up, and petted and patronized, to the neglect of the old-line Democrats?

Take the internal-improvement question. It has from the earliest times been the settled policy of the Democratic party to oppose internal improvement by the Federal Government. But what do we see to-day? The Democratic President recommends the construction of a railroad to the Pacific; a distinguished Democratic Senator from Mississippi is the advocate of the same policy; and a Democratic Senator from California has introduced a bill into the Senate for the construction of three such roads to the Pacific!

Democrats profess to be in favor of a hard-money currency, and denounce bank rags; yet every State in the Union where they have the control, is overrun with irredeemable bank rags and shinplasters. I believe there is not an exception to this remark.

We have heard much lately of reading men out of the Democratic party. But for what? For unsoundness on the bank or the internal-improvement question? For recreancy to free trade? Not at all. So far from this being the case, we have seen within a few days past an old Federal protective tariff Democratic President, who voted for the tariff of 1842, read out of the party the author of the free-trade tariff of 1846! And for what? Not for my high offense of sustaining the Wilmot proviso; not even for sustaining the Missouri compromise, or refusing to sustain the Nebraska bill. Upon all these points he was sound; but he could not, as a man of honor, consent to be the instrument of forcing a constitution upon the people of Kansas by fraud and violence. We have seen the pensioned organs and special friends of this same President attempt to read a distinguished Senator—a life-long Democrat—out of the party, simply because he insists upon a fair election in Kansas upon the adoption of a State constitution, and because he has thought proper to denounce the infamous juggle of the Lecompton constitution.

Sir, these plain facts are enough to open the eyes of the northern men to the folly of attempting to please and conciliate the South by concessions and compromises on the slavery question. If services such as the Senator from Illinois and the late Governor of Kansas have performed, cannot shield them from the ungrateful reproaches and denunciations of the friends of the peculiar institution, it is useless for ordinary politicians to expect any mercy if they should ever venture to stand erect in the presence of a slaveholder. They may as well make up their minds to grope and grovel on their bellies the balance of their days.

I think I have said enough to make it clear that slavery is the all-essential element of what now passes for Democracy. Talk of fanaticism! Was there ever grosser fanaticism than that which is exhibited by the party which worships this black idol of slavery? Was there ever a monomania more fatal than that which induces northern Democrats to insist upon reducing our own free immigrants to the Territories to the level of the negro slaves of the South? We of the North oppose slavery on every ground. First and foremost, because it is wrong. It violates the inalienable rights of man, turns him into a brute and a chattel, and deprives him of education and opportunity to improve the talents, mental and moral, which his Maker has given him. It goes further. It prohibits and punishes every effort at mental improvement; and we should be recreant to humanity, to freedom, and to the highest interests of the common weal if we did not resist its extension into new States or Territories. If we are not permitted to cure the evil, we are determined, in any event, that it shall spread no further.

We are also opposed to the reduction of our own free laboring classes to the level of slaves, by compelling them to work by their side. We claim the common territories as the common heritage of the people—the free people. Certainly, if slaves cannot own themselves, they can have no right to go into the Territories. The Territories must either be free or slave. If the latter, then free laborers have no further interest in them; for it is a well-established fact that, wherever slavery exists, the slaveholders get possession of all the lands that are good for anything, and crowd out the poor. Slavery and freedom are irreconcilable as oil and water. They cannot be tenants-in-common of the same Territory; and, since one must give way, which shall it be, the black slave or the white freeman? I insist that the slave must be excluded, but not the South. The great mass of the southern people are not slaveholders, and they, like we of the North, are interested in keeping out the slaves. The slaveholders themselves may go and enjoy the Territories, but they must leave their slaves at home. But it is fiercely asked, shall we not carry our property? I answer, no! There is no hardship in excluding a particular species of property from a State or Territory; it is a common and no very heavy grievance. In the State from which I came the banks are permitted to issue one dollar bills; and we find it impossible to avoid taking them. They are my money, my property; and yet, when I arrive in Washington with my pocket full of them, I find that I dare not pass them, under a penalty of ten times their value. Your congressional legislation has rendered them useless to me. In like manner, Congress prohibits the institutions of rum, gin, and whisky in the Indian territories; and why may it not prohibit the still more pernicious and wicked institution of negro slavery?

We of the North also oppose slavery because we have seen in the past history of the States which tolerate it, that it is fatal to their prosperity. This view of the subject has been so often and so thoroughly discussed, North and South, that I must refrain from entering upon it in detail at this time. I will, however, briefly call attention to a few striking facts, which irresistibly show the superiority of free over slave society in the race of progress. I invite the attention of southern gentlemen to them.

The area of what are now free States, though they were not all free at that time, was, in 1790, 166,358 square miles. The area of the slave States, at that period, was 295,965 square miles, or almost double that of the northern section. In 1790 the free States contained a total population of 1,968,000; that of the slave States, at the same time, was 1,961,000. The difference between the free and slave States was, therefore, only 7,000 at the period of the inauguration of the Government—a difference so trifling as to be unworthy of notice; so that, for practical purposes, the two sections were equal in numbers. But, after the lapse of sixty years, how stands the case? In 1850, when the last general census was taken, the total population of the free States was 13,526,000; that of the slave States was 9,651,000—showing a difference in favor of the former of 3,875,000—a number exceeding half of the white population of the South.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear what gentlemen have to say in explanation of this striking difference in the progress of the two sections. It cannot be alleged that the South has been hedged within its original limits, while the North has expanded its area. So far from that being the case, the fact is well known that the expansion of the area of slavery had been, up to 1850, greater than that of freedom—much greater.

You say that the difference has resulted from immigration to the northern section of the Union. Well, admit it; and then tell me why has immigration sought the cold and inhospitable North, and avoided the genial South? Such has not been the ordinary course of events. History teaches us the contrary lesson, that the current of emigration naturally, or habitually flows from north to south. The southern nations of Europe have been overrun time and again by swarms of northern barbarians; and the Chinese have been subject to similar inundations. The present dynasty is descended from northern conquerors, who overran the country some four or five centuries ago. It is true, that in modern times civilization has grown too strong to be overthrown by wandering barbarians, and we no longer have occasion to dread the inroads of an Attila or Genghis Khan. The swarming of nations is now conducted in a legitimate and peaceful manner by the aid of commercial ships and emigrant aid companies. But still, the tendency of the human tide, where no serious obstacle interposes, is from the north to the south or southwest. I can conceive of but one reason for the exception to which I have adverted in the case of European emigration to this continent, namely, that slavery repels the merchant, the manufacturer, the mechanic, and even the common laborer, unless he be a slave. It repels by its odious presence, by its despotic intolerance, by the insult it casts upon labor, and by the still more substantial consideration that it offers no employment.

Slaveholders rarely ever employ free labor if they can avoid it. They say, and say truly, that it causes the slave to feel his chains, and to grow restive, to place him by the side of the free laborer who receives wages for his toil. In addition to this, the free laborer, who is thus reduced to the level of a slave, becomes sensible of his degradation and becomes mean. He prompts the slave to steal, and, perhaps, to run away. The slaveholder is disgusted with such employes, and resolves never to have one on his plantation again if he can avoid it. He, at the same time, rashly jumps to the conclusion that the employment of free labor, in the free States, must work as badly as he has found it to do where it is degraded by competition with slavery; and he hence becomes a clamorous champion of the barbarous and unjust system which has reduced his State and section, in spite of their natural advantages, to a condition of inferiority.

It is true that the North owes its superior numerical strength to immigration; but immigrants flock to the North and avoid the South because the northern institution of freedom invites and employs them. Can any gentleman present doubt that it is slavery, and not climate, which repels European and northern emigrants? If there be such here I invite them to look at California. That great State embraces the latitude of our Atlantic States, from Massachusetts to Florida; while its most populous portion is in the latitude of Virginia and North Carolina.

But this is not all. The fact is well known, not only to men of science, but common experience has brought it to the notice of all, that countries on the Pacific coast are eight or ten degrees milder in climate than those on the Atlantic; so that in point of fact, San Francisco is as free from extreme cold as New Orleans or Savannah; and the temperature of that section of the State which, as I have said, is in the latitude of Virginia, corresponds to that of Florida or southern Texas. These facts, in regard to the climate of California, will not be disputed. But how stands the case as to the population? It is well known that the great bulk of its inhabitants are natives of the free States or foreign countries. The South sent out a few hundred aspiring politicians, and a few thousand gold-hunters; but at least nine tenths of the population went out from the sources above indicated.

Here, then, we see the natural proneness of northern nations to emigrate southwardly; and a more striking confirmation of the views presented a few days ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as to the practicability of colonizing Nicaragua from the North.

The time which I have already consumed, precludes me from going into a history of the Kansas question; but I propose briefly to draw the attention of the committee to a few prominent facts. The people of Kansas have been severely censured by the friends of the Administration, and by others who profess great moderation on this question of slavery extension, because they have refused to vote under the laws passed by a usurping Legislature. Even the ultra champions of slavery have raised their hands in holy horror at the factious spirit exhibited by the free-State men in thus refusing to exercise the elective franchise. The exhibition of solicitude by such men in behalf of the free-State cause was enough, of itself, to excite suspicion; and the event has shown that their only object was to get the free State men committed to the legality of the system of fraud and usurpation which has been imposed upon them by ruffian intervention from a neighboring State, under the patronage and protection of the Federal Government. The fact is notorious that the most unscrupulous ruffians, and murderers of free-State men have been appointed to office, not only by the late but by the present Administration.

The free-State men refused to give the slightest recognition to the usurpation by voting under it until last October, when they determined to get possession of the Territorial Legislature. They had grown strong enough to take care of themselves; to repel border-ruffian interference; and to triumph over all opposition. The result showed that they constitute an overwhelming majority of the population of Kansas. They elected three fourths of both branches of the Legislature; and there is every reason to believe that if a perfectly fair vote were taken, they would elect a unanimous Legislature. But the frauds which the unscrupulous desperadoes attempted to perpetrate in Johnson and McGee counties, are unmistakable indications of the character of the men with whom the friends of freedom have had to contend.

We are all familiar with those frauds. We have the authority of Governor Walker, a Mississippian, selected for the station on account of his devotion to the South, for the facts in the case. The county of Johnson was never heard of until we heard that one of its several precincts cast a vote equal to that of any one of a majority of the counties in the southern States. I quote the material portions of Governor Walker's official proclamation in relation to it. He says:

"This question arises upon the extraordinary returns made from the precinct of Oxford, in the county of Johnson. What purport to be the returns of the election held at that precinct on the 5th and 6th instant, have been received by the Secretary, containing sixteen hundred and twenty-eight names of pretended voters, or nearly one half the number given in the whole representative district. The disposition to be made of this supposed vote is rendered important by the fact that the political character of the Legislative Assembly will be controlled by the addition of three Councilmen and eight Representatives to the strength of one party or the other, according to the adoption or rejection of the returns in question.

"In point of fact, it is well known that even the whole county of Johnson, comprising, as it does, part of an Indian reserve, which, upon examination of the law, we find is not yet subject to a settlement or preemption, can give no such vote as that which is represented to have been polled at this inconceivable precinct of Oxford. But while this unofficial knowledge, well established and universal as it may be, could not become the ground of decision and action upon election returns in themselves regular and authentic, the legitimate effect of an apparent enormity, such as that in question, would necessarily be to induce a close examination of the paper presented, and to require for its acceptance a perfect compliance with all the essential provisions of the law. Such an examination of this document, conscientiously and impartially made, has brought us to the conclusion that the returns from Oxford precinct, in Johnson county, must be wholly rejected, for the following reasons:

"1st. It does not appear on the face of the document presented to us, or in any other manner, that the judges of election took the oath imperatively required by the statute, to secure the 'impartial discharge of their duties according to law.'

"2d. It does not appear that the paper presented to us was one of the two original poll-books kept at the election, as required by law; but, on the contrary, it does appear, from unmistakable internal evidence, that the paper is either a copy of some other document, or has been made up for the occasion, and is not the genuine record of the votes taken at the election. The law required one of the poll-books to be returned to the Secretary, the other to be deposited with the clerk of the board of commissioners of the proper county.

"3d. As the vote of each elector was to be recorded for each one of twenty-two candidates, and in more than a hundred cases for twenty-five, and that by a viva voce vote, it was a physical impossibility that the number of votes pretended to have been taken on the second day, being more than fifteen hundred, with the name of the voter written, and each of twenty-two candidates properly designated, could have been taken and recorded within the time prescribed by law.

"4th. It is an extraordinary fact, tending to throw distrust upon the whole proceeding, that, of the sixteen hundred and twenty-eight votes, only one is given to the Delegate elect to Congress; and only one hundred and twenty-four are recorded as having been cast for the local candidates of the township.

"Influenced by these considerations, and impressed with the great responsibility resting upon us in regard to the fairness of the election, and its freedom from all fraud susceptible of detection and prevention, within the scope of our duties, we deemed it essential to truth and justice that we should ascertain every fact calculated to refute or confirm the conclusions derived from the face of the papers. Accordingly, we went to the precinct of Oxford, (which is a village with six houses, including stores, and without a tavern,) and ascertained from the citizens of that vicinity, and especially those of the handsome adjacent village of New Santa Fé, in Missouri, (separated only by a street, and containing about twenty houses,) that altogether not more than one tenth the number of persons represented to have voted were present on the two days of the election; much the smaller number, not exceeding thirty or forty, being present on the last day, when more than fifteen hundred votes are represented as having been given. The people of Oxford, as well as those of the neighboring village of Santa Fe, were astounded at the magnitude of the returns; and all persons, of all parties, in both places, treated the whole affair with derision or indignation, not having heard the alleged result until several days after it had occurred.

"In the course of our journey to and from Oxford, we passed over much the larger part of the county of Johnson, and we became satisfied that there is no population in the whole county from which more than one third the vote of that single precinct could have been given. We learn that some very few persons, having cabins on the reserve in Johnson county, and claiming a residence therein, though generally absent, had voted at some of the precincts in that county; but we are convinced that a very inconsiderable number, not reaching, we believe, one hundred of Missourians, or any other persons having no admitted right to vote, did claim or attempt to exercise that right, anywhere within that county."

I must remark here that since Governor Walker's proclamation was issued, it has been ascertained by an examination of the names returned on the poll-books, that they were literally transcribed from an old Cincinnati Directory. It is even said that the name of the present Republican Governor of Ohio, who at the time the directory was compiled resided in Cincinnati, is put down on the list of those who voted for the pro-slavery ticket!

The Governor threw out these fraudulent returns, because they were not only fraudulent but illegal, and gave the certificates of election to the free-State candidates. He pursued the same course in reference to the enormous returns of McGee county; which, with a population of from one to two hundred, returned a thousand or twelve hundred majority for the pro-slavery ticket. Governor Walker took the stump in behalf of the pro-slavery ticket, I repeat, but he was not so depraved as to lend the sanction of his name to these infamous frauds. And what has been the consequence? We all know it. He has been hunted and hounded by the propagandists of slavery, and frowned upon by the Administration, until he has been constrained to resign. A southern man, a slaveholder, going to Kansas as the special representative of slavery, he has now been compelled to vacate his post, because his sense of honor and duty would not permit him to countenance frauds as barfaced and infamous as ever felon swung for at Tyburn.

The virtual sanction which the Administration has given to these frauds shows a well settled purpose of making Kansas a slave State at all hazards. If open force will not answer the purpose then trickery must be resorted to.

But it failed in securing a majority of the Territorial Legislature, and the disappointed conspirators were determined to profit by the lesson of experience. They resolved to secure a pro-slavery constitution by the same system of manufacturing votes, which, but for the honorable conduct of Governor Walker, would have given them the control of the Legislature. To accomplish this end they resorted to two cunning expedients. Whether they were concocted in Washington, as has been surmised, or are indigenous to the soil of Lecompton, I will not undertake to say; but it would be difficult to conceive of devices better suited to the emergency.

The first of these tricks is the show of compliance with the doctrine of popular sovereignty, by pretending to submit the slavery clause to the popular vote.

It is well known that Judge DOWELL, the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, insisted, while advocating its passage, that slavery, like all other matters, should be under the control of the people of the Territory. This was all he claimed in regard to it. He "rang the changes" upon this point in every imaginable way, insisting, while the people were allowed to legislate and make constitutions affecting all the other relations of life, of parent and child, of guardian and ward, of landlord and tenant, of master and servant or apprentice, that they should have the same right to legislate in regard to negroes. But the Lecompton convention, in flagrant disregard of this loudly proclaimed doctrine of popular sovereignty, have submitted only one clause of their constitution to the popular ratification; and, as I shall presently show, even that is only seemingly submitted. Their schedule provided that the people should be called upon to vote, on the 21st of December last, for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery. Those who chose to avail themselves of the privilege of voting were therefore compelled to vote for the constitution or not vote at all. That constitution contains several clauses which are highly objectionable to a large number of the people of Kansas—to a majority, indeed; but, whether it does or not, the convention and Congress have no right to force it upon the people without their consent. If it were the best constitution that the wit of man could devise, it would be an outrage to impose it upon an unwilling people.

But, in point of fact, the existence or non-existence of slavery was not submitted at all, for it is provided in another separate clause, that under no circumstances shall the relation of master and slave be disturbed, whatever be the result of the election upon the slavery clause. The perpetual existence of slavery is secured; and the sham of voting only amounts to this: that the constitution without slavery is to be understood as prohibiting the introduction of more slaves. I will proceed to show, from southern authorities, that this is the case, and that some go so far as to declare that the constitution without slavery is a better pro-slavery instrument than the constitution with slavery. A correspondent of the Jackson Mississippiian, writing from Lecompton on the 27th November last, says:

"Thus you see that whilst, by submitting the question in this form, they are bound to have a ratification of one or the other, and that whilst it seems to be an election between a free-State and pro-slavery constitution, it is in fact but a question of the future introduction of slavery that is in controversy; and yet it furnishes our friends in Congress a basis on which to rest their vindication of the admission of Kansas as a State under it into the Union: while they would not have it, sent directly from the convention."

"It is the very best proposition for making Kansas a slave State that was submitted for the consideration of the convention. In addition to what I have stated, it embraces a provision continuing in force all existing laws of the Territory until repealed by the Legislature of the State to be elected under the provisions of this constitution."

The Charleston Mercury entertains similar opinions, as will be seen by the following:

"We are equally satisfied with the action of the convention. We differ, too, with the President as to what is submitted to the vote of the people. We do not think that the question of slavery or no slavery is submitted to the vote of the people. Whether the clause in the constitution is voted out or voted in, slavery exists and has a guarantee in the constitution that it shall not be interfered with; whilst, if the slavery party in Kansas can keep or get the majority of the Legislature, they may open wide the door for the immigration of slaves. But this, also, is a small matter of difference with the President."

The second expedient to which I have adverted, by which the Lecompton conspirators hoped to triumph over the people, is the submission of the returns of election, not to the Governor of the Territory, as heretofore, but to the president of the convention, Calhoun. It was reasonably concluded that he would readily sanction any return of votes that might be brought up from Johnson and McGee counties; and accordingly we learn that, on the 21st of December, Johnson actually gave nearly two thousand majority to the pro-slavery clause! No doubt that McGee has done equally as well.

It is amazing to witness the coolness with which the friends of the Administration insist that Congress is bound to admit Kansas into the Union under this infamously fraudulent constitution, which was conceived in sin and hatched in iniquity. The convention itself, even if the election of the delegates had been fair, had no authority to force a constitution upon the people, for the reason that the Territorial Legislature had no authority to call it into existence. At the best, it is merely a voluntary affair; and although it might be admitted that its assemblage was legal, it had no legal authority. Any popular convention which abstains from breaking the peace, is legal. The late free-State conventions at Lawrence were legal; but, like the Lecompton convention, they had no authority to impose a constitution upon the people. Either might propose a constitution, but neither possessed the right to establish one. I proceed to illustrate this point on the authority of General Jackson's Administration. In the case of Arkansas, backed by that of James Buchanan himself in the case of Michigan. The cases were parallel, and the testimonies of these authorities are explicit and to the point. General Jackson referred the Arkansas case to the Secretary of State, and the latter asked the advice of the Attorney General, Mr. Butler. He gave it as follows, which determined the policy of the President in the premises:

"Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, or to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the government of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

"If I am right in the foregoing opinion, it will then follow that the course of the Governor, in declining to call together the Territorial Legislature for the purpose in question, was such as his legal duties required; and that the views he has expressed in his public address, and also in his official communication to yourself, so far as they indicate an intention not to sanction or concur in any legislative or other proceedings towards the formation of a State government until Congress shall have authorized it, are also correct."

"No law has yet been passed by Congress which either expressly or impliedly gives to the people of Arkansas the authority to form a State government."

"For the reasons above stated, I am, therefore, of opinion that the inhabitants of that Territory have not at present, and that they cannot acquire otherwise than by an act of Congress, the right to form such a government."

The testimony of Mr. Buchanan in the case of Michigan is equally explicit. He advocates the policy of recognizing what the people had done voluntarily, without an enabling act; but he distinctly denied the authority of the territorial Legislature to call a convention. He said:

"We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously in such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with parental care, to nurse them with kindness, and when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are: do they contain a sufficient population? Have they adopted a republican constitution? And are they waiting to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

This, one would suppose, should be conclusive with those who profess a profound reverence for whatever emanates from the White House; but I am sorry to say, that the President's bosom friend in the other wing of the Capitol has already impaired the value of the authority by pleading the statute of limitations in his behalf.

The more recent facts in the history of the Kansas question are too fresh in the recollection of the committee to need repetition by me. We all know that Calhoun, the president of the convention, invited acting Governor Denver, together with the presiding officers of the two branches of the Territorial Legislature, to join him in counting the votes. The latter have made an official and authoritative statement of the result; which we have all read. According to that statement the free-State party carried everything on the 4th of January, electing State officers, a majority of the Legislature, and the Representative to Congress. They, at the same time and places, under the authority of the existing Territorial Legislature, held a separate election, in order to test the sense of the people in regard to the constitution, and the acting Governor has certified that more than ten thousand votes were cast against its adoption. The pro-slavery party, conscious of its weakness in a fair election, with honest men to count and receive the votes, refrained entirely from voting.

But Calhoun was not to be thwarted. He alleged some informality in making the returns from one of the counties or precincts, and at the same time produced returns from a place called Delaware Crossing, which entirely changed the result and gave a majority to the pro-slavery party. These last returns have since been proven to be entirely fraudulent. Out of forty-nine votes actually cast, the unscrupulous tools of the party in power manufactured three hundred and forty-nine; and then, lest the fraud should be detected and exposed, hid the returns in a wood pile!

Such, Mr. Chairman, is a brief outline of the history of this Lecompton constitution. I have no room for the details; but I will venture to assert that a free people were never defrauded of their rights by expedients more base and shameless. History is filled with records of crime and misgovernment; but the atrocities of tyrants, invested with the supreme power, are what the world has been accustomed to look for. When the people are not recognized as the rightful source of power, it would be unreasonable to expect a uniform adherence to the rules of equity; but, in the history of well-established constitutional Governments, such as England, for the last hundred and sixty years, or the United States up to the period of the last Administration, no parallel can be found to the criminal misgovernment of Kansas.

The President of the United States, in his late message, has assumed the responsibility for this fraud; he has shouldered this load of infamy, and it will stick to him to his grave. He has taken it upon himself willingly, knowingly, and guiltily, against the earnest remonstrances of those who were mainly instrumental in his election, and he cannot now, if he would, lay it down. It has broken down his Administration in the first year of its existence; it has destroyed his good name, and blasted his last faint hope of a continuance of power.

Mr. Chairman, we often hear Fourth of July orators use the steam-engine and the railroad cars as the types and symbols of American progress; and it must be admitted that the symbols hold as good for our progress in political corruption and decay as in material or intellectual advancement. Greece maintained her liberties some five or six hundred years; Rome some seven hundred, before demagogues, turned tyrants, learned to govern the Empire with despotic sway, under the forms of republicanism. Our modern demagogues have excelled the ancient as much as the appliances of modern travel surpass those of the Augustan age. In the first century of the American Republic, in spite of our boasted general education, our freedom of the press and of speech, our holy Christian religion and high civilization, they have learned to play the despot—I might almost say the Nero—under the forms of constitutional government. Had we a large standing army, such as was maintained by Rome in the days of her corruption and decline, there can be no doubt that, like her, we should be subjected to the ignominious yoke of a despot chosen by our Prætorian bands, and in the same manner, by public sale at auction. But, thank God, we have no such army of mercenaries; and it is to be hoped we never shall have. There can be no doubt that we have demagogues bold enough, cunning enough, and base enough to pervert the whole machinery of our republican system, and to establish the same despotic rule in the States which they have kept up in Kansas for the last three or four years.

But, sir, I must draw my remarks to a close. I have already occupied the time of the committee longer than I desired; but I have found it impossible to compress into a shorter space the many things which I felt it incumbent on me to say upon this fruitful topic. I regard the struggle for liberty in Kansas as a momentous one; but the final result I cannot permit myself to doubt. Truth and right, though crushed to the earth a thousand times, will rise again; and they must and will prevail.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I propose to offer in favor of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, I hope to confine myself closely to that question. I do not desire to follow the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARRELL] in his justification of slavery; nor the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] in his bitter denunciations of that institution; nor the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. BURROUGHS] in his remarks upon the condition of the working classes North and South. These questions are not necessarily involved in the issue now before the country. All parties and all classes have their difficulties to overcome, their social and political diseases to heal; and he who does most to soothe and relieve the unfortunate, without regard to class or locality, will best merit the rewards due to the philanthropist. But, sir, in all measures of relief, the general good must be considered, and this involves the investigation of other rights besides those belonging peculiarly to one class, or one color, or one locality. Our Government was organized to secure the greatest good to the greatest number; not for special legislation. By a reference to the debates in the convention that formed our Federal Constitution, this will clearly appear; and it will also appear, that the great statesmen of that day were sufficiently liberal and national to consider the rights and interests of our common country as of greater importance than any geographical or local feeling. It appears to me that the same spirit would now enable us to settle all questions of difference between the North and the South permanently, and to the entire satisfaction of the country in a short time.

In this spirit I desire to address the House; and in the consideration of this question, I trust that I may be able to rise above all sectional feeling and all local prejudice; that while representing the people of my district, I may not the less act as a member of the Congress of the confederated States. If these feelings prevail, it appears to me that we cannot fail to settle our present difficulties upon a just and proper basis; but if the reverse exist, all reasoning will prove fruitless, and all labor unavailing.

It is a part of the policy of our Government to create territorial governments when required to protect the infant settlements in the West and Southwest; and also, when these Territories acquire a sufficient population, to admit them as States into this Union; thus giving them all the rights and privileges of the oldest and largest States in the Confederation. In order to understand what these privileges and rights are, it is necessary to inquire into the compact between the States. By the Constitution all are equal in the Union. The sovereign character of each State is equally represented in the Senate, while the people or citizens of each are represented in this, the popular branch of Congress. In the one instance, the State, the delegated sovereignty of the people, is represented, and in the other, the people themselves; but in both, their rights are mutual and their obligations the same. This happy adjustment was not effected without labor and many patriotic concessions on the part of the great and good men appointed by the different States for that purpose.

One of the chief difficulties met in the formation "of a more perfect union," when it was found that the Articles of Confederation were imperfect, arose out of the disposition of the Crown lands, as the public domain was then denominated. The States within whose limits these lands were located, claimed them; while the others contended that they had been wrested from the de throne authority by the equal and common exertions of all; and therefore, that all of the States were equally interested in them. "The lands being of vast extent and of growing value," Madison writes, "were the occasion of much discussion and heart-burning, and proved the most obstinate of the impediments to an earlier consummation of the plan of a Federal Government."

This difficulty was finally disposed of by the action of the State of Virginia, which, with a noble prodigality, gave up her vast western domain for the good of the infant Republic; while New York, in the same glorious spirit, in order to settle another vexed question, authorized the Federal Government to collect nine tenths of the national revenue within her ports; and the other States, North and South, uniting in the same patriotic feelings, gave and accepted all that was necessary to secure "a more perfect union," and promote the general good. All this was done in good faith, and as equals in the great brotherhood in which all their hopes for the future were involved.

By the magnanimity of New York and Virginia, the ratification of the Constitution was secured; and by it, the members of the Confederation took an equal interest in the unoccupied or public territory of the country—not only in that then belonging to us, but to all that we might afterwards acquire by the common efforts and the common treasury of the States. An equal right to the territory in the most comprehensive significance of the word; an equal right in its government, and above all, and more important than all else, an equal right to settle upon it, and to develop its resources; and, as a necessary consequence, to carry their property, their institutions, and political feelings with them, whenever and wherever they might choose to go into said territory.

This brings us directly to the great question involved in the admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution. It is not the frauds and acts of violence committed in that unfortunate Territory alone, which give importance to this question; not these, but the great constitutional question of equality between the States in the Union; and the other questions involved in the right of self-government and local legislation, which, by the special pleading of dishonorable, of quibbling, and of desperate politicians, have been reduced to this single issue.

The southern States go back to the original compact, and claim their rights and privileges as guaranteed by it. They insist, and properly insist, upon a full and unequivocal acknowledgment of their equality in the Union; while certain States in the North refuse to keep the conditions of the fundamental law, repudiate their solemn contract, and, in open violation of it, seek to defeat its provisions. It is true that they have not attempted to interfere with the local legislation of the southern States directly; but indirectly they have done so.

These remarks are not strictly applicable to the honorable gentlemen around me, who are opposed to the Lecompton constitution on the grounds of irregularity and fraud. But gentlemen overlook the fact that these difficulties have been intentionally created by interested parties, for the purpose of producing just what we now see: an increased excitement throughout the country, and a division in the Democratic party, which, up to the present period, has under all circumstances, and at every critical period of our political history, proved itself eminently national.

The history of this Kansas difficulty develops one fact more distinctly than any other; it stands out on every page, is recorded in every step of its unfortunate progress; which is the fact that the Republicans, inside and outside of Kansas, do not desire its admission into the Union, at present, under any constitution, or any state of circumstances. Their partisans in the Territory have always refused to act in a regular and legal manner. Whenever a fair issue has been tendered to them, they have evaded it by flying off into some unjustifiable and treasonable conspiracy to defeat the wishes of the people and the settlement of this question; not individually, but collectively and on deliberation, thus clearly showing their party policy in this matter.

What are the facts in the case? In May, 1854, Congress passed an act establishing a territorial government in Kansas. Under this act, a Governor, Secretary, and other officers, were appointed by the President; and a Delegate to Congress and a Territorial Legislature were elected by the people of the Territory. Fully and fairly the whole machinery of a territorial government was established—established by the concurrent action of the Federal Government and the people of the Territory. The Legislature thus elected was duly organized, and had full power, by virtue of the act creating it, to pass all laws necessary for the protection of persons and property, and to perform all other legislative acts, subordinate to the Constitution only. In the language of Governor Walker, in his inaugural address—

"That convention is now about to be elected by you, under the call of the Territorial Legislature, created and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress; and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States. Those who oppose this course cannot aver the alleged irregularity of the Territorial Legislature, whose laws, in town and city elections, in corporate franchises, and on all other subjects but slavery, they acknowledge by their votes and acquiescence."

The Legislature was undoubtedly acknowledged and acquiesced in. It is true that the Republicans charge that the citizens of Missouri went into the Territory and carried the election in favor of the pro-slavery party. However this may have been, it appears that the legality of a subsequent election, with the same result, was fully recognized by a Republican House of Representatives, in the contest between Whitfield and Reeder. But, independent of that decision, I think that the action of the Missourians will suffer but little in a comparison with that of the Republicans. The Missourians are not yet above the influence of bad examples, and some of them may have learned the political tricks of their new acquaintances; but I think the facts prove that a large majority of their number had located in the Territory with the intention of becoming residents.

They generally located lands, and commenced the improvements necessary for the support and protection of their families. This is the evidence of their intention.

What are the facts connected with the invaders from the northern States? Did they become legal citizens of the Territory? Did they go there solely for the purpose of cultivating the soil, and of making it their permanent home? No, sir; the most of them were young men, without families— young and desperate men, who were regularly enlisted by abolition societies, abolition Governors of the northern States, and mischief-making priests, by whom they were armed with Sharpe's rifles, equipped with the munitions of war, and paid by the month for their dishonorable, revolutionary, and treasonable services; precisely as the Hessians and other mercenaries were paid by the English in their attempt to defeat our independence.

As this is a grave charge, it is proper to examine the evidence on which it is made. In the first place, we find that societies were openly organized in the North for the avowed purpose of collecting funds and enlisting men to go there; that committees were appointed to receive contributions; and that public calls were made for money to defray the expenses so incurred; that arms were publicly presented to persons about starting to the scene of war, with the injunction to make them felt. Loud and eloquent declamation was heard from the pulpit—the voice of men wearing the livery of heaven, while ministering to the worst passions of our nature, and secretly fomenting sectional war. These are some of the evidences by which we can judge their friends outside. What are the facts within the Territory? Governor Walker says, in his official letter of the 15th of July last:

"In order to send this communication by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this Territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by eastern societies, having in view results most disastrous to the Government and to the Union."

And again he says:

"Lawrence is the hot-bed of all the abolition movements in the Territory. It is the town established by the abolition societies of the East; and whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by abolition societies to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question."

This is the testimony of Governor Walker; and gentlemen will not complain if we attach a little more credit to the official acts of a Governor than we do to the politician acting and speaking for ulterior objects. The Governor goes on to say:

"I am satisfied that a large portion of the insurrectionary party in the Territory do not desire the peaceful settlement of this question, but wish it to remain open in order to agitate the country for years to come."

But let us ascertain whether Governor Walker is sustained by the facts. Did the Republicans go into the Territory and locate farms and begin their improvement as if they intended to reside there permanently, and honestly earn a subsistence? No; the history of the Territory proves the contrary. They located towns and villages, without a country to support them; they established no legitimate business; paid no attention to the means of support, and, contrary to all experience in the West, embarked in politics the moment of their arrival. Sir, this was their business, that which they had been hired to perform; and with how reckless a disposition have these mercenaries done their work!

It was their business to locate villages, and to make them (as Governor Walker says of Lawrence) the seats of the agitation which disturbed the Territory—the fruitful nurseries of rebellion and treason. It was their business to organize a militia, and take violent possession of the Territory, and to rebel against all laws, human and divine. These northern invaders were not there as citizens, located not as citizens locate, and have proved by their acts that they had no such object in view. It may well become such men to charge the Missourians with trespass and wrong. Sir, their charges remind us of the deceptive cry of the flying thief, to "stop the thief!" They have too long deceived the police of the country—too long evaded the punishment they have so fully earned.

Immediately after the establishment of the territorial government the Republicans attempted to establish a revolutionary government under the Topeka constitution. They refused obedience to the laws of Congress and of their own Legislature in all points affecting slavery, and began an illegal opposition to the Federal authority, in which they have steadily persevered. But they say that the Legislature was irregular, and had no power to call a convention. Congress, however, has repeatedly recognized the territorial government as regular. Governor Walker, in his inaugural address of the 27th May, 1857, says:

"The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States; and in opposing it, you resist the authority of the Federal Government. That Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation." * * * "and many of its acts are now in operation here by universal assent."

This Legislature, recognized, and undoubtedly legal in its organization, adopted measures in July, 1855, to submit the question of a State government to the people. In the election then provided for, the people decided almost unanimously in favor of the organization of a State government preparatory to their admission into the Union. Afterwards, on the 19th day of February, 1857, their Legislature passed an act providing for a registry of the voters, and for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. In the performance of this duty the Legislature exercised no rights or powers not given to it by the act creating the territorial government, and not legitimately within its constitutional authority. For this purpose it was called into existence by the organic act; for this purpose it was clothed with the sovereign power of the people.

The bill providing for the registry of the voters was fair and just in all its provisions. For reference, I desire to insert the synopsis of that act, as published in the report of the Senate Committee on Territories:

"Sec. 1. Sheriffs are required, between the 1st of March and 1st of April, 1857, to make an enumeration; have power to appoint deputies, who shall take oath, &c."

"Sec. 2. In case of vacancy in office of sheriff the probate judge shall perform his duty; and in case of vacancy in both, the Governor shall appoint some competent resident to perform said duty."

"Sec. 3. Officers, as above, shall file in office of probate judge a complete list of all qualified voters resident in his county or district, on the 1st of April, 1857."

"Sec. 4. Copies of said list to be posted in public places."

"Sec. 5. Probate judge to continue court from receipt of said returns to 1st of May, for the purpose of correcting them."

"Sec. 6. Lists of legal voters, as corrected, to be returned to the Governor and Secretary, and distributed generally."

"Sec. 7. Upon completion of census, apportionment of members to be made by the Governor and Secretary, according to the registered voters. Number of representatives to be sixty."

"Sec. 8. Election for members of the constitutional convention shall be held on the third Monday in June; and no one, unless registered, shall vote."

"Sec. 9. County commissioners shall appoint the places of voting, judges of elections, &c."

"Sec. 10. Judges of election are required to be sworn; also the clerks, and duplicate returns of election shall be made and certified by them."

"Sec. 11. Every bona fide inhabitant of Kansas, on the third Monday of June, 1857, being a citizen of the United States, and over twenty-one years of age, whose residence in the county where he offers to vote shall have been three months next before said election, shall be entitled to vote."

"Sec. 12. Persons authorized to take the census to administer oaths, &c."

"Sec. 13 provides for the punishment of unlawful attempts to influence voters."

"Sec. 14 provides punishment for illegal voting."

"Sec. 15 provides punishment for those who fraudulently hinder a free expression of the popular vote."

"Sec. 16. Delegates are required to assemble in convention at the capital on the first Monday of September next."

"Sec. 17 provides for an election by the convention of its officers."

"Sec. 18 in relation to the salaries of sheriffs and other officers."

"Sec. 19 relative to the location of the election districts."

"Sec. 20 requires all votes to be visa voce."

This bill was vetoed by the Governor of the Territory, because it did not require the convention to submit the constitution, when framed, to the people for adoption or rejection. On its return to the Legislature, it was adopted, on a reconsideration, by a two-thirds vote, and became a law. The action of the Legislature on that point was undoubtedly correct; it had no right to embarrass the convention with a provision of that character. It was the duty of the Legislature to call the convention, in obedience to the express will of the people, and to leave the constitution, and the question of its submission, to the delegates selected by the people for the consideration of that subject. Beyond this the Legislature had no authority to go. It would have been an assumption of power in the Legislature to attempt to control the action of a convention fresh from the people.

I now return to the registration of the voters, under the act of February, 1857. It appears from an examination of the law, that every reasonable provision had been made to secure a faithful registry, and to correct all errors that might occur. It is charged, however, by the Republicans, that the registry was not faithfully performed—that their friends were not enrolled; and hence, that the election was not a fair expression of the people of the Territory; and they charge that this wrong was perpetrated upon them for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority. The complaint was made by them to acting Governor Stanton, by letter dated April 25, 1857. The Governor's reply, dated April 30, 1857, covers the whole ground, and is an answer to their unjust complaints. He says:

"It is not my purpose to reply to your statement of facts. I cannot do so from any personal knowledge enabling me either to admit or deny them. I may say, however, I have heard statements quite as authentic as your own, and in some instances from members of your own party, (Republicans,) to the effect that your political friends have very generally—indeed, almost universally—refused to participate in the pending proceedings for registering the names of the legal voters. In some instances they have given fictitious names, and in numerous others they refused to give any names at all. You cannot deny that your party have heretofore resolved not to take part in the registration, and it appears to me that, without indulging ungenerous suspicions of the integrity of officers, you might well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs to the existence of this well-known and controlling fact."

Governor Walker entirely exculpates the Legislature from fault in this matter. It was the neglect of the local officers, in his view, and was not anticipated by the Territorial Legislature. It is true that Governor Walker spoke of this matter in a tone a little different in his letter of resignation; but it must not be forgotten that in one instance the Governor wrote as a conservative man, seeking the peace and harmony of the Territory, and the proper adjustment of all their difficulties; while in the latter instance, Mr. Walker wrote as a heated politician, in opposition to the Administration, and in the hope that "something might turn up."

But, suppose that the Republicans had a large vote in the non-registered counties, as alleged in Governor Walker's letter of resignation, it could have made no difference in the result. The Republicans refused to be registered in counties where the registry was made, and refused to vote after the registration, and certainly the registry made no difference to them.

But Mr. Walker says:

"In such counties where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry."

There would be much force in this argument if it were not for the fact that the Republicans refused to vote as a party, and not individually. They refused to vote after their convention had determined that they should not vote, in which the Republicans of these non-registered counties were represented. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that their course would have differed from that of their partisans in the registered counties.

Mr. Chairman, the cause of the imperfect registry is most clearly shown in Mr. Stanton's letter; shown, sir, by the testimony of Republicans who were present, and participated in that most extraordinary political movement. In our courts of law, no one is permitted to take advantage of his own wrong; but this is the plea made by the Republicans. They refused to be registered in some instances, and in others they gave fictitious names; and they now complain that the registration was not fully and fairly made, and protest against it as a gross fraud upon the rights of the people. Sir, the history of this matter proves most conclusively that the Republicans did not desire to settle the question at the ballot-box. Their contest was, and is still, with the Federal Government, and not with the pro-slavery men in the Territory. Their object was to defeat the action of Congress and the Administration in their territorial organization, and the legislation of the country. In Governor Walker's proclamation to the people of Lawrence, of July 15, 1857, he uses the following language:

"You have, however, chosen to disregard the laws of Congress and of the territorial government created by it; and, whilst professing to acknowledge a State government rejected by Congress, and which can therefore now exist only by a successful rebellion, and exacting from all your officers the perilous and sacrilegious oath to support the so-called State constitution; yet you have, even in defiance of the so-called State Legislature, which refused to grant you a charter, proceeded to create a local government of your own, based only upon insurrection and revolution. The very oath which you require from all your officers to support your so-called Topeka State constitution, is violated in the very act of putting in operation a charter rejected even by them. A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country."

"Permit me to call your attention, as still claiming to be citizens of the United States, to the results of your revolutionary proceedings. You are inaugurating rebellion and revolution; you are disregarding the laws of Congress and of the territorial government, and defying their authority; you are conspiring to overthrow the Government of the United States in this Territory. Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason." "I appeal once more to your reason and patriotism. I ask you in the name of our common country, in the name of the Constitution and of the Union, to desist from this rebellion. I appeal once more to your love of country, to your regard for its peace, prosperity, and reputation, to your affection for your wives and children, and to all those patriotic motives which ought to influence American citizens, to abandon this contemplated revolution. If you have wrongs, redress them through the peaceful instrumentality of the ballot-box, in the mode prescribed by the laws of your country."

This appeal was not noticed; and the citizens of Lawrence followed up their rebellion by the destruction of houses and other property belonging to conservative citizens of Franklin, a small place four miles distant from Lawrence; and by driving these citizens from the Territory. These acts, connected as they were with the revolutionary government of Lawrence, induced Governor Walker to order the troops to take their position near that place.

Governor Walker says, in his letter of the 26th September, 1857, to the Secretary of State:

"This movement is rendered necessary by the facts stated in my address of the 16th instant; but is also made with a view to protect the polls from violence, not only in the city of Lawrence, but also in the town of Franklin, but four miles distant, which is a voting precinct, and which has been marked during the present month, since the withdrawal of the troops, by the burning of the houses of conservative citizens, and their expulsion from Kansas."

The presence of the troops had the desired effect; the rebels in Lawrence changed their position and their language. We find a most flattering description of their integrity in Governor Walker's proclamation of the 10th September, 1857. Here is his commentary upon these injured patriots, these guardians of the elective franchise, these precious sentinels of freedom:

"It will be remembered that, in open defiance of the laws of Congress and of this Territory, and after the refusal of the so-called Topeka State Legislature to grant them a charter, they nevertheless organized a city government, clothed with all the usual powers—legislative, executive, and judicial. It will be recollected, also, that after my proclamation of the 15th of July last, and the simultaneous movement of the troops there as a precautionary measure to maintain the authority of the Government, and arrest the spread of this insurrection throughout the Territory, they then professed, through their organs, that what they had called a government, and to which they had given all the powers of a government, was a mere 'voluntary association' for the removal of nuisances from the streets, &c. But now, when it was erroneously believed by them that the troops would all be removed to Utah, and not replaced by others, they have thrown off the mask, and carried out their original insurrectionary purpose by passing a compulsory tax law, both a poll and property tax, requiring its assessment and collection by the seizure and sale of property, and exacting by their charter from executive officers, who are to carry out these acts, an oath to perform all these duties, the violation of which oath, if these duties are not performed, would be perjury."

What a noble picture! How distinctly the individual character stands out! Sir, it is one worthy of the great artist who, in different lights and shades, and under all circumstances, has painted the varied complexions, positions, and actions, of this his darling people.

The facts prove, beyond a question, that these people are not to be believed; and that all their excuses for not taking part in the elections are false, and totally unworthy of consideration. The true difficulty arises from the fact that their party had opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise, because it restored the equality of the States; and when defeated in their opposition to the repealing clause, they resorted to the unjustifiable and treasonable means referred to, in order to perpetuate the unjust operation of that law. For this purpose societies were organized, first in this city, and then in the New England States, and in New York and Illinois, to supply men and money to keep up the excitement and widen the breach between the two great parties on this subject. This is the true source of the difficulty. All else are miserable pretenses.

Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that no one honest, however prejudiced, can justify such conduct. It is trifling with the dearest rights of freedom, insulting to the majesty of the laws, and highly criminal, because it jeopardizes the blessings of civil liberty. The fact that these Lawrence republicans openly denied the authority of congressional enactments, and held in contempt the laws passed by their Territorial Legislature, cannot be denied; and it is useless to attempt a justification on the grounds of irregularity or fraud on the part of the pro-slavery men. Nothing but the most outrageous tyranny, and the entire denial of justice and right, can justify their treasonable conduct.

I have the honor to represent a portion of the metropolitan police district, in the State of New York. There I have seen the chartered rights of the people taken from them by a Republican Legislature, and their local municipal laws changed, against the solemn protest of every representative elected by them. I have seen their police regulations altered by non-residents of the cities, who had no property to guard, and no rights to protect, within the district. I have seen fifteen hundred thousand citizens taxed to support officers appointed by non-residents, and who were objectionable to four fifths of the entire population. I have seen officers duly elected by the people in that district, legislated out of office by Republicans elected in and representing remote country districts; and other men appointed to fill their places by a Republican Governor, and confirmed by a Republican Senate, who have been guilty of pipe-laying and other political frauds, compared with which, all that is charged to General Calhoun, would be unworthy of consideration. All this, sir, the Democrats of the cities of New York and Brooklyn have seen and suffered at the hands of the Republicans of that State. The Democrats at first refused to submit to the invasion of their corporate rights; but when the courts of law decided against them, they quietly submitted to the laws of their State. They did not strike at the judicial power, and defame and libel the courts and judges. No, sir; they nominated and re-elected the very judge that decided against them. They sought their remedy in the ballot-box, and there they will wage their war against this Republican invasion and tyranny until their ancient liberties are reestablished. The Republicans of New York are intensely excited by the wrongs committed upon a few hundred Lawrence rebels and mercenaries; but they have no sympathy for one million and a half of their own fellow-citizens, whose rights they have invaded, and whose local government they have struck down.

But, returning to the registration of the voters in Kansas, from which I digressed. The facts that they did not wish to be registered, and would not vote where it was done, are confirmed by their refusal to vote on the constitution when it was submitted without restriction. They excuse this by alleging that they could not defeat the constitution—could not vote it down; that the constitution was not submitted to the people; but that the slavery clause only was submitted. This is confirmation stronger still that their opposition was factious—rebellious. They could have had no objection to the constitution, except as to the slavery clause; and I challenge the Republicans of this House to point out a single objection to it, beyond that single one of slavery, which is, in their opinions, objectionable. It is very like most of our State constitutions; and is equal to the best of them. The question of slavery was the only one at issue, and that was fully and fairly submitted. On this point, I desire to refer to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] made on the 30th day of June, 1856, in favor of admitting Kansas under the Topeka constitution. He says:

"Does the constitution meet the sense of the people to be affected by it? The existence of slavery was the only question upon which the people were divided, and the vote for delegates to the convention (Topeka) settled that by a majority of legal votes."—See Appendix to Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 719.

It appears from this extract that the honorable gentleman did not then think it necessary to submit the constitution, or any part of it, to the people. He must have believed that the people could delegate a portion of their sovereign power to the convention, and that they were bound by its acts. In this, I fully agree with the honorable gentleman. This doctrine of submission to the people is of modern growth; is neither ratified by time, experience, nor sound judgment. Sir, ours is a representative Government, and not a Democracy.

But what does the gentleman's party now say? That the whole instrument should have been submitted, and not merely the slavery clause; and because it was not thus submitted, the cry of "fraud!" "fraud!" is heard as loud as was the cry of "bleeding Kansas!" during the last Congress. It is a base, a vile attempt of a minority to force a constitution upon a reluctant majority. If they had a majority, why did they not submit to registration, and vote either for delegates and thus control the convention; or against the slavery clause in the constitution? The Constitution, laws, and practice of our country provide legal modes of ascertaining the will of the majority; why did they not accept this well-recognized mode, and fairly determine the question? Their conduct throughout this whole difficulty is the only answer required by the country.

Sir, the only question of importance, and on which the people differed, was fully and fairly submitted; and it was submitted precisely as they had been advised that it would be. In this there was no deception. Acting Governor Stanton informed them, in his address of the 17th April, 1857, before the election of the delegates to the convention, of the fact:

"I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institutions, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay."

Governor Walker follows this explicit statement of his Secretary, on the 27th day of May, 1857, and before the election of the delegates to the convention, in this language:

"Under our practice, the preliminary act of framing a State constitution, is uniformly performed through the instrumentality of a convention of delegates, chosen by the people themselves."

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and where ever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

It appears, from the history, that the Republicans had full notice that the slavery clause only would be submitted. In the first instance, the Legislature refused to require that it should be submitted, and passed the law over the Governor's veto on that point; secondly, Mr. Stanton's address distinctly referred to that fact. This, sir, like all their other excuses, is a miserable pretense. They had taken no part in its formation; had denied the authority of the Legislature, and elected one of their own; and had adopted a constitution of their own. Why should they talk about majorities, after the attempt to control the majority by the Topeka convention? Why talk about submitting the whole constitution to the people, after refusing to submit even the slavery restriction in their own constitution?

But, sir, it is urged by certain gentlemen in and out of Congress that Kansas cannot be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, because there was no enabling act. I believe this objection, however, is not made by the Republicans. It belongs to the honorable Senator from Illinois, the great advocate for the admission of California. The history of the country furnishes very many examples of States coming into the Union on constitutions adopted without any enabling act. The enabling act simply directs the mode for the adoption of a constitution in a legal and orderly manner; and, if this is done without an enabling act, there can be little or no objection to it. But the Kansas-Nebraska act was, in every sense of the word, an enabling act. "The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, was fully sustained by the act of Congress," is the language used by Mr. Walker; "and that it was clothed, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to call a convention for the adoption of a State constitution."

This is the opinion of a large majority of those qualified to judge; and I believe that it was freely acquiesced in by the Senator from Illinois until after his return to this city last November. However this may be, he distinctly and unreservedly held that opinion in his Springfield speech:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates, assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected, is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise."

"If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote." "Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit, and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings and in violation of their wishes."

"The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes."

After alluding to the desire of the Democratic party to carry out the principles of the organic act and bring the State into the Union, he says:

"The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected." "If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

But whether he did or did not so hold in this case can make no difference. The honorable gentleman's course on the admission of California is not, and will not be, forgotten. If his position was right on that subject, it is wrong now; and if right now, he violated a great principle then. He can select between them; but one thing is certain, he cannot reconcile the two positions. He was the eloquent and powerful advocate in favor of California's admission. He insisted upon it, well knowing that there had been no enabling act, and that none of the steps usually taken in the formation of a territorial government, preparatory to its admission, had been taken. He well knew at the time that the convention which formed their constitution had been called by a military officer, without authority, in violation of law, and contrary to all former practice. In the terse language of another, the California convention was called by a brigadier general, by a proclamation written on the head of his drum. But, more than this, the honorable Senator could not have been ignorant of the fact that that constitution was forced upon the people of California by a minority of the legal voters in the district.

On the 6th day of July, 1850, before the admission of that State, the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. Yulee] had the following extracts from the debates in the California constitutional convention read in the Senate. (See Appendix to Congressional Globe, Thirty-First Congress, first session, page 1163.) Mr. Carillo said that "he and his colleagues were under instructions to vote for a territorial organization." Mr. GWIN, the present distinguished Senator, then said:

"Are we not here forcing a State government upon a portion of the people of California, whose delegates have, by their recorded votes, stated the fact that their constituents are unanimously against a State government, and in favor of a territorial organization?" "We all know what 31st 30' is. It is the great bone of contention. North of that line there is no contest. South of it there is a contest. If gentlemen will look where this line strikes the Pacific, they will see that not a solitary vote was cast by a delegate in the convention south of that line, except those cast against a State government. The representatives here from that region are unanimous in their votes against the establishment of a State government."

"Not one half of that population knew of this convention, and still we are forcing this government upon them, and upon the thousands and tens of thousands who have come in since the election."

But gentlemen may say that this established the fact that certain parties did not vote for the constitution, or desire it, and not that a majority did not vote for it. The testimony of the leading paper, the "Alta California," is directly to this point. It says:

"To the extent which our returns, up to the present time, enables us to form an opinion, it is established, beyond a shadow of doubt, that a minority only of the total number of voters in the districts heard from is represented by the official and unofficial returns. For instance: the district of Sacramento, (taking the vote of the constitution as an aggregate,) polled five thousand six hundred and five votes, which may be put down as scarcely amounting to one fourth the number of electors which the district contains."

"San Joaquin and San José, show nearly equal deficiency in the numerical strength of their respective votes."

"Our information, and it is authoritative, attributes the strength of this vote to the fact, that in many precincts, remote from the great routes of travel through the northern country, the constitution was not distributed; that it failed to reach those places, and that the action of the State convention was not known until within a day or two of the time appointed for holding the election."

"It is natural to presume that the residents of sections thus situated, feeling aggrieved, have remained away from the polls altogether, and with the same propriety that others have resisted the constitution, both on the ground of not having seen that instrument."—Appendix to Congressional Globe, page 1163.

These are some of the irregularities in the formation and adoption of the constitution of California. They had no enabling act except the sword and command of General Riley. Their constitution and State government were adopted in the convention against the protest of the delegates from a large section of the territory; and the constitution, when submitted to the people, failed to receive a majority of the legal votes in the State or district. In many sections it had not been distributed; and in others, not in time for them to read it; and these objections were urged, earnestly urged, against the admission of the State into the Union. What did the honorable Senator from Illinois say on that occasion?

"But there is not an irregularity in the case of California which has not occurred and been waived in the admission of some new State into the Union. If the Senator will point me to any irregularity in the case of California, I will point him to a corresponding one in the case of some other State which has been received into the Union."

"I hold that the people of California had a right to do what they have done—yes, that they had a moral, political, and legal right to do all they have done."—Appendix to Congressional Globe, 1850, page 1223.

All these irregularities existed, and the honorable Senator was not ignorant of them. He had examined them fully, and then and there solemnly indorsed the whole of them; and what is still more important in the present connection, he declared that they were neither novel nor important. I think the honorable gentleman will allow us to infer that some great change has taken place in his perceptive powers. In 1850, he could take California in, with a free-State constitution—adopted without an enabling act, and contrary to law, and forced upon the people by a minority—without the least compunction of conscience. Now, he turns away from the Lecompton constitution—provided for by the organic law, and adopted according to, and under the act of their Legislature, and in no particular more irregular than the California constitution—with disgust and horror, crying only, but crying always, "fraud! fraud! fraud!"

Sir, I desire not to do the honorable gentleman injustice. I honor his talents, and would be glad to respect his character; but there is something inexplicable in his present position. It is a denial of all his past acts—a reversal of his previous decisions—a sacrifice of principles which he has so largely contributed to ingraft upon the legislation of the country. Let us hope that this aberration of his may be temporary only, and that soon his lofty genius will be revolving in its old conservative orbit, shedding a broad and certain light upon his course, and not the irregular and uncertain rays which serve only to dazzle and bewilder.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Republicans object to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, because that constitution makes no provision for its change or amendment until 1864. After the experience, which we have had in this country in matters of that kind, and the well-established principle that the sovereign authority is vested in the people, we may well doubt their sincerity. Governor Walker refers to this matter, in alluding to the arguments of southern gentlemen of leading positions, in his letter of the 15th of July, 1857. He says, if a constitution is adopted without submitting it to the people, the Republicans—

—driven by such a course into violent opposition to southern institutions, will elect an Abolition State Legislature, send two Abolition Senators to the Senate of the United States, and a member to Congress, entertaining similar sentiments; and that, at a very early period, they would amend the constitution, and make it hostile, in every respect, to the institutions of the South. Yet they would have been admitted as a State, and their power to amend the State constitution could not be arrested. Thus it would happen that whilst for a short time Kansas would have a pro-slavery constitution on parchment, she would be rendered by this course, in fact, an Abolition State, opposed to the fugitive slave law, and necessarily producing collision with the coterminous State of Missouri."

This language is important, not only so far as his authority goes, (and no one doubts his ability,) but it is important as a reflection of southern views on the power of the people of Kansas to change their constitution as soon as they are admitted into the Union. This right and power of the people cannot be denied. They may change their constitution peaceably at any time. They may adopt the mode pointed out by the constitution for its alteration and amendment; or they may adopt some other mode equally justifiable, if not so entirely regular. The Legislatures in the different States may submit the question to the people as prescribed in their respective constitutions; or they may submit the question of a convention to the people in any other mode; and if the people decide in favor of a convention and elect one, its action will be as legal and binding upon them as if the exact form or mode prescribed in the constitution had been observed. It is a question of formality, not of legality.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] to whom I have already alluded, and for whom I entertain sincere respect, in his speech of the 30th of June, 1856, says:

"The right of a people to alter or abolish their form of government is an inherent one, and is classed in the Declaration of Independence as indispensable to the inalienable rights of man."

The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. Seward] is still more direct and positive on this subject. In his speech delivered in the Senate July 2, 1856, he says:

"Mr. President, another and lighter objection has been urged against my bill, [his bill for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution,] namely: that the Topeka constitution provides that it shall not be changed in less than nine years. I do not know this fact, but I am bound to assume it, on the statement of the honorable Senator from Georgia. My answer is, that I am not responsible for that provision in the constitution." "I reply to both of those objections. I take the constitution, as we must all take it, for better or for worse—just as it is—or we cannot admit the State at all. The people in new States make their own constitutions. Our power is limited to the admission or rejection of a State, whatever its constitution may be. Again, it is not clear that the provision complained of by the Senator from Georgia will prevent the people of Kansas from subverting this constitution and establishing a new one at any time short of the expiration of nine years. The constitution of the State of New York, established in 1821, provided for alteration only to be made with the consent of two successive Legislatures. A party desiring radical innovations, and finding it impossible to obtain that object in the form prescribed in the constitution, secured a majority in the Legislature, and, without any constitutional authority, carried through a law by which proceedings were instituted for calling a convention, which was subsequently held, and which framed a new constitution. This new constitution being submitted to the people, and approved by them, in derogation of the old one, became, and it yet remains, the supreme law of the land."—Congressional Globe, page 790.

Mark, the Senator says we must take the constitution just as it is, and admit the State, or not at all. "The people in new States make their own constitutions," not Congress. The objection to which the honorable Senator referred as of more weight than the one just answered, was that the Topeka convention was unauthorized by law. He, however, insists that it was fully authorized by the practice in such cases; and he refers to the admission of California, to which I have already alluded.

In this connection, I might quote from the speech of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] and to those of other leading Republicans, all of whom indorse the honorable Senator's doctrine; but I am not certain that these gentlemen deny it now. They object to the legality of the Lecompton convention, and to the constitution, because it prescribes how it shall be amended after 1864, and makes no provision for alteration before that period.

But these gentlemen held the reverse of both of these propositions in their places on this floor in June and July, 1856, less than two years since. Then, the Topeka constitution, adopted by a convention called without the semblance of law, and in open rebellion to the legally constituted authorities, was regular in their judgments; and its provisions, although they struck down the rights of property, and were in violation of the Constitution of the United States, were just and proper. That constitution was more stringent in its amendment clause; for it not only postponed the right to alter and amend, as far as it could, for nine years, but it expressly prohibited alteration or amendment until the expiration of that period; and what is still worse, the Topeka convention adopted that constitution without submitting any part of it to the people, and leading Republicans here and elsewhere did all in their power to force it upon the majority of the citizens of Kansas. No one can doubt the fact that the Topekites were then in a minority, if they are not now. With these facts before it, the country will judge the sincerity of the Republicans.

Little or no doubt can exist in reference to the power of a State Legislature to pass a law, at any time, submitting the question of a change, alteration, or amendment of their constitution to the people; and none that the people may, in their sovereign capacity, decide in favor of a convention to effect such change, alteration, or amendment; otherwise the convention might make the constitution permanent. If the men of this year can bind the men of 1860, they can bind the people of 1860. Admit this principle, and this generation will have power to bind unborn generations. By it you invest the dead with more authority than the living. Government requires that the majority shall yield up some of their natural rights, and in their political relations admit certain limitations and restraints for the good of the whole society; but the majority may, at all times, in a legal way, limit or extend these delegated powers of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, time prevents me from extending my argument. I therefore quit the subject. A careful, and I trust a candid, investigation of it leaves my mind without a doubt about the propriety and duty of admitting Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The facts justify this course, and the interests and peace of the country imperatively demand it.

In speaking of the conduct of the Republicans in Kansas, I have necessarily used strong language in denouncing their policy; but because I have not condemned the conduct of the pro-slavery party in that Territory, it must not be inferred that I approve their course, or justify all their conduct. I do not do so. While they have been guilty of many things wholly unjustifiable, they have not openly attempted to overthrow the government. Frauds and great wrongs they may have committed; but the crimes of rebellion and treason cannot justly be charged against them. These high offenses are clearly established against the Republicans of that Territory. But do not understand me to charge such disloyalty on all Republicans. That party contains many noble spirits, who are influenced by the highest and purest motives, and who are as much devoted to the Union of these States as any gentleman on this side of the House. I honor such men, wherever found. They differ with us, as they have undoubted right to do, and I respect their opinions and feelings. With such gentlemen I have no harsh words to exchange. I believe them, as they doubtless believe me, to be mistaken; but I look forward to the time when we shall stand side by side in the defense of the Union and the Constitution, by whomsoever they may be assailed.

On this great, this important issue, my humble convictions are against them. My views of duty and my love of country lead me in a different direction. If I err in conceding and maintaining the equality of the States, I err with the illustrious spirits who formed the Constitution of our Federal Union—with Franklin, and Madison, and Washington. If I err in my course on the question now before us, I err with the distinguished and time-honored statesmen composing the present Administration, who so justly enjoy the confidence of the country, and who can have no other object than its peace, its prosperity, its honor, and its glory. To err with such men, is excusable; but to err against them, is criminal.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the bill now before the committee; availing myself of the latitude usual in the Committee of the Whole, I intend to talk of the wrongs of Kansas, and the rights of the northern Democracy, with the hope that justice may be done on this floor.

I approach the discussion of one of the most important questions, so far as the existence of the national Democracy and the Union are concerned, that ever in my judgment has been presented to the consideration and decision of the Congress of the nation, with diffidence, lest I may not be able, as the only Democratic Representative from the great State of New York opposed to the Lecompton constitution, to do the subject that justice which it deserves. I hope it will not be deemed egotistical in me to refer to the position that I have ever occupied in my native State as a national Democrat, always standing up for all the constitutional rights of the South. In 1848, it was my province and pleasure, as a member of the Democratic general committee in Tammany Hall, to offer resolutions ratifying the nominations of Cass and Butler; and on the same occasion, it was the privilege of one of my now Democratic colleagues on this floor to offer resolutions in opposition thereto, and in favor of the views of those who supported Van Buren and Adams. Subsequently, I had the honor to offer resolutions, which were adopted by the committee, excluding that colleague and his Free-soil confederates from that body. After his excommunication, that colleague proceeded to the Buffalo convention and joined hands with the Abolitionists and the high protective tariff men of the North, and advocated and supported the resolutions of that convention, protesting forever thereafter against the admission of any more slave States, and in favor of a high protective tariff. During the campaign of 1848, this colleague, in connection with John Van Buren, addressed various meetings throughout the State in favor of the doctrines promulgated by the Buffalo convention, and the election of their mongrel ticket, Van Buren and Adams, for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, and the Abolition State ticket, Dix for Governor, and Gates for Lieutenant Governor.

To these two renegades and Free-soil agitators of that day, more than to any other cause, may be attributed the origin and growth of that Free-soil sentiment which found expression, in 1848, in one hundred and twenty thousand votes in favor of the Free-soil candidates, Van Buren and Adams, in opposition to about one hundred thousand cast for the national candidates—Cass and Butler—and which, in 1856, came so near electing John C. Fremont. During all this time, no man in the State of New York was more zealous and unwavering in the promulgation of sound, national Democratic principles, than myself. The first resolutions that were adopted in any recognized Democratic committee in that State in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska bill were drawn and introduced by myself, and adopted in the Hard-shell general committee, in 1854. In the Hard-shell State convention, in 1855, I urged upon the committee of resolutions the adoption of an affirmative resolution in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The prominent leaders in the convention, and of the party out of it, were opposed to indorsing that act, fearing that it might arouse the Free-soil sentiment of the State, and injure our cause; but failing in the committee, I appeared at the bar of the convention, and forced the resolution through by an amendment to the report of the committee.

In consequence of this stand taken by our wing of the party, and the failure of the Soft-shell State convention; of which the colleague to whom I have alluded was a member, to put itself upon the record until after the fall election, in January following, in favor of the national doctrine of popular sovereignty, the Hard-shell delegation to the Cincinnati convention were enabled to gain admittance to that body upon the ground of national political orthodoxy, to the exclusion of the Softs, who, numerically, were much in ascendancy in the previous fall election. Judge of my astonishment and surprise, Mr. Chairman, when I found my colleague [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] acting as the high priest of the caucus of Democratic Representatives of this House, and my amazement in reading recently a speech delivered in New York, by John Van Buren, in which he favored the consummation of the Lecompton fraud, by which slavery is sought to be forced upon the people of Kansas, against the expressed will of three fourths of them, and in which he praised the Democratic party for having been the means of admitting Texas into the Union as a slave State, when it is notorious that he and his father, and those who composed the Van Buren party, strenuously opposed the annexation, and by a "secret circular" endeavored to defeat Polk and Dallas.

I have reverted to the former course of these gentlemen not out of personal hostility, but to show that as in nature the seasons change, so changes the mere politician when actuated by interest; and to enter my protest against the power assumed by such Democrats, and apparently recognized by a majority of my party upon this floor, of reading out of the Democracy gentlemen who have been consistent national Democrats all their lives. "In these loose party times" the line of demarcation between party rebellion and fealty is so finely drawn and so nearly allied that the word "rebel" has no grating sound upon my ear, and produces no terror. Had General William Walker, whom the South have sought to heroize at the expense of the noble conduct of the gallant Paulding, been successful in Nicaragua, even he would have been a patriot. Success makes patriots now-a-days, and in politics, owing to the degeneracy of the times in which we live, many politicians, I regret to say, prefer success rather than virtue. Mr. Chairman, I cannot be read out of the Democratic party for my vote against the Lecompton constitution, conceived, as it was, in fraud, and brought forth in iniquity; preferring to be right rather than to be indorsed when wrong by the nominal temporary head of the Democratic church. "Men change—principles never," is a truthful maxim that we should all live up to. Has it ever occurred, sir, to those new-fledged national Democrats on this floor who arrogate to themselves plenary power to read out of the party consistent Democrats, that seven of the twelve Democratic members from New York were Hard-shell rebels in that State from September, 1853, down to the election of this Administration? That they rebelled against President Pierce and his minions, not because he was false to the principles or platform upon which he was elected, but simply for the reason that he had insulted the national Democrats in New York in giving the most important Federal appointments to the Free-soil leaders, who had contributed to the defeat of Cass and Butler, thus offering an indignity to the true men of the party—those who had created and sustained the national Democratic sentiment in the North which elected Mr. Pierce—and also for the unjustifiable interference of his administration in removing Judge Bronson, thereby striking, as they believed, a blow at State rights.

In arriving at the conclusion to vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I have been aided and influenced by a desire to faithfully represent the constituency which elected me, and to fulfill the pledges which I made them upon accepting my nomination. To them I am responsible for my course here; and being honestly convinced that my opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution—repudiated and protested against, as it is, by at least three fourths of her people—meets with the approval of a large majority of my constituents, whose wishes I am in honor bound to obey, I shall vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Upon the occasion of my nomination I addressed the convention which nominated me, in the following language:

"The unscrupulous Black Republican press asserts that the Democratic party is a pro-slavery party. I deny it. It is a libel upon its character, its platform, and its candidates. It is neither a pro-slavery nor an anti-slavery party, but it is the progressive constitutional party of the country. Its principles and measures recognize no South, no North, no East, no West, but the whole Confederacy. Our boasting opponents indulge in hypocritical protestations, and insane ravings, in the name of freedom. Freedom is indigenous to the North—we are all in favor of freedom. These hills and valleys yet rescho with the sounds of martial music, and the cannon's roar, from that army, which, under the lead of our great Washington, on yonder eminence, fought the battle of White Plains, in our great revolutionary struggle for freedom, the Constitution, the Union, and all the political and civil blessings we enjoy. As a native of this country, for I am a native, and to the manner born, having been born on the manor of Fordham—though this was an accident over which I had no control, and upon which I base no claim—I, in common with most of the people of the North, am in favor of the admission of Kansas as a free State; and I will, if elected your Representative in Congress, (as I intend to be,) do all in my power, without infringing upon the rights and privileges of other members of the Confederacy, to promote the admission of Kansas as a free State, fully indorsing, however, the right of the people of the Territories, under legal and constitutional regulations, to form their own organic laws, and to regulate their domestic institutions in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution."

After this enunciation of my views to the representatives of my constituency in convention, I submit whether there is an honorable gentleman upon this floor who, if he were in my position, could act otherwise than I intend doing? and whether, if I violated my pledges thus voluntarily made, I could return to that independent and intelligent constituency, without being fairly chargeable with being false to my professions in convention and upon the stump, where I asserted that I would never support the admission of Kansas as a State, under any constitution, unless satisfied that it had been fairly submitted to all the bona fide voters of Kansas, and that it represented the will of a majority of her people? I now propose to argue the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, in its moral, legal, and political aspect, and to show that a decent respect for the principles of the party enunciated at Cincinnati, the letter of acceptance of Mr. Buchanan, the instructions to Governor Walker, the inaugural of Governor Walker, which was submitted to the President and his Cabinet before he proceeded to the Territory, made it the duty of the President to his party, and the nation at large, to see that the will of the majority is respected in Kansas, and that it is not admitted as a State until the constitution has been submitted to the people and approved by them. The following resolution, from the Cincinnati platform, will show the position of the party on the question:

"3. That, by the uniform application of the Democratic principle to the organization of Territories, and the admission of new States, with or without slavery, as they may elect, the equal rights of all the States will be preserved intact, the original compact of the Constitution maintained inviolate, and the perpetuity and expansion of the Union insured to its utmost capacity of embracing, in peace and harmony, every future American State that may be constituted or annexed with a republican form of government. That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of the majority of the actual residents, whenever the number of the inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

I also beg leave to submit the extracts to which I allude from the President's inaugural, his instructions to Governor Walker, and the inaugural and letter of resignation of Governor Walker:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote."—President Buchanan's Inaugural.

"I accepted [the appointment of Governor of Kansas] on the express condition that I should advocate the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection."

"These views were clearly understood by the President and all his Cabinet. They were distinctly set forth in my letter of acceptance of this office of the 25th of March last, and reiterated in my inaugural address of the 27th of May last, as follows:

"I indeed cannot doubt that the convention, after having framed a State constitution, will submit it for ratification or rejection by a majority of the then actual bona fide resident settlers of Kansas."

"With these views well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas."—Governor Walker's Resignation.

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."—Governor Walker's Inaugural Address to Kansas.

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."—Buchanan's Instructions to Walker.

"In my official dispatch to you of 2d June last, a copy of that inaugural address was transmitted to you for the further information of the President and his Cabinet. No exception was ever taken to any portion of that address. On the contrary, it is distinctly admitted by the President in his message, with commendable frankness, that my instructions in favor of the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people were 'general and unqualified.' By that inaugural and subsequent addresses, I was pledged to the people of Kansas to oppose by all 'lawful means' the adoption of any constitution which was not fairly and fully submitted to their vote for ratification or rejection. These pledges I cannot recall or violate without personal dishonor and the abandonment of fundamental principles, and therefore it is impossible for me to support what is called the Lecompton constitution, because it is not submitted to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection."—Governor Walker's Resignation.

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties, in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th of November last. If, then, sovereignty can be delegated, and conventions, as such, are sovereign, which I deny, surely it must be only in such cases as when such conventions are chosen by the people, which we have seen was not the case as regards the late Lecompton convention. It was for this, among other reasons, that in my inaugural and other addresses I insisted that the constitution should be submitted to the people by the convention, as the only means of curing this vital defect in its organization. It was, therefore, among other reasons, when, as you know, the organization of the so-called Topeka State government, and as a consequence, an inevitable civil war and conflict with the troops must have ensued, these results were prevented by my assuring, not the Abolitionists, as has been erroneously stated—for my address was not to them, but the people of Kansas—that in my judgment the constitution would be submitted fairly and freely for ratification or rejection by their vote, and that if this was not done, I would unite with them, the people, as I now do, in 'lawful opposition' to such a procedure."—Governor Walker's Resignation.

"The President takes a different view of the subject in his message; and, from the events occurring in Kansas, as well as here, it is evident that the question is passing from theories into practice; and that, as Governor of Kansas, I should be compelled to carry out new instructions, differing, on a vital question, from those received at the date of my appointment. Such instructions I could not execute consistently with my views of the Federal Constitution, of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, or with my pledges to the people of Kansas. Under these circumstances, no alternative is left me but to resign the office of Governor of the Territory of Kansas."

"No one can more deeply regret than myself this necessity; but it arises from no change of opinion on my part. On the contrary, I should most cheerfully have returned to Kansas to carry out my original instructions, and thus preserve the peace of the Territory, and finally settle the Kansas question by redeeming my pledges to the people."—Governor Walker's Resignation.

It was upon the assumption and belief that this duty would be faithfully discharged, that Mr. Buchanan was elected, and that every northern Democratic Representative upon this floor triumphed; and the falsification of our political record of 1856, upon this vital question, must result in the disintegration and destruction of the Democratic party, and the election to the next Congress of a majority opposed to the present Administration. The moral proposition in favor of the fair and full submission of the constitution of Kansas to its people cannot be gainsayed, and the whole question is reduced to a proposition of "right" on one side, and "wrong" on the other. The legal necessity for its submission follows from the statement of the moral proposition. I intend that the only legal submission of the Lecompton constitution was made at the election in Kansas on the 4th of January. The pretended submission of the constitution on the 21st of December was farcical, and intended covertly to prevent the attainment of the very principle guaranteed by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, compelling those who voted against the slavery clause to approve a constitution which they loathed and detested; and I allege that the most immaterial question that could have been submitted to them on the 21st of December last was the "slavery or no slavery" proposition, inasmuch as that issue had been practically passed upon at their previous October election, when the present representative upon this floor, MARCUS J. PARROTT, of the free-State party, was elected over Governor Ransom, supported by the pro-slavery men and Democrats, by over five thousand majority.

To say, therefore, that slavery was the "only domestic institution" that the people of Kansas felt interested in, or desired to pass upon, at the December election, and that all of their other "domestic institutions"—currency, judiciary, legislative, executive, and internal improvement policy—were swallowed up in the negro issue, is to lose sight of and to ignore the fact that that question was practically disposed of against the "negro business" at the October election. I assert that no State constitution for any new State, to be admitted after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, should have vitality until the people of the locality to be affected by it have, by their approval, "breathed into its nostrils the breath of life," when it becomes a living soul. The Territorial Legislature provided for a legal election on the 4th of January last, at which the electors of Kansas had the privilege of approving or rejecting this Lecompton constitution. At this election, legally authorized and fairly conducted, the only one in which the great body of the people have participated, the Lecompton constitution was rejected by a majority of over ten thousand. This election was countenanced and approved by the President in the instructions given to Governor Denver, who was directed to respect the acts of the Territorial Legislature, and to see that the election was peaceably and orderly conducted.

"The Territorial Legislature doubtless convened on the 7th instant; and while it remains in session, its members are entitled to be secure and free in their deliberations. Its rightful action must also be respected. Should it authorize an election by the people for any purpose, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention. While the peace of the Territory is preserved, and the freedom of elections is secure, there need be no fear of disastrous consequences."

"The authority of the Government must necessarily be maintained: and from whatever quarter it is attempted to interfere by violence with the elections authorized by the constitutional convention, or which may be authorized by the Legislature, the attempt must be resisted, and the security of the elections maintained."

"The President relies upon your firmness and discretion to give effect to these instructions. It is vitally important that the people of Kansas, and no other than the people of Kansas, should have the full determination of the question now before them for decision."—Secretary Cass to Governor Denver, December 11, 1857.

Thus we have presented to us the grand inquest of the nation, sitting in judgment upon a case involving the admission or rejection of a sovereign State; the protest of a large majority of its inhabitants against the constitution under which a few of their reckless men are attempting to force it into the Union. Gentlemen upon this floor from the South seek to have Kansas admitted; and to justify this great moral wrong upon the purely technical legal ground that the Lecompton constitution is legal, because they allege the election of the 21st of December was so, and contend that the refusal of the majority of the people to vote at that election can have no effect, as their refusal to vote justified those who did act for them. I have been taught that law is founded upon right and justice. The definition of law, as I understand it, is "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the Supreme Power, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." If this is its correct definition, apply the facts presented for the consideration of this House in relation to the admission of Kansas; and I ask any fair man, whether the ex parte and fraudulent vote of the 21st of December should be recognized, and the legal vote of the 4th of January repudiated? Fraud may be shown at any time to annul a contract. Will any intelligent gentleman assert and stake his reputation upon it, that the vote of the 21st of December was an honest one, and claim that Johnson county, in which there are not four hundred voters, gave over eighteen hundred majority for the Lecompton constitution? I assert, from conversation with intelligent and reliable southern gentlemen, pro-slavery Democrats, who know all about the voters of Kansas and their political preferences, that there were not over two thousand five hundred bona fide votes cast for the constitution in December, and that there never were over that number there in favor of making it a slave State; and yet between six and seven thousand votes have been returned, and this vote is so complicated with fraud that the whole should be rejected.

I contend in the campaign which resulted in the election of Mr. Buchanan, that the constitution of Kansas would be submitted as an entirety to the bona fide inhabitants of the Territory, and that it was as certain as that freedom traveled more rapidly than slavery, that a majority of her people would be in favor of her admission as a free State; that the laws of climate and of population would bring about this desirable result.

What we northern Representatives then contended for, if the voice of the majority is not ignored here, is more than justified now. Our plighted faith compels us to vindicate our pledges by opposing the minority rule in Kansas, and unyieldingly to insist that the will of the majority shall have a fair expression and be recognized by Congress. As a northern man, with no prejudice against slavery where it now exists, I can assert with confidence, that the fair solution of this Kansas embroglio, in order to secure protection to the interests of the South and the future success of the Democratic party, belongs to the northern Democracy. Upon this subject I desire to refer the House to remarks made by the President, when, as a Senator from Pennsylvania, on the 13th February, 1840, his colleague presented to the Senate a memorial for the abolition of slavery; and also to a portion of his celebrated speech delivered in the Senate when the subject of the annexation of Texas was under consideration.

"Now, in consequence of my conduct here throughout that session, I have borne the brunt of the Abolitionists at home. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky, that the danger has passed away, at least in Pennsylvania. The crisis is now over; and the fanaticism which threatened to invade the constitutional rights of the South, and to dissolve the Union, has been nearly extinguished.

"The battle has been fought where it must ever be fought, not in the South, but in the North. It is the voice of the North who must ever sustain the shock in such a contest. Under these circumstances I appeal most solemnly to Senators from the slaveholding States, whether they ought not to be governed in a great degree by our advice as to the mode in which these abolition petitions shall be treated. It is impossible, after all which has passed, that they can doubt our devotion to the constitutional rights of the South."

If our southern brethren upon this floor could properly estimate the consequences flowing from their insisting upon northern Democrats who have ever been true to their interests, now voting to sustain this Lecompton iniquity at the expense of their pledges, they would not insist upon such a sacrifice. The national Democratic party is the only party that has ever protected the constitutional rights of the South. Destroy it by erecting two sectional parties, as I fear the present attempt will do, and what hope have you in the future of the acquisition of that southern territory in which the peculiar institution of the South can be profitably and safely extended? It has been charged upon the North, (and the national Democracy have not been excepted from the charge), that they are aggressive upon the rights of the South. I deny it, and for proof to the contrary let me briefly refer to the purchase and acquisition, under the auspices of the Democratic party, of the territory of Florida, accompanied by its Indian war, costing the Government many millions, the purchase of the Louisiana territory, in 1803, out of a portion of which Kansas has been carved, the annexation of Texas, with the war with Mexico following, and recently, under the last Administration, the "Gadsden purchase" of a part of Mexico, at a cost of $15,000,000, out of which the Territory of Arizona is sought to be formed.

"Who would be so insane now as to advocate the recession of Florida, Texas, New Mexico, or California? The country owes all these acquisitions of territory to the Democratic party. Including Louisiana, they have increased our territorial extent from eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles to nearly three million, and have added to our wealth and resources in an infinitely greater ratio."

All of these purchases and acquisitions have been made at the instigation, and have inured to the special benefit of the southern States, costing over two hundred and fifty million dollars; the North, the East, and the West, in consequence of their greater taxable wealth, contributing for these territories three fourths of the amount. To say, therefore, that the northern Democracy have ever countenanced aggression upon the South, is a libel upon its generosity. But, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion upon this subject on this floor, I have been convinced against my preconceived notions of southern honor and integrity, that none of the principles or measures of the Democratic party, from the time of Jefferson down to the present, have any importance in their eyes compared with the advocacy of the extension of slavery. I have beheld upon this floor the southern Know Nothings, with scarcely an exception, embracing the Democrats from the slave States in urging the acceptance of this Lecompton constitution. If this question obliterates party lines in the South upon the score of pecuniary interest, I ask whether the example they present may not, with propriety, be followed by the Representatives on this floor from the free States, especially in a case when the fundamental principle of popular sovereignty which underlies the formation of our several States and our national Government, is sought to be overthrown and destroyed by the South. I have been forced to believe from what I have seen here, that the days of southern statesmen have passed, that they have no longer in the South a Calhoun, a McDuffee, a Hayne, a Lowndes, a Cheeves, a Forsyth, or a Legaré. Their places have been taken, I fear, by mere politicians who, it appears to me, are seeking temporary success at the expense of the northern Democracy.

What a change, Mr. Chairman, has come over the spirit of the dream of the President within a few months! Well do I remember reading the sulphurous letter from one of the Representatives of the South, in which he treated the venerable Executive of the country as a paralytic, weak, old man. Well do I remember the resolutions adopted in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi denouncing Governor Walker, and menacing the Executive for his instructions to him, and because he did not remove him for honestly repudiating the Oxford and McGee frauds. Shortly after Congress assembled, we discovered the President uniting with those who had denounced him, and forsaking nearly all the friends who had nominated and elected him. We beheld him entering upon a crusade of persecution and ostracism against his original friends who had the honesty to maintain the principles upon which he was elected.

Sir, who are, and where now stand, some of the prominent "rebels on principle?" Where stands the "Warwick of King James," driven from court by parasites and courtiers? He is at the post of honor—a private station—engaged in his profession; the "Leggett" of American political writers, modestly yet firmly, from his powerful lever, the "press," fighting the good fight for "popular sovereignty, and the right of the people to self-government." Where stands the gallant and eloquent Wise, the Bayard of Virginia chivalry, the Governor of the mother of Presidents, who controlled the vote of his State for Mr. Buchanan's nomination and election? Where the Neck-er of the administration of President Polk—Governor Walker—who left his family here, to go into the wilderness of Kansas, to reason with and quiet the border ruffians and eastern fanatics in that Territory, and to prepare and fairly bring her into the Union, under the Democratic provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska bill? Where the didactic, logical, and able Stanton, the ever-reliable southern member, who faithfully represented Tennessee on this floor for over ten years? Where the Gibbon of American history, the elegant writer, and polished Secretary of the Navy, and Minister to St. James, George Bancroft? Where the able Stuart, the Senator from Michigan, and the unrelenting and intrepid Broderick, of the golden State of the West, each of whom controlled the vote of his State for Mr. Buchanan, in the Cincinnati convention? Where the father of the new States of the West, the heroic, the honest, the able, the fearless, the determined Douglas, who gave paternity to the Kansas bill, and who should, above all others, be capable of giving his own act a legitimate interpretation in the Senate, "according to its true intent and meaning," not to refer to lesser lights in the great army of justice and freedom, each and every of them against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, maintaining "popular sovereignty," the Cincinnati platform, and the integrity of the Democratic party of the Union? Read these statesmen and patriots out of the party! Who confers the right? The people will condemn the effort, and unless those who arrogate to themselves this anti-Democratic and extraordinary power are mighty, cautious, and wise, they will read the party itself out of existence.

It has been contended on this floor, by the gentlemen from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] and Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] that the Lecompton constitution cannot be changed or amended before 1864; in this they differ from the President, and I agree with them.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask the gentleman to put his finger on any such statement in my speech.

Mr. HASKIN. I so understood the gentleman—

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Mississippi say they are not his sentiments now?

Mr. HASKIN. I so understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] to contend yesterday. I will go on with what I have to say.

The constitution of Kansas is a compact made with the people—their organic law; it is superior to any legislative enactment of the State, and all of them must conform and be subordinate to it, or they are absolutely null and void. The constitution is the "higher law" of the State, and it cannot be changed in any manner, save in the mode and at the time prescribed in it. The year 1864 is the period fixed by the people in their acceptance of the constitution—the compact they have entered into with themselves for the protection of their civil rights; and to concede that the people of Kansas have the right, at any time, to change their fundamental law, is to legalize the right of revolution in Kansas, in imitation, I suppose, of the unsettled and unsatisfactory state of political affairs in unfortunate Mexico, where revolution and change of constitution have, for a few years past, occurred every few months. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the "Dorr rebellion," (a court whose decisions are respected and specially commended by the President,) in my judgment forever puts at rest any doubt upon this subject. If they cannot move in favor of a change of their constitution before 1864, they must then conform to the mode prescribed by the constitution, which is that the Legislature, by a two thirds vote, at their next session, may call a convention, and if the people at the next election vote in favor of a constitution, it may meet and form a new constitution. From this it will be perceived that there can really be no change before 1866; and not then, unless two thirds of the Legislature favor it. When it is remembered that the members of the Assembly are elected for two and the Senators for four years; considering the character of the bold, bad men who, under the Lecompton constitution, may initiate this State government, and how unscrupulously they will act in framing and passing laws to perpetuate the rule of themselves and friends, it is not at all probable that the constitution of Kansas will be changed before 1870.

In the bill of rights contained in this constitution will be found this section:

"2. All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such a manner as they may think proper."

Now, this simply means that the people have the right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, pursuant to law, "under lawful authority," as the President puts it, and in compliance with the provisions of that constitution. How absurd and ridiculous it is, then, for sensible and honest men to attempt to humbug the American people upon this question by insisting "that Kansas once admitted as a State under the Lecompton constitution, can at any time change her constitution." In article seven, in the Lecompton constitution, headed slavery—

"Sec. 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

"Sec. 2. The Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners, or without paying the owners previous to their emancipation a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to the State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States or Territories, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State: Provided, That such person or slave be the bona fide property of such emigrants: And provided, also, That laws may be passed to prohibit the introduction into this State of slaves who have committed high crimes in other States or Territories. They shall have power to pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge. They shall have power to oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity, to provide for them necessary food and clothing, to abstain from all injuries to them extending to life or limb, and, in case of their neglect or refusal to comply with the direction of such laws, to have such slave or slaves sold for the benefit of the owner or owners."

The object of these sections when taken in connection with the treaty of Spain in 1803—the Louisiana purchase—of which Kansas forms a part, in which it was agreed that the rights of property in slaves should remain inviolate, is to prevent, even by a new constitution or any legislative action, any interference under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the passage and successful operation of any law in Kansas, by which slavery, against the consent of the owners of slaves, can in any manner be interfered with; hence is the reason for the President saying, in his recent message, "that Kansas is now as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina." This, with many others, is one reason for my opposing the Lecompton constitution. I can never consent, by my vote, to render slavery in Kansas perpetual against the wishes of three-fourths of the people now there; and even if the Lecompton constitution is accepted perchance against their unanimous wish. The people of Kansas, on the 21st of December, were justified in not voting, considering the unfair and insulting mode of the pretended submission of the constitution on that day. They have been goaded by insults and injuries greater than the people of the American colonies received when they rebelled against the tyranny and oppression of George III.; and when Washington and his forces were denominated rebels. They are self-reliant citizens, and brave men, and have, by their past conduct in Kansas, under all the wrongs they have suffered, shown that they are capable of "self-government." They have my sympathy and support. They are the kind of men the poet speaks of:

"What constitutes a State?

Not high raised battlements nor labored mound,
Thick wall, nor moated gate;
Nor cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned,
Nor starred and spangled courts,
Where low-born baseness wafts perfume to pride;
But men! high-minded men,
Who their duties know, but know their rights,
And, knowing, dare maintain them."

The South have no right, nor is it generous or just in them to insist upon forcing slavery in Kansas against the wishes of her people. By the Missouri compromise line which they repealed upon the proposition of Senator Dixon of Kentucky, Kansas, being North of latitude 36° 30', and between the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth parallels, was dedicated, and so remained for thirty-four years, to freedom.

They are, therefore, by no principle of justice entitled, or justified in their attempt now to force and keep slavery in Kansas under a usurped constitution insisted by them to be received by Congress against the legally expressed will of an overwhelming majority of her people, upon a snap-judgment sought to be sustained upon technical legal grounds. Permit me to briefly examine propositions connected with this judgment. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] insisted that the judgment obtained at the election in Kansas on the 21st December was final, and under it he claimed the penalty of the bond—the pound of flesh included.

"My deeds upon my head! I crave the law,
The penalty and forfeit of my bond."

I deny that this was a final judgment, and assert that it was an interlocutory proceeding. The final judgment in the Kansas case is to be entered in the court of the people of the United States, presided over by the United States Senate and this body, composing the Congress of the nation; and I claim that this court has the right in this important case to examine the proceedings, even "dehors the record" of the 21st of December last, and to determine that the constitutional convention had no legal existence, because counties were not registered, and in which the people did not and could not vote for delegates.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the constitution was not submitted, then, to the jurors—the people of Kansas—for their verdict; and not having been submitted, those of them who subsequently did vote on the 4th of January, having been prevented from passing upon the merits of the case until then, were right in treating the proceedings on the 21st of December as unworthy of notice, insulting, and a nullity. I submit whether we have not the right, and whether it is not our duty, to pass upon the merits of this controversy before we enter final judgment, and insist that there is not an honest court of justice in the country which would not, upon the presentation of the official facts in relation to the Kansas case, known to us, at least, order a venire de novo, and a new trial.

Why, sir, suppose I, as the executor of my father's estate, should commence an action against you, Mr. Chairman, for $1,000, claimed to be due the deceased upon a book account. My attorney has served you with the complaint and summons, and you inadvertently neglect to answer within the twenty days allowed in our State, although you have a good defense, and can prove that instead of being indebted to his estate it is indebted to you in $500; a judgment by default is entered; is there any court of justice that, upon your swearing to merits, and giving the most trifling excuse for your neglect to answer, would not open the judgment upon the payment of a few dollars costs, and permit you to defend? Or take another case, that of a report made by a referee, where, before judgment is entered, upon your discovery of new evidence proving fraud, perjury, and forgery, by which you have been robbed of your rights, would not the court order a rehearing, and permit justice to be done between the parties? If this be so, and I insist that it is of frequent occurrence in courts of justice, why should not this high court be as fair and just as the ordinary courts of law, in granting a new trial to the sovereign people of Kansas, or a rehearing instead of unjustly entering up a final judgment, by which the dearest rights and liberties of the people of an inchoate State are to be impaired and destroyed. Besides, sir, there is a familiar principle of law that fraud vitiates all contracts; that it may be shown at any time; and that it renders all contracts, ab initio, not merely voidable, but absolutely void.

I appeal to my southern brethren to know if this is the kind of honor that is patented in their region of the Confederacy. If it is, sir, I have only to say that the national Democrats of the North, who have always sustained them in their constitutional rights, have been deceived upon the subject of southern magnanimity, fair dealing, and integrity of character. Upon the subject of the Lecompton constitution, I stand where the President stood when he said in the Senate of the United States, on the 8th day of June, 1844, in the course of his remarks on the annexation of Texas:

"I care not what may be their organic law, if we have conclusive evidence that the whole people who have framed it, desire to be annexed to the Union."

Mr. Chairman, the President and the South labor under a delusion in relation to the settlement of this Kansas imbroglio. He has asserted, that, if Kansas is admitted as a State under the Lecompton constitution, agitation will cease in thirty days; and that "he desires to put a stop to agitation upon this subject, which has already occupied too much of the attention of the American people." Vain hope! and anti-Democrat expression! Why, sir, agitation will but commence when you force Kansas fraudulently into this Union.

In 1848, the Barn-burners, or Free-soilers of New York, with a mosaic ticket for President and Vice President and State officers, beat the national Democracy, who supported Cass and Butler, nearly twenty thousand votes, by the agitation before the people of that political heresy, the Wilmot proviso, meanly applied as it was to the three million bill to enable us to carry on the war with Mexico. The anti-slavery sentiment of the North has become a religious sentiment, and is now particularly powerful, growing out of the domineering and aggressive spirit of a portion of the South. The State of New York was carried by the Democrats last fall, because nearly one hundred thousand citizens, who had the fall before voted the Republican ticket, remained at home, induced to do so by the inaugural of Governor Walker, by the President's instructions to him, and the telegraphic dispatch to my colleague, [Mr. SICKLES,] that he would not remove the Governor for throwing out the Oxford and McGee frauds, (morally right, but technically wrong,) and to believe that the people of Kansas, under this Administration, would have fair play, and that the State would be admitted as a free State under the auspices of the President, in accordance with the wishes of a large majority of its people. In my district alone, nearly six thousand Republicans did not vote.

Now, force Kansas in as a State under this obnoxious Lecompton constitution, and I predict that the anti-Lecompton party will carry New York next fall by over fifty thousand majority; that a majority of the Representatives elected to Congress next fall will be anti-Lecompton; and that an anti-Lecompton statesman will be the next President of the United States. Stop agitation upon this subject by a presidential edict, or by office-holders crying "peace, be still!" Impossible! When this can be done we shall not be fit for the liberty we enjoy; and the present Democratic party will be buried so low in political infamy as to prevent its resurrection by the united efforts of the entire South. Stop that agitation which demands that popular sovereignty shall reign omnipotent in this Republic! No, never! Sir, it is the child of light; it gambols on the hill-tops and in the valleys, throughout our beautiful country. It is that spirit which lived where a Tell dwelt; it had a Hampden for a votary; it wrested magna charta from King John; gave the habeas corpus act to Britain; and the Declaration of Independence to this country. It has ever been the life of the Democratic party. Jefferson was an agitator. Monroe was an agitator, when he announced the doctrine of "non-interference of European Powers on this continent"—a sound doctrine, and one that I hope to see this Administration enforce. Andrew Jackson was an agitator, and agitated the United States Bank out of existence. We agitated Texas into the Union; and, by a system of hard agitation, fought "Kansas" and "popular sovereignty" into favor with the people, and agitated Mr. Buchanan upon it into the presidential chair. Opposition to agitation is the child of darkness; it was begotten by a despotism, and fostered by kings and emperors. It has in France established the censorship of the press, and is used to keep light from the oppressed people, and them in ignorance. As a Democrat, considering how much benefit agitation has conferred upon the people of this country in the adoption of all the wholesome progressive measures of the Democratic party, I can never consent to oppose agitation, especially when I believe justice will finally follow right. No, sir, I glory in agitation, and am proud of being an agitator against the Lecompton constitution.

This Administration should be controlled by principles; not seek to control by patronage. I honestly believe that, but for patronage, fast becoming the bane of the Republic, not ten Democratic members from the free States would be found supporting the Lecompton constitution as it has been presented to us. For myself, not being one of those who "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,

Where thrift may follow fawning,"

I am irrevocably against it.

The President, in 1844, in his speech on Texas, not only occupied the position of favoring the submission of the constitution to the people, but recently, in his message, promulgated sound doctrines upon this subject, which I am disposed to indorse and follow. He says:

"All were cordially united upon the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, which is the vital principle of our free institutions. Had it then been insinuated from any quarter that it would be a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the organic law for the members of a convention, thereafter to be elected, to withhold the question of slavery from the people, and to substitute their own will for that of a legally-ascertained majority of all their constituents, this would have been instantly rejected. Everywhere they remained true to the resolution adopted on a celebrated occasion, recognizing the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with other States.

"I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded as it is on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

It is true that Florida and Iowa were, Siamese-twin like, admitted, yoked together; but Florida was not affected by the Missouri compromise, and was isothermally adapted for slave labor. Arkansas and Michigan were admitted after the same fashion; but Arkansas was also slave territory south of the Missouri line. Neither of these cases can fairly be quoted as applicable and binding precedents. By the passage of the Kansas act the want of unanimity in the admission of new States was intended to be remedied, and by fixed principles thereafter, new States were to be formed and admitted pursuant to the mode prescribed in that act, viz: by the "act and deed" of the bona fide inhabitants of the Territory speaking to Congress, through a constitution framed by themselves, submitted to the people, and approved by them. The doctrine that the convention in Kansas had the right to adopt the constitution, was in express violation of the fundamental act for the organization of the Territory; and unless, in the act of the Territorial Legislature calling the convention, it was expressly provided that the convention should have the power to adopt the constitution, they had no authority to do it, and it was their duty to refer the instrument—the most important for their welfare, happiness, and government, that could ever be passed upon—to the vote of the people, for their ratification or rejection. The people in a territorial state cannot, before the formation of a State government, confer any authority, "inferentially or by implication," and they cannot be divested of any of their rights of sovereignty or otherwise, without express warrant of law.

Hence I argue, without referring to the written pledges violated by Calhoun and his disgraced associates, that they would submit the constitution to the people, that under the Kansas-Nebraska act, no express authority having been conferred by the Territorial Legislature upon the convention to adopt, but simply to form, a constitution, the convention usurped authority in attempting to do so, without submitting it to the people, whose approval alone can give vitality to their organic law. The Constitution of this Union had to be approved by the several States, or a large majority of them, before it became the Federal compact. The constitution of my own State, referred to by the President in his recent message, was submitted to the people for approval or rejection. The constitutions of about one half of the States of the Union were submitted and approved by the people before they had force and effect.

But, notwithstanding this has been the custom, I care not, for argument's sake, if every State constitution before 1854 had been adopted by the convention and not by popular approval; insisting, as I do, that the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act formed an epoch, and settled precedents, in the admission of new States to be formed out of our immense territories. If not, why was this act drawn with so many general provisions, among which is contained one for the protection of slave property in the new States to be formed? Why was it made the shibboleth of party faith, from the time of its passage, and during the whole of the campaign of 1856? Why was it that every Democratic orator in that campaign, in Pennsylvania and in the North and West, insisted that this principle of "popular sovereignty," legitimately and fairly carried out, was the principle which would banish the discussion of the slavery question from Congress, and localize the subject in the Territories, unless it did form an epoch on the subject, and commence the Democratic Olympiad in the admission of new States, from which, and not anterior to which, precedents were to be quoted? Let us inquire; what national precedent have we had, since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which we, who are opposed to "Lecompton," now proudly refer to, as indorsing our views?

Sir, at the last session of Congress a bill was passed by this body for the establishment of a territorial government in Minnesota, and the formation of a State government, in which it was affirmatively provided that the constitution should be submitted for the approval or rejection of her people. This was the first and only precedent that can appropriately be applied to the existing Kansas question; and we, as the Representatives of the people, should indorse, approve, and insist upon the application of this precedent in the admission of Kansas, as recommended in the President's annual message. In the last presidential campaign, "popular sovereignty" was, to the Democracy of the North, in its beneficent influence among the people, what the sermon on the Mount was to the early Christians, fixing the belief of the former in the truth of republican principles, as in the latter case in the purity of Christianity.

Let me refer to the vote upon this issue in the Union, for the purpose of proving that if its fair and honest application is ignored by this House, the entire body of the voters in the free States, at least, will be deceived worse than the ten thousand majority of citizens against the Lecompton constitution will be in Kansas. Mr. Buchanan received in the free States 1,272,783 votes, Mr. Fillmore 407,843 votes, and Mr. Frémont 1,333,675 votes. In the South Mr. Buchanan received 578,177 votes, Mr. Fillmore 478,117 votes, and Mr. Frémont 878 votes. Mr. Buchanan received in the North 634,606 more popular votes than he received in the South. Mr. Fillmore received 70,274 more votes in the South than he received in the North.

It will be seen that a large majority of those who voted for Mr. Buchanan were from the free States, who believed in the honesty of the professions of the party in favor of "popular sovereignty." Not only did the vote in the free States elect him, but he was nominated by the delegates from those States in the Cincinnati convention. The entire South, with but a few exceptions, were against his nomination, although after it was made that section reluctantly supported him in preference to Frémont. Mr. Buchanan therefore owes his nomination and election to the free States; yet he now presents to the world the spectacle of ignoring their rights, inside and outside of the Democratic party, as it appears to me, for no other purpose than to appease the clamor of southern malcontents who are continually talking about a dissolution of the Union. For myself, I love the Union as much as any one of my countrymen; but rather than be put in a state of vassalage to the minority of the people of the Union, south of Mason and Dixon's line, by the falsification of the platform of my party, and the disgrace and destruction of that party, I would consent to the withdrawal of some of those southern States whose Representatives on this floor talk so rashly of secession, provided they can legally and constitutionally do so, if, upon mature reflection, a majority of their people, in violation of their national compact, shall deem it to their interests to "let the Union slide."

Millions of our people having, in 1856, decided in favor of the principle of non-intervention by Congress, and of the people of Kansas regulating their own affairs, I shall never hereafter, unless the Kansas-Nebraska act be repealed, consent to the admission of any new State whose constitution is not submitted to the people for approval or rejection. The adoption of a constitution by a territorial convention will not be sufficient, unless the power to do so is expressly delegated to them. The southern Senators and Representatives passed the Kansas-Nebraska bill and repealed the Missouri compromise. Until the obiter dicta of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, it was believed by northern Democrats that the legal Territorial Legislature in Kansas had the power to prohibit slavery there. But the dicta of that court has shaken the belief with some; and the extreme southern, Calhoun doctrine, is indorsed by the President, that there can be no interference with slavery in the Territories, until a State constitution and government exist. Well, in the long battle waged upon this subject, the South has now the vantage ground under judicial sanction. But in the application of the principle of "popular sovereignty," they made the bargain and entered into the contract, and agreed to sustain it. I imagine they will gain nothing; but we of the North expect them to do as we intend doing, "live up to the bargain."

I have been surprised to hear gentlemen on this side of the Hall indulge in flings at compromises. Society itself is a compromise. The Federal Constitution is a great compromise. Calhoun, Clay, Webster, and the greatest minds the country ever produced, originated and supported compromises. In my judgment, so far as the extension of slavery into new territory is concerned, the repeal of the Missouri compromise was the most fatal error the South ever committed; and I believe that if Mr. Calhoun had been living he would have opposed that repeal. Duty and good faith now require the South to live up to the bond; and if, in the competition of emigration, they should be beaten, certain it is that they cannot be any worse off than they now are if they are always protected in their rights at home. The President, Mr. Clay, and other statesmen of the country, have been averse to the extension of slavery into free territory.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. We have had innumerable written essays read to the House, in violation of parliamentary law, and now we have a printed speech. I raise the point of order that it is incompetent for the gentleman from New York to read a printed speech to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can do the country more service, or better justify my course to my constituents, than by copying, as a part of my remarks, the beautiful exordium of our President in his celebrated speech in the Senate, June 8, 1844, upon the annexation of Texas, though, from a perusal, it will be discovered, when compared with his present attitude on the Kansas question, and the condition of affairs there, and the continuance of slavery in the States, to which he then so feelingly alluded, that he miscalculated the tenacity with which the slaveholding States would cling to their peculiar institution, upon which they rely to maintain that control in the Union which it is the recent boast of a distinguished champion of the South [Mr. Hammond] they have held for sixty years past.

"Mr. President, the present is a question of transcendent importance. For weal or for woe, for good or for evil, it is more momentous than any question which has been before the Senate since my connection with public affairs. To confine the consequences of our decision to the present generation would be to take a narrow and contracted view of the subject. The life of a great nation is not to be numbered by the few and fleeting years which limit the period of man's existence. The life of such a nation must be counted by centuries, and not by years. 'Nations unborn and ages yet behind' will be deeply affected in their moral, political, and social relations, by the final determination of this question: Shall Texas [Kansas] become a part of our glorious Confederacy? Shall she be bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh? or shall she become our dangerous and hostile rival? Shall our future history and that of hers diverge more and more from the present point, and exhibit those mutual jealousies and wars which, according to the history of the world, have ever been the misfortune of neighboring and rival nations? or shall their history be blended together in peace and harmony? These are the alternatives between which we must decide.

"In arriving at the conclusion to support this treaty, I had to encounter but one serious obstacle, and this was the question of slavery. Whilst I ever have maintained, and ever shall maintain, in their full force and vigor, the constitutional rights of the southern States over their slave property, I yet feel a strong repugnance, by any act of mine, to extend the present limits of the Union over a new slaveholding Territory. After mature reflection, however, I overcame these scruples, and now believe that the acquisition of Texas will be the means of limiting, not enlarging, the dominion of slavery. In the government of the world, Providence generally produces great changes by gradual means. There is nothing rash in the counsels of the Almighty. May not, then, the acquisition of Texas be the means of gradually drawing the slaves far to the south, to a climate more congenial to their nature; and may they not finally pass off into Mexico, and there mingle with a race where no prejudice exists against their color? The Mexican nation is composed of Spaniards, Indians, and negroes, blended together in every variety, who would receive our slaves on terms of perfect social equality. To this condition they never can be admitted in the United States. That the acquisition of Texas would ere long convert Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and probably others of the more northern slave States into free States, I entertain not a doubt."

In my opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I am actuated by no feeling of hostility to the President or the South. There are those here who know that I was one of the earliest, most devoted, and most serviceable of Mr. Buchanan's friends for his nomination and election. I am still his friend. But I cannot here stultify myself by voting to legalize what I deem the most stupendous fraud that Congress has ever been called upon to countenance, upon the plea of expediency—a word the Democracy have ever despised—that good may come of evil. That gross and infamous frauds were committed by the pro-slavery party in December and January last, at the elections in Kansas, is patent in every hamlet and workshop in the country.

"According to the official returns of the vote of December 21, on the Lecompton constitution, the result stood as follows:

Constitution with slavery.....	6,143
Constitution with no slavery.....	569
Majority.....	5,574

"At this election 3,347 votes are officially reported as having been polled in the following precincts:

Oxford.....	1,226
Shawnee.....	753
Fort Scott.....	329
Kickapoo.....	1,017
Total.....	3,325

"The evidence of the judges and clerk of the election of December 21, who have testified before the Board of Commissioners to investigate the Kansas frauds, prove that the actual vote was:

Oxford precinct.....	42
Shawnee precinct.....	115
Fort Scott precinct.....	150
Kickapoo precinct.....	385
Total.....	692

"It will be seen, therefore, that of the 6,143 votes counted in the 'official' returns' as having been polled, 2,655 were fraudulent; which, deducted from said official returns, leave but 3,488 votes for the Lecompton constitution, a portion of which were no doubt as fraudulent as those of Oxford, Kickapoo, &c."

The frauds proven to have been committed by the pro-slavery party in Johnson, Shawnee, Oxford, and McGee counties, and at Kickapoo and the Delaware Crossing, are sufficient to forever disgrace self-created president and would-be-Senator Calhoun, who, like a thimble-rigger, holds the destinies of the Kansas Legislature and her State officers under his thumb, and offers to wager "five, ten, or twenty you can't tell where the little joker is." From what we know of him, it is plain that he will cheat everybody in making his final returns, but himself. How humiliating and insulting to the nation to have the admission of a sister State depending upon such a man, who usurped his whole power through his being an officer of the Federal Government.

When California applied for admission into the Union, Senators Mason and Hunter, of Virginia; Butler and Barnwell, of South Carolina; Turney, of Tennessee; Soule, of Louisiana; Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi; Atchison, of Missouri; and Morton and Yulee, of Florida—all Democrats—signed a protest, which was entered upon the Journals of the Senate, objecting to the passage of the bill admitting her as a State into the Union, for the following reasons:

"1. That it gave the sanction of law, and thus imparted validity, to an unauthorized action by a portion or the inhabitants of California.

"2. Without any legal census, or other evidence of their possessing the number of citizens necessary to authorize the representation they may claim.

"3. Without any of those safeguards about the ballot-box, which can only be provided by law, and which are necessary to ascertain the true sense of a people.

"4. As 'not having sufficient evidence of its (the constitution) having the assent of a majority of the people for whom it was signed.'"

This is exactly what Wise, Walker, and Douglas are now saying about the admission of Kansas; and yet the Senators who set the example on California now propose to read them out of the party for following the text too closely.

Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people is too dear to me, to forsake its just application here, to gratify those who dispense patronage. In speaking of it, De Tocqueville says:

"Whenever the political laws of the United States are to be discussed it is with the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people that we must begin. In America the principle of the sovereignty of the people is not either barren, or concealed; it is recognized by the customs, and proclaimed by the laws; it spreads freely, and arrives without impediment at its most remote consequences." * * * "From their origin the sovereignty of the people was the fundamental principle of the greater number of the British colonies in America."

Montesquieu, in his "Spirit of the Laws," says:

"There is no great share of probity necessary to support a monarchical or despotic government. The force of laws in one, and the prince's arm in the other, are sufficient to direct and maintain the whole. But in a popular State one spring more is necessary, namely, virtue. When virtue is banished, ambition invades the hearts of those who are disposed to receive it, and avarice possesses the whole community. The desires now change their objects; what they were proud of before now becomes indifferent; they were free while under the restraint of law; they will now be free to act against law; and as every citizen is like a slave escaped from his master's house, what was a maxim of equity they call rigor, what was a rule of action they call constraint, and to precaution they give the name of fear. Frugality, and not the thirst of gain, now passes for avarice. Formerly, the wealth of individuals constituted the public treasure; but now the public treasure has become the patrimony of private persons. The members of the commonwealth riot on the public spoils, and its strength is only the power of some citizens, and the licentiousness of the whole community."

I have thus quoted from the philosophical Montesquieu, because what he so ably wrote in the last century, is applicable to the present state of affairs in our Republic. Corruption stalks abroad throughout the land. It is to be discovered in the municipal, in the State, and in the Federal Governments, and few objects other than amassing fortunes, right or wrong, now actuate those who seek and obtain positions of power and patronage. The old fashioned Democratic party in the better days of the Republic viewed offices as a necessity to carry on the Government, and sought only integrity of purpose in those who were to occupy them, repudiating the thought that Federal officials were in any manner to interfere with, much less control, the people. But, alas, the times have changed and are now "sadly out of joint." An army of Federal officials has usurped where it could the polls, and the servants of the people have attempted to become their masters. The Administration has erected a test of Democratic orthodoxy by insisting that all who desire its smiles or favor must ignore the principle upon which it lives, and stultify and disgrace themselves, under penalty of being called "Republicans." It has erected, too, the standard of patronage against principle, and with revengeful hand strips of the former, all Democrats who have independence and character, in order to confer it upon more servile tools. I fear that this Administration is doomed to the fate of Dr. Guillotine, who fell by an instrument which he had invented to cut off the heads of others.

Mr. Chairman, I really regret the position of the Administration in its Federal attempt to force Kansas into the Union under the usurped Lecompton constitution, thus creating a State out of a population of about fifty thousand people, not half so large, intelligent, or wealthy, as that of the congressional district I have the honor to represent; and thus forcing two Senators into the Senate of the United States, and one Representative in this House. This latter fact alone would induce me to hesitate before voting for her admission, if she were not, as she is under the Lecompton constitution, covered all over with damning frauds.

Sir, the President may yet live to see his error in this matter; and, in considering the injustice done the northern Democracy, may have reason to exclaim, "had I served the North with half the zeal I served the South, they would not, at mine age, have left me naked to mine enemies."

Mr. DOWDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to detain the committee at this time, by a consideration of all the points involved in the Kansas question. Under the rule, I will not have the time, did I so desire. But I do not desire it. The subject has been freely and fully discussed for the last four years. The country is in possession of all the facts and all the arguments. It remains for us to pronounce the decision. What the judgment of Congress will be, I know not; but of its results I propose to say a few words. Before proceeding to speak, however, upon this great and leading question, I will briefly allude to another subject which has occupied largely the public attention, and is intimately connected with the public interests. In some form its consideration will become, at an early day, the duty of the House. Not by any means underrating its importance, I simply allude to it for the purpose of protesting against an assumption of power of dangerous precedent exercised in the arrest of William Walker and his followers, by our naval forces, on foreign soil. The act was in violation of laws, the strict observance of which is of the utmost importance to the peace of the country, and a regard for the rights of its citizens. It was the duty of the Executive to enforce observance to the neutrality laws, to prevent illegal expeditions being fitted out and carried on against foreign nations, with whom we are at peace. No good citizen can complain of his discharge of this duty, whatever opinion may be entertained of the wisdom of those laws. They do not, nor were they designed to, interfere with the right of an American citizen to expatriate himself—to emigrate with his arms in his hand. Even illegal expeditions, when within the jurisdiction of a foreign Government at peace with us, are beyond the reach of this Government. The act of arrest was not only a "grave error," but the exercise of power unauthorized, and demanded signal rebuke. The purity of motive, however it may palliate the offense of the individual in the court of conscience, cannot cure the violation of law, restore the losses of the injured, nor avert the danger of the precedent.

With these words I leave this subject for the present, and pass to another, more immediately demanding our attention, which I regard to be of the gravest character. No more important subject can be presented for our action than the admission of a sovereign State into our political Union. To the case now before us additional importance attaches, because of violent opposition, and the danger of results involving the peace of the country and the integrity of the Republic. States have been refused admission upon their first application. The postponement, although inconvenient, did not disturb the operations of the Government, nor interrupt the harmony of our relations. The cause of refusal was not violative of the spirit and fundamental condition of union. Therefore no serious consequences followed. The reason offered by the opposition for refusing to admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, strikes a blow at the rights of all the slaveholding States. Before venturing upon a decision of such momentous magnitude, it becomes us well to deliberate.

In the history of all Governments, no principle is better established than that a division of power is essential to the preservation of liberty. Political power, wherever located, under any form of government, unrestrained, is despotic. It matters not whether lodged in the hands of one, a few, or many; only in the latter it is the more dangerous. A monarch, with a conscience to restrain him, might relent, hesitate, stop short of his victim; majorities never. Without souls or consciences, they would pursue their purposes and their victims to the bitter end. The founders of our system, well understanding this truth, attempted to frame a government of divided power, with such checks, balances, and limitations, as would effectually guard the weaker against encroachment from the stronger, and forever prevent the concentration of power in any of its departments.

For all the ordinary ends and purposes of society, this has been achieved. The system is found to work admirably in practice. The three great departments of Government, the legislative, executive, and judicial, have been kept distinct and independent. Neither House has infringed the rights and privileges of the other. Nor has the executive power been enlarged at the expense of the legislative or judicial. All this granted—the great departments are in the possession of all the power bestowed on each by the Constitution—and further, that the States, in their separate jurisdictions, hold their reserved rights and powers intact: let me ask, of what benefit to public and private liberty becomes our beautiful theory of a Confederacy, with its checks and balances between State and Federal authority, the division of power between the different departments of each, if, by a combination of States, all these departments of power, executive, legislative, and judicial, should pass into the hands of a majority, become united, and wielded in a line of policy hostile to the rights of the minority? Of what avail, I repeat the question, with this state of facts, are paper constitutions to the protection of the minority, however admirably they may be contrived, or stringently guarded, without power is conceded to negative aggressive legislation? Do not our systems of government, State and Federal, with their multiplied limitations upon power, demonstrate the aim of our fathers to have been to guard the rights of individuals and minorities against the tyranny of majorities? And will not this design be totally thwarted, and our constitutional Government be essentially changed, by a permanent combination of a majority of the States with strength sufficient to hold and control all the powers of Federal legislation? Most assuredly so. And especially is it true, when the cause and continuance of such combination spring from hatred and hostility to an institution peculiar to the minority. And it may be added, the more dangerous because of geographical distinction.

In this connection the reply may be given, that the proposition is an impossibility under our present form of government, because the Constitution positively prohibits a State "to enter into any agreement or compact with another State." This is true, and yet my proposition does not fail. No two or more States may formally enter into any agreement or compact against another State; and yet, through the agency of the Federal Government, a majority of the States may effectually combine, hold possession of all the departments, and with the facility of construction common to aggressors, torture the meaning, without altering a letter of the Constitution, so as to most grievously oppress the minority. Thus it will be seen how we may be oppressed, and how easily the spirit of the original compact may be extinguished whilst its beautiful body remains. The next question is, will this dangerous combination be made? Are there any signs of such approaching madness?

Mr. Chairman, we all know the power and influence of party associations. Those who march under the same banner are always friends when an enemy is before them in the field; the stronger the antagonist, and the more desperate the encounter to be met, the stronger are the ties of union, and the warmer the sympathies of friendship. After the battle, the common joy of victory, or commiseration over defeat, cements more closely the bonds of fellowship. The cry of the old Shibboleth, with all its exciting associations in the past, will rally the clansmen long after the objects of combination have passed away. In this country numerous instances can be cited where political party feelings have proved superior to the ties of personal friendship, and party animosities have destroyed kindred and church relations. Notwithstanding the strength and stubbornness of this feeling, dividing and swaying the masses of our countrymen, controlling the operation of the Government from the beginning, who has not seen strong national parties go down under the tread of sectional columns—bonds stronger than steel dissolve in the fires of sectional strife? But a few years ago the proud old Whig banner was triumphantly waving in a majority of the States, and the gallant leaders, with a patriotism as broad as the Union, commanded the love of their followers and the admiration of their opponents. They have passed away. The banner no longer floats upon the breeze. The voice of the multitude hailing it with loud acclaim is now hushed; no vestige remains.

To tell where the garden had been."

Sectionalism divided and conquered it. Such, too, was the fate of the American party. That organization, after a feeble attempt at nationality, even with the strong declaration for "the maintenance of the Union of these United States, as the paramount political good, or the primary object of patriotic desire," could not stem the waves of sectionalism. It passed as a shadow—fled away as a vision of the night. There was left but one great political association, whose professions and policy looked to the interests of the whole country—the last hope of the patriot. To its ranks were gathered the conservative of all sections. Whigs and Americans, who sympathized with us in the conflict with sectionalism, to this national standard were rallied. The battle was fought; we won the victory. Hope revived for a peaceful and glorious future to our country. Confidence in the strength of the Government and the perpetuity of our republican institutions was partially restored. How long to last? Ere the temporary fruits of victory are gathered, a cloud comes over us—the shadows of death settle upon the path. The steps of the destroyer are heard within our borders, and the spirit of dissension has fastened upon our vitals. Shall the national Democracy fall a prey to sectional jealousy? Shall the glorious old party of the Constitution, who, in peace and in war, have upheld the honor of the country and maintained the principles of republican liberty, go down in the shock of battle? Let this disaster overtake us, let this evil day come, and it will be followed by a long night of direful calamities. There will be left, I doubt not, in every northern State, patriotic men, devoted and true to the Constitution—many who would willingly lay down their lives for the constitutional rights of the South, I believe. But, overshadowed and borne down by a sectional majority in every State, they would be powerless for good.

Now, sir, under this state of facts, with the causes which have brought it to pass, let me ask, what security will the minority States have against oppression? If party cords, however stubborn and strong; the cohesive iron bands of common interest; the ties of kindred blood, and personal friendship; the sacred and holy links of brotherly love, hallowed by the strong memories of the glorious past; if these, if all these, cannot withstand the dissolving fires of sectional hate, I repeat the question, what security is there against oppression? Do you point me to the checks, balances, and limitations of our federative system? to the constitutional declaration of rights, its definitions and prohibitions of power? These, sir, would snap asunder like the green withes wherein Samson was bound; "as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire." The power of construction could easily remove all these wholesome obstacles which fence the path of tyranny. They would bend to the desires of the majority, as the tall oaks to the sweep of the tempest. The history of mankind, the world over, proves it. Collisions only can be avoided by effectual limitations to power. There must be a potent voice to say, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further;" or else, "the waves will roll not back." Hitherto our system of government has furnished that check, and our Constitution spoken that voice. Hitherto obedience followed the command, and the "proud waves were staid." Did the spirit of the old Union live, liberty would live; State rights and private rights would be sacred, shielded against even the stealthy and insidious power of construction. But, sir, once let all the departments of the Government pass into the hands of a combined majority section; and, whether the united powers would be used aggressively or not, the Constitution would immediately lose its vitality, the distinctive conservative feature of our system be destroyed, and the minority would become dependent upon the capricious will of the majority States.

But suppose the majority, thus armed with power, disclaim all designs to injure—suppose them, for the time being, to be actuated by a love of justice: does this alter, in the least, the subject condition of the minority? To test the supposition, let us say we believe your professions sincere; you intend us no harm; you have the power, but will refrain from its exercise to our injury; what objection have you then, in the absence of evil designs, to submit to wholesome restraints upon that power? If you never intend to exercise it oppressively, give us the evidence by laying a portion of it down. If you refuse, however sincere may be your professions, we are warned, by the history of the past, to be on our guard. Equality between States, so essential to liberty, cannot long be maintained under an inequality between sections or combinations of States, unless the stronger be circumscribed in their powers. The dangerous state of affairs in which we find ourselves was clearly not contemplated by the fathers of the Republic, or else, with their intense opposition to centralized power, they would have guarded against it. The fears of our predecessors, soon after this Government went into operation, were aroused to this danger, and herculean efforts have been made to prevent disaster to the system by preserving equality between sections. The struggle has been a fierce one. With this view, for a long period, States have been admitted in pairs—a slaveholding and a non-slaveholding together. The equilibrium has thus been maintained up to a very recent period. The admission of California, in 1850, turned the scale against the South. Up to the time of that compromise we were safely guarded against encroachments. The Senate stood like a mountain in the path of the aggressor. By the admission of California we lost the balance—both the great legislative departments passed into the hands of the free States.

Sir, holding this department of power, we could not, if we would, invade the rights of the other section; but we could prevent encroachments upon our rights. That important negative power, helpless to injure, mighty to protect, has been lost. We now stand relying for safety on national parties, and the love of justice which may remain in the bosoms of the majority. In ordinary times, these subordinate securities may prove beneficial; but we know they are as nothing in the path of avarice, ambition, and fanaticism. Parties are but the creatures of a day, the accidents of the hour. They are liable to change from constant occurring combinations, as new interests arise, or new whims are to be gratified. The lovers of justice have been too often driven by the wicked multitude to "mountains and deserts—to the dens and caves of the earth; have been doomed to wander about in sheep skins and goat skins, destitute, afflicted, tormented"—for us to rely solely upon this principle for protection. Something more than the mere love of justice in Governments, however civilized, is found necessary to prevent wrong. In framing the organic law, the people must be imbued with the wisdom and sense of right sufficiently great to part with a portion of their powers, and thereby extract the teeth and claws of the lion of authority; or else the weaker will, sooner or later, become a prey to the stronger. Whatever be the form of the government, this evil tendency in man, to usurp and wield power, must be provided against to escape tyranny.

If necessity, then, be laid upon a people whose interests are identical, to bridle power to preserve freedom, how much more urgent the reason for restraints upon a Government whose authority extends over large Territories, holding dissimilar and often antagonistic interests?

In thus contending, Mr. Chairman, for better safeguards to liberty than political parties can furnish, I do not mean to disparage the worth of the Democratic party. In all the sectional conflicts of the past, that party has given to the councils of the country men good and true, who have faithfully stood by the constitution. My own section, demanding only her just and equal rights under that instrument, have found in that noble party a trusty and faithful ally. Hitherto it has deserved, in maintaining its integrity, the confidence bestowed by the South. It is to be lamented that many have fallen in the battle; some have deserted the standard; distinguished leaders have wandered off, and united their fortunes with the enemy; but the party still lives, and, I am proud to believe, holds in the North a host of patriots with hearts still true to the right. Unwilling to despair of the Republic, I must hope that the little band, though weakened by desertions and depressed by the diminution of confidence, will, with the daring courage of noble hearts, bravely face the storm. In time, they may gather the pure and the good, and rally strength to save the Constitution from the hand of the destroyer. Whatever be our destiny, the true men of the North will live long in the affections of the generous and patriotic sons of the South.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that I have shown to the committee the danger to our institutions of unrestrained majorities. I have not alluded to the increasing hostility between the two sections, to be gathered from legislative resolves and acrimonious articles in the public press, both religious and secular. The spirit of crimination and recrimination prevails to an alarming extent. From this source reasons could be multiplied leading to the same conclusion. But none are so blind as not to see that perils environ our position of the gravest character. With all my confidence in the Democratic party, and notwithstanding the hope expressed in its fidelity, I must still believe that some more potent and enduring check is imperatively demanded for our security against invasion. Upon this point, were any doubts left, my opinions would be confirmed by the bold declarations of a northern Senator, who is regarded the head and front of the Black Republican party; one who speaks the sentiments and shadows forth the designs of that infatuated organization. His philosophic eye discerns the condition of affairs and takes in the future. The boast of power which he makes discloses the dangers to which the minority are exposed. In a recent debate on the Army bill, the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] said to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE:]

"I am very sorry that the faith of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire is less than my own. He apprehends continual disaster. He wants this battle continued and fought by skirmishes, and to deprive the enemy of every kind of supplies. Sir, I regard this battle as already fought. It is over. All the mistake is that the honorable Senator and others do not know it. We are fighting for a majority of free States. There are already sixteen to fifteen; and whatever the Administration may do—whatever anybody may do—before one year from this time we shall be nineteen to fifteen."

Mark well the language. These words were not delivered in haste. Coolly and deliberately uttered, they were the convictions of his judgment. I was in the Senate at the time, and heard them. To me it was a note of warning from the enemy. "We are fighting for a majority of free States;" "this battle is already fought;" "sixteen to fifteen;" and soon "nineteen to fifteen." If the rights of States and sections are to be respected, if the Constitution of the United States is to be regarded, let me ask the reason for the boast of a majority of free States. It is given in another speech of the Senator's. He said:

"I expect to see this Union stand until there shall not be the footstep of a slave impressed upon the soil that it protects, although that soil will be extended, for aught I know, from the North Pole to the Caribbean sea, as it has already extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean."

NEW SERIES....No. 67.

Whatever opinions others may entertain, there remains upon my mind not the shadow of a doubt as to the action of a party with such sentiments, when they shall be clothed with the power to legislate. They will, in a majority, wield powers destructive of our rights and property. If designs dangerous and despotic are not meditated, let me again ask why the exultation at the "majority of free States," coupled with the expectation of seeing "no footstep of a slave upon the soil" of the country? And subsequently the same opinions were reiterated in a set speech by that Senator. Sir, this spirit of aggression will not stop at the seizure of all the common territory. Nothing short of universal dominion will satisfy its voracious appetite. The sight of ruined cities and desolated fields from the fanatic and his object will not arrest him in his wild career, nor curb the passion for conquest.

By virtue of the Constitution, interpreted by the highest judicial authority, the southern States have the right to carry their slave property and plant their institutions upon the common territories of the Union. This right must not be impaired, nor our progress and expansion impeded. The law now in force allows it; stern necessity in time will demand it; woe betide that people who shall, even under the forms of legislation, attempt to forbid its exercise. Sir, is there a man who doubts the attempt will be made, should the Black Republicans control the Government? Hatred to African slavery is their bond of union; its ultimate and entire suppression the corner-stone upon which they build. To this end, the declaration, "no more slaveholding States to be admitted into this Union." Not a Representative of that party would vote to admit a slaveholding State this day, however legal and regular her application. Were the slavery clause the only possible objection, it alone would be sufficient to control the action of their representatives in both branches of Congress. Thus stands the case now. The prospect of a change of opinion on the part of the representative will at once vanish, when it is known that the constituency behind are far in advance of the delegate in hatred to our institutions. To their fixedness of purpose and bitterness of feeling, intensified by fanatic religious zeal, may be added the motives of imaginary spoils to be reaped in victory, and supposed immunity from harm to themselves in the conflict. Under these circumstances, I must confess that I can imagine no probability of a change of opinion that will inure to the benefit of the South.

The rapid growth of Abolitionism, its power to dissolve national parties so unmistakably given, its present strength and bold attitude in Congress, and its constantly augmenting power, should teach the minority section to look to remedies, in addition to national parties, for their protection. The admission of Kansas, should she continue to be a slaveholding State, will not remedy the evil, nor materially alter the condition of things. The disparity between the two sections will not be diminished. Oregon and Minnesota come immediately after, if not before, to swell the majority of free States. Soon will follow Washington and Nebraska, Utah, and probably New Mexico. With this great probable preponderance of northern power, to be inflamed by the ruthless madness of a fiery fanaticism, to grow in its excesses by each succeeding victory, what remedy short of a change in the organic law can be found equal to the emergency? What other plan to be devised which will lead to a peaceful solution of our difficulties? Sir, appeals to patriotism, invocations of right and justice, the recounted memories of a common struggle for liberty, will fall upon the dominant majority like the voice of flattery upon the "dull, cold ear of death." These will not do; they are temporary expedients, vain and illusory. In the dark hour, party organizations, with professed devotion to national platforms, cannot withstand the advance of sectional legions. With a fell purpose to uproot and trample upon the old landmarks of friendship, they come with the tread of the Behemoth and the blast of the hurricane.

They propose by this interference with our domestic institutions, through a sectional organization controlling the majority States, to pervert our Constitution, one of whose main objects was "to insure domestic tranquillity, so as to inaugurate domestic violence."

Sir, the great patriot statesman of the South, Calhoun, who, whilst living, had no superior, and dead, leaves not his like behind, has placed upon record, after a life of the largest experience, the profound reflections of his matured judgment on this subject. He was devotedly attached to the Union, and he endeavored most earnestly to impress upon the minds of his countrymen the means for its preservation. He said:

"This spirit of fanaticism aims openly and directly at destroying the existing relations between the races in the southern section; on which depends its peace, prosperity, and safety. To effect this, exclusion from the Territories is an important step; and hence the union between the Abolitionists and the advocates of exclusion, to effect objects so intimately connected. All this has brought about a state of things hostile to the continuance of the Union, unless timely prevented."

After speaking of the inadequacy of a restoration of the Federal character of the Government to furnish a remedy, he continues:

"The nature of the disease is such that nothing can reach it short of some organic change—a change which shall so modify the Constitution as to give the weaker section a negative on the action of the Government."

Sir, the deliberate opinions of this profound thinker and wise statesman deserve something more than a passing thought. Every day since they were written their truth becomes more and more evident. A few more years in the same direction, and the "disease" of which he speaks, "unless timely prevented," will result in death to the body politic.

Mr. Chairman, although the admission of Kansas will not restore the equilibrium between sections, as before stated, our right decision of the question is none the less important. Be the result what it may, the vote will teach a most useful lesson, and go far to establish the truth of the position which I have assumed. I will not now review the course of this and the previous Administrations, or their agents, subsequent to the organization of this Territory, and preliminary to the formation of the constitution which is here presented. Many things have been done which do not meet my approval, and yet there is much to deserve the approbation of the South. The main fact that both the present Administration and its predecessor have unwaveringly supported the regular authorities of the Territory, and promptly suppressed faction and rebellion—have interpreted the Kansas-Nebraska act to mean that no power less than the constitution-making power can permanently fix and regulate their domestic relations, and thereby secured to the people of the South the right to carry and hold their property in the Territory—furnishes a good and sufficient reason for me to have given and to continue my support. Whilst, therefore, differing with the President in his reasoning upon the propriety and necessity of submitting the constitution, or any part of it, to the masses for ratification or rejection, I cheerfully accord to him patriotic motives, and fully concur in the conclusion at which he arrived. For the bold and manly tone of his last message, the just sentiments, the clear and unequivocal declarations of right, and the firm determination avowed to maintain the act of the Lecompton convention, he is justly entitled to the respect and gratitude of all good men in the Union. Did the same spirit animate the masses of our countrymen, the same opinions of, and regard for, constitutional law prevail throughout the North, the dangers to which I have adverted would be long postponed, if not entirely avoided. To accomplish this desirable end, a rapid and radical change must take place in northern feeling and opinion.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] who preceded me, is mistaken in stating that the State of Alabama has passed resolutions condemnatory of Mr. Buchanan. They justly condemned the course pursued by Governor Walker, but expressed confidence in the President. His position, in his late message, has vindicated the wisdom of that confidence. I am truly sorry, that the gentleman and his associate Democrats, who oppose the Lecompton constitution, have placed themselves in the category with Governor Walker, and have not verified a like confidence expressed in their behalf by many in the South.

Kansas stands knocking at the door for admission. Were her slaveholding policy fixed, her entrance would not restore political equality to the South. But this policy is by no means permanent. Yet, because her constitution recognizes the right in her citizens to hold African slaves, so inimical is the feeling among northern Representatives to that institution, her admission is doubtful. This reason controls the entire Republican party. It is true, other grounds are also relied on; no one doubts, however, the chief objection with that party to be the slavery clause in her constitution. A part of the northern Democratic Representatives coöperate with the Republicans. They assert themselves to be influenced by another consideration; still they are found in a line with the enemy. In this crisis it is deeply to be regretted that all who do not make the slavery clause an objection are not found acting together. The question of submitting, by the convention, its work directly to the vote of the masses, is one only of expediency, about which there may be legitimately difference of opinion. Its decision belongs to the people of the State, not to Congress. Our inquiry extends only to whether the constitution be the will of the people legally expressed; whether there are in the State the requisite number of inhabitants, and whether the government is republican in form. The fact that a majority of the States admitted into the Union presented constitutions which had not been submitted to the vote of the masses, beyond all doubt settles the controversy that, with this question, we have nothing to do. To refuse a State admission for this cause—to require compliance with such a demand as a condition precedent to admission—would not be leaving them "free to act in their own way," but it would be the exercise of power not granted us by the Federal Constitution, and certainly in the very teeth of the act organizing the Territory.

Doubtless some confusion has arisen, from a misapprehension in the public mind as to the force of the term the people when used in a political sense. When it is declared to be the intent of the Kansas act "to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," does the term "people," here used, include all or a part of the inhabitants; those acting without legal form, or in accordance with law? Does leaving them "free to act in their own way" contemplate or warrant action in any sense, without legal forms? In my opinion, clearly not. It has been asserted that the convention, although legally assembled, is not the master but the servant of the people. Reference to the Constitution of the United States, and many of the State constitutions, satisfies me that both positions are false. A convention is neither the master nor the servant of the people. It is the potent voice of the people; or, to be more emphatic, it is, in the highest legal and constitutional sense, the people. "We, the people, do ordain," is the language of the Federal Constitution, spoken by the Federal Convention which framed it. "We, the people, do ordain," is the language of some of the State conventions which ratified it. It was not submitted to the masses of the Union, for, constitutionally, there is no such people; nor was it submitted to the masses of any one State. Yet the people both ordained and ratified it. What people? A representative people, a people in the republican sense of the term. Such is likewise the fact in regard to many of the State constitutions. The same term is used, "we, the people of the State, do ordain," and yet the constitutions adopted were not submitted to popular suffrage. Conventions assembled in accordance with law, are the people in an organized capacity. Now, shall we presume to violate the sovereignty of a State, by polling her masses to ascertain whether the voice spoken by her convention is the truly expressed will of the people? To do so, would be to exercise arbitrary power.

The people of Kansas have, in accordance with authorities duly constituted by Congress in the organic act, in accordance with the laws of her government, in conformity to the requirements of the Federal Constitution, in a line with numerous precedents of States of the Union, adopted for themselves, in their own way, a constitution republican in form. Shall we admit or reject her? In my humble judgment there is not the shadow of a sound reason for refusal. The Lecompton convention was a political body, duly invested with power to make and ordain a constitution. The discretion to refer its work back to the masses belonged to it exclusively. They saw proper to submit the most material portion. All the bona fide inhabitants qualified to vote were invited to express their opinions by their votes. An election was held, of which due notice was given, and a large majority of those voting indorsed the portion submitted. Those who refused to vote, according to every sound principle of law, are presumed to acquiesce—are bound by the decision. Otherwise, there is, through the ballot-box, no safety to constitutional liberty. To delay admission, to require her to reconstruct her organic law, will be to countenance a rebellious spirit in her midst which has denied the authority of her government from the beginning. The dividing line in that Territory, truly says the President, is "between those who are loyal to this government, and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and by usurpation."

The constitution presented is the expression of the sovereign will of the people who acknowledge the authority of law. Those who voted against it, under an unconstitutional act of the Stanton Legislature, were composed mostly of those who have uniformly resisted regular authority. To admit is to regard the will of the loyal and law-abiding; to reject will promote rebellion. If the Stanton Legislature had the legal right to alter the requirements of the convention, it had the power to repeal the constitution. The assumption of such a right reverses the whole theory of our Government. Its action, under the circumstances, was of no more authority than any other peaceable assemblage of citizens; and the voice of the people evoked cannot be regarded, because they speak only through legal channels.

There is a manifest tendency in the public mind to revolutionary ideas and doctrines. This growing impatience of legal and constitutional restraints—the thirst for something new and startling—is an evil omen of the times. The rapid progress of the spirit of change will, ere long, unless counteracted, place our dearest rights at the mercy of uncontrolled numerical majorities. The prevalent idea that a mere majority can, at will, assemble and change the organic law of a State, and that no legitimate restraints can be imposed upon their action, is at war with old republican ideas, and will lead to popular despotism. Another distinguished son of South Carolina, Hugh S. Legaré, now no more, on this point has most eloquently said:

"The restraints which modern society has imposed upon itself in the exercise of its sovereignty are only an acknowledgment of the fallibility of man. In our own republican institutions this self-denial has always struck me as something sublime. All absolute power, if allowed to act on sudden impulses, will and must be tyrannical; nor does it signify in the least by what name it is called, except, perhaps, that the galling severity of the bondage is in proportion to the number of masters. In the true spirit of Christian humility, the most sublime of all virtues, the people have taken care that they shall not be led into temptation by that omnipotence which God alone may not abuse, and reserving to themselves ultimately an absolute control over their own destinies, have practically restrained the exercise of their sovereignty, by withholding from their agents some of its highest attributes."

Sir, I will not deny to the people their right, when assembled in their sovereign capacity, to modify and change their form of government. This right, asserted in the Declaration of Independence, was stationed outside of constitutions as an additional guard to the liberty, safety, and happiness of the people. But as "all changes in the fundamental laws of a State, ought to be the work of time, ample discussion, and reflection," it would be much safer to confine its exercise within the forms prescribed by the Constitution. For a government of a State to call into action the sov-ern power, on ordinary occasions, contrary to a prescribed rule by the people, to say the least, is inexpedient. Such a procedure, in my judgment, can only be justified by the highest public necessity. I know that this responsibility has been assumed by some of the State governments, and in this manner New York, Indiana, Maryland, and others, have amended their constitutions, and no immediate evil results have followed.

But the fact that in all the State constitutions guards have been thrown around the amending power, requiring concurring votes of successive Legislatures, and in many cases a majority of two thirds, and thereafter a ratification by the qualified electors, shows the opinion of the people to be adverse to sudden alterations, and that danger was to be apprehended at this point. Mr. Chairman, in this age, the danger to liberty is not in hampering majorities, but the opposite; not in restraining public opinion, but in giving a loose rein to its ebullitions and excesses. Sir, majorities can always take care of themselves; but private interests and minority rights appeal to limitations and restrictions upon power to protect them. The more tardy the process, the more cumbrous the machinery in effecting a change of the fundamental law, the greater the security to the citizen.

Objection is made by some to the admission of Kansas, because, in the schedule attached to her constitution, the Legislature is not authorized to call a convention for purposes of amendment until after the year 1864. Now, sir, whatever may be our individual opinions as to the wisdom and propriety of this provision, I humbly submit that Congress has nothing to do with this question—it belongs exclusively to the people of that State. But do those who object, remember that Indiana was admitted with a similar clause in her constitution, only the time-interdicting amendment was twelve years—just double that of Kansas. Who objected to her admission upon this ground? She was a free State. No one in the North, so far as I know, cared about the limitations which she imposed upon her government. But the force in the objection, in the present case, may be found in the fact that Kansas is a slaveholding State. Indiana, notwithstanding the limitation, changed her constitution before the time fixed had expired. Kansas, if she so desires, can do the same thing. I do not say that it will be wise in her people to do so. I believe it imprudent for any State to act differently from the forms prescribed in her constitution. But what is my opinion; what the opinions of all the members of this House? Has not a State the power to pursue her own policy; to carry out the wishes of her people "in her own way?" This clause in the constitution of Kansas does not change its republican form. We are not permitted to look for any other objection.

Mr. Chairman, the State of Alabama, whose people I have the honor in part to represent, by the unanimous voice of her Legislature has, in the event of the rejection of Kansas, authorized a convention to be called to determine her course of action. Taking her position by the side of the State of Georgia, "she will and ought to resist, even (as a last resort) to a disruption of every tie which binds her to the Union, any action of Congress upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in places subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, incompatible with the safety, domestic tranquillity, the rights and honor of the slaveholding States; or any act regulating the slave trade between the slaveholding States; or any refusal to admit as a State any Territory hereafter applying, because of the existence of slavery therein; or any act prohibiting the introduction of slavery into the Territories of Utah or New Mexico; or any act repealing or materially modifying the laws now in force for the recovery of fugitive slaves." Sir, to her I owe my allegiance. Whatever course she may in her wisdom pursue, as one of her sons, bound to her by every tie, in weal or in woe, I shall cling to her fortunes.

I will not disguise my feelings on this question. It is indeed painful to me to contemplate the necessity laid upon my State to invoke her sovereign power to resist aggression. Believing, as I solemnly do, unless some constitutional check be placed upon northern power—increasing daily in numbers, and in fanaticism—the minority States will be, at all times, liable to oppression, I heartily concur in the resolutions adopted by her Legislature. The time for action is at hand. Did I not warn my people of the dangers which threaten the overthrow of their rights, I should not be a faithful sentinel. That the deliberations of her convention when called, may result in some plan furnishing additional safeguards to liberty—protecting the rights of the South, without severing the bonds which unite the States, is my most earnest desire. To this end, limitations upon the powers of the combined majority section are absolutely indispensable. Those who profess to love the Union "may cry peace," at the passage of this or that measure, "but there will be no peace;" there will be, if I rightly comprehend the strength and designs of the Black Republicans, no cessation of hostilities; no pause in the march of aggression; no security for our rights, nor safety to the country, until this end be attained. The responsibility rests upon the majority section. Consenting to this necessary check upon their powers, they can restore harmony between the two sections—they can dry up the bitter waters of strife. Otherwise these dark waters will flow on until all the feelings of friendship are poisoned; all motives to union destroyed; and all the blessings that we now enjoy in common so richly, forever engulfed.

Mr. CASE, at half past five o'clock, obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman from Indiana will give way, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. CASE. I must decline to yield.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire if the gentleman from Indiana has made a bargain with the chairman to speak until six o'clock.

Mr. CASE. No, sir; I have made no bargain.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I protest against farming out the floor of the House in this way.

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a point of order, and that is that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASE] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor to take an appeal.

Mr. MORGAN. I made a point of order, and I appealed from the decision of the Chair on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair overruled the point of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is not a point of order from which an appeal can be taken.

Mr. GROW. Any decision which the Chair can make is subject to appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not entertain the appeal.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair will not?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MORGAN. I appeal from your decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chairman is certainly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order, and will take his seat.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to take my seat. I appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I say, Mr. Chairman, you are bound to entertain it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no way by which the Chair can ascertain whether there is or is not a quorum of members present. The gentleman from New York had not the floor to submit that point of order; and, if he had not, he had not the floor to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I ask the Chair how an appeal could ever be taken?

[Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. When the question arises. It does not now arise. The gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair knows perfectly well that I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I am in order, but the Chair is decidedly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (rapping with the gavel.) The Chair is the judge of that.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair may pound away till doomsday, but he will hear me.

Mr. LEITER. I insist that the rules of the House be enforced.

Mr. MORGAN. If I did not know that I was in order, I would make an apology and take my seat. No man would do it sooner. But I am only adhering to my rights, and I will have them.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. Is the appeal of the gentleman from New York debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question in a moment.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I wish to suggest, that inasmuch as the gentleman from Indiana has the floor—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor. The gentleman from New York, however, raises a question of order, and the Chair feels it to be his duty to read the rule upon the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. If I am not in order, I will apologize to the House and the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has committed no offense against the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORGAN. I did not suppose it would be possible to offend the Chair, from what I have seen of him.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is as follows: "125. Whenever the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the Chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal."

Mr. MORGAN. I now ask that it be ascertained if there is a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count the committee.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. Before a count is made, I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, who has taken this appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order at this time.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I was about to suggest to the gentleman from New York—

Mr. MORGAN. With all due deference to the gentleman, I wish that it shall first be ascertained if there is a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the appeal of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GROW. Did the Chair ascertain whether there is a quorum present?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. GROW. Then the roll must be called.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. Not in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. The rule is imperative, that when the committee finds itself without a quorum the roll shall be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact that there is no quorum here has been ascertained by the Chair, but not by the committee.

Mr. POTTER. How can you find out whether there is a quorum here unless the roll is called?

Mr. GROW. I understand the Chair to decide that there is not a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet decided.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for a division on the appeal. That will show whether there is a quorum here or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASE] could proceed, a quorum not being present, but the Chair having no means of ascertaining that fact. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] appeals from the decision of the Chair; and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. MORGAN. On that question I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORGAN, and KUNKEL, of Maryland, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 20; no quorum voting.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Bock, Branch, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Houston, Hughes, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, MacLay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matton, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tripp, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollieoffer.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLORENCE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 6, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called and the absentees noted, and had instructed him to report the names of the absentees to the House—there being only sixty-nine members present.

On motion of Mr. LETCHER (at fifteen minutes to six o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. F. W. GREEN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of residents of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, for an appropriation for lighting Four-and-a-half street, in that city, with gas, from Pennsylvania avenue to the Arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of Alexander C. Good, in behalf of his wife, heir, and co-heirs of John Swan, late of Baltimore, deceased, praying for indemnity for spoliation by the French prior to the year 1800; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of John Shaw, praying for remuneration for losses sustained by him in furnishing six companies of rangers on the Mississippi with provisions, ammunition, &c., during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in behalf of the claims of John Shaw to pay for services as a spy or scout in the war of 1812, and compensation for losses sustained in furnishing supplies for the Missouri and Illinois mounted rangers during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented five petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the proposals of Thomas Rainey for carrying the mails between Philadelphia and Brazil, touching at Savannah and certain places in the West Indies, may be accepted; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of the legal representative of James Purvis be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Mrs. A. P. Derrick, widow of William S. Derrick, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the petition of George J. Knight, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the petition of Theresa Dardenne, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in possession of any of the Executive Departments in relation to alleged discoveries of guano in the year 1855, and the measures taken to ascertain the correctness of the same; and also any report made to the Navy Department in relation to the discovery of guano in Jarvis and Baker's Islands, with the charts, soundings, and sailing directions for those islands.

Mr. FITCH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of all instructions from his Department to the United States marshal for the district of Utah.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate such information as his Department affords in relation to the sale of Fort Crawford military reservation, within the State of Iowa.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 307) providing for deficiencies in the public printing, have instructed me to report it back without amendment. There is a pressing necessity for its immediate passage. It is a bill providing for payment for work actually done, the money for which is due, and the Printers want it very much. I hope it will be taken up and considered now.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 307) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for paper, printing, binding, and engraving ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. Read the bill through.

The Secretary read it. For the purpose of defraying the deficiencies in the appropriations for the paper for the printing, for the printing, and for the binding, engraving, and lithographing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, it appropriates the following sums: To pay for paper, $104,000; to pay for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $57,619 94; to pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $179,569 64.

Mr. HUNTER. These are amounts that were reported, after close scrutiny, by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, on an estimate presented by the Superintendent of Public Printing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EPHRAIM HUNT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is nothing before the Senate of particular importance, I should like to have a little bill taken up. It is a bill (S. No. 107) for the relief of Ephraim Hunt. It has passed the Senate twice, and been unanimously reported a third time.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 107) for the relief of Ephraim Hunt was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the claim of Ephraim Hunt, of the State of Maine, for bounty and pay for service, as a private in the Army of the United States, from the 25th of September, 1813, to the 14th of September, 1815; and to allow and pay him the same bounty and the same pay as he would have been entitled to had he been regularly discharged.

Mr. KING. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. POLK on the 1st of February, from which it appears that the claim is for the pay and bounty alleged to be due to the petitioner for services as a soldier in the war of 1812. In December, 1812, Mr. Hunt enlisted at Topsham, Maine, as a private, in the service of the United States, as a volunteer for one year, and went, with his company, to Plattsburg, New York. He remained in the service until the 25th September, 1813, when he re-enlisted into Captain Buck's company, United States Army. This enlistment, according to his own affidavit, and the affidavits of John Dusten and Daniel Greenlee, who swear that they were present at the time of the enlistment and personally cognizant of the fact, was distinctly stated and understood at the time to be for "during the war," and not for "five years." It was, however, held by the officers to be for five years. He continued in the service until the 14th September, 1815, when, the war being closed, he claimed that his term had expired, and requested his discharge, which he was refused on the ground that the enlistment was for five years.

Believing, as he says, that he had faithfully served out his term of enlistment, he left the Army without his discharge, and without having received either his bounty or any pay for the time he had served. The accounting officers decided, on his application for pay, that he had forfeited all claim on the Government by the act of desertion. He is now in necessitous circumstances, advanced in years, and deprived of the use of his hands by the loss of his fingers; and prays that Congress will cause his pay and bounty, for services rendered in fighting the battles of his country in time of war, to be allowed him. The committee are of opinion, from the evidence presented, that when he enlisted it was his understanding and intention to enlist for the period of the war, although, by some error, he was enrolled for five years. That upon the termination of the war and the restoration of peace to the country, he thought he had faithfully complied with his engagement, and, under that belief, he left the Army. The committee do not intend to sanction or excuse the course he adopted, but think he should have remained in service until he could have obtained his regular discharge; still, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and in view of faithful services rendered during the war and till some time after its close, they are of opinion that the Government ought not to withhold from the old soldier the small pittance to which his previous patriotic services had entitled him.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN B. HAND.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a bill of some half a dozen lines, for the relief of John B. Hand.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of the heirs of John B. Hand was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to them $1,340.

Mr. KING. There is a report, I suppose, in that case. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the petition and papers of John B. Hand, of Mississippi, make the following report:

Mr. Hand became the purchaser of certain Indian reservations under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, and paid to the Indians, according to contract, fifty cents per acre for the land so purchased. Afterwards, the President of the United States (General Jackson) directed the patents to be withheld until said Hand should pay an additional sum of seventy-five cents per acre. This Hand agreed to do. In December, 1838, A. A. Kincannon, Esq., was appointed an agent by the President to investigate, adjust, and settle the matter in dispute, growing out of the purchase of these reservations. To this agent, Hand paid the additional seventy-five cents per acre, and Kincannon reported the payment to the Department. He failed, however, to account for the money, and subsequently died insolvent. The Department refused to acknowledge the validity of the payment, and required Hand again to pay seventy-five cents per acre for the land, which he did, protesting that it was unjust. The official correspondence exhibits the facts that Kincannon was the agent of the Government; that he received the money, a part on the 6th of February, 1840, and the balance on the 22d of February, 1841, and that no objection was made to its reception until March, 1843. Then, for the first time, the Secretary of War notified the agent that the currency in which the payment was made had depreciated, and that the Government would not receive it. The committee think the last payment was improperly demanded, and report a bill for the relief of the petitioner.

An official letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is appended to this report, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, February 11, 1858.

SIR: In respect to the claim of the heirs of John B. Hand, deceased, to have refunded to them the sum of one thousand three hundred and forty dollars, ($1,340), that being the aggregate amount paid on the 6th of February, 1840, and the 22d of February, 1841, to Colonel Andrew A. Kincannon, commissioner appointed to certify Choctaw contracts for the sale of their reserves under the treaty of 1830, and which money was never paid into this office by Colonel Kincannon, I have the honor, in compliance with your request, to state as follows:

I find, upon examination of the papers in the cases of "Louie," "Kashanohla," and "Nahomastubbee's" reserves, under the nineteenth article, and "Hop-can-che-hubbee," under the supplement to the above-mentioned treaty, that Colonel Kincannon acknowledges, in his report and letters, the receipt of the following sums from John B. Hand, the then claimant by purchase from the original grantees, being the amounts necessary, in addition to the sums satisfactorily shown to have been paid, to make up the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, viz:

1. For Louie's reserve, in addition to the $240 proved to have been paid.....	$160
2. For Kashanohla's reserve, in addition to the $100 proved to have been paid.....	100
3. For Nahomastubbee's reserve, in addition to the $80 proved to have been paid.....	120
4. For Hop-can-che-hubbee's reserve, in addition to the $640 proved to have been paid.....	960
Total.....	$1,340

This money having been paid in a depreciated currency, the Secretary of War decided, in March, 1843, that, as a condition precedent to the approval of the deeds, the purchasers, or their assignees, should pay into this office, in specie or its equivalent, the several sums above named, as required by Colonel Kincannon under the decision of President Jackson that Choctaw Indian reserves should not be sold below the minimum price of $1 25 per acre.

To enable the purchasers to comply with this requirement, Colonel Kincannon was requested to return the money deposited with him to the depositors; and on the 10th of March, 1843, he acknowledged the receipt of the letter communicating the Secretary's decision, promising to attend to the matter without unnecessary delay; but notwithstanding this promise, nothing further was ever heard from him on the subject, and it is now understood that he died several years ago entirely insolvent.

The heirs of John B. Hand, therefore, in compliance with the requirements of the Department, paid the money into this office, through their attorney, John J. McKee, Esq., and the deeds were approved by the President on the 1st of March, 1845, as follows:

The sale of the northeast and northwest quarter of section seventeen, three, fifteen east, being the land reserved to Louie, to James B. Trotter.

The sale of Kashanohla's reserve (the southeast quarter of section six, three, fifteen east,) to Joseph B. Earle and Thompson; and

The sale of Nahomastubbee's reserve (the southwest quarter of section eight, three, fifteen east,) to Joseph Kemp—the patents, in each case, to issue in the name or names of the original purchasers, in trust for the legal representatives of John B. Hand, deceased.

The sale of Hop-can-che-hubbee's reserve, which was located on sections seventeen and eighteen, and lots one and two of section twenty, in township three, of range fifteen east, to Joseph B. Earle, was also approved on the same day, with the proviso that the patents should issue to Earle in trust for the use of the legal representatives of John B. Hand and Colonel Alexander Trotter, according to their respective legal rights under conveyances from Earle.

The petition of James M. Hand, and the accompanying papers, are herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. MIX,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. A. G. Brown,
Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HUNTER. I gave notice yesterday that I would submit a motion this morning that, from and after to-day, we should have a recess from four to six o'clock. Since that time I have been assured, by gentlemen on the other side, that, in their opinion, it will be unnecessary, and that we shall be able to get the question next week without it. Certainly, if we can get the question as early as Thursday of next week, without this motion, it will be much better for us all; and I shall be willing to withdraw the motion. If gentlemen on the other side think we can take the vote by that time, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. WADE. I do not know but that the Senator alludes to a conversation he had with me on this subject. I should not wish it to be understood that it was my opinion that we certainly could get through, in the ordinary course of debate, perhaps in all next week. I should not like to say that there was any particular time in which we should get through. All I would be willing to promise is this: that I think there is no disposition upon this side of the House to prolong the time unnecessarily. But this question is deemed of exceeding great importance on this side of the Chamber, and we think we ought to have a right to debate it the usual time in which debates have generally been had here, without being crowded particularly into unreasonable hours. We see no reason for that. No reason has been assigned, on the other side, why there is any very great haste on this subject. We certainly have not been very diligent this session, so far. I believe we have never sat here, during this session, but on one single Friday, but have constantly adjourned from Thursday over to Monday. The exception was on the occasion when the Treasury note bill was under consideration. On every other occasion, I believe, we have supposed that we were not very hard pressed for time to do all the business. Now, sir, what is the exigency that demands any extraordinary exertion on this present occasion? This a great question—

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a question of order. There is no proposition before the Senate. I call for the order of the day.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us have this motion about a recess settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The Chair calls for the special order. There is no proposition before the Senate. The Chair was indulging remarks because no Senator objected to them.

Mr. WADE. I do not wish to prolong any argument. I only wish to set myself right as to the conversation I had with the gentleman from Virginia. I should not like to say on what particular time the question can be had. I can say for myself that I claim the right to speak in behalf of the people of Ohio on this floor upon this question, and I claim, too, that I ought to have the same right to do it at a seasonable hour that other gentlemen have had; and that we ought not to be crowded into an unreasonable hour. If there was any particular exigency that required it, I should yield to any reason that could be urged; but I see none. I propose to spend, however, only a very little time on the question myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls for the special order, which is the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. POLK. Mr. President, a constitution and State government have been formed in the Territory of Kansas; and Kansas having tendered to her constitution, asks admission into the Union. The birth of a new State into the great American family is an event of profound concern, not merely to the patriot statesman, but to every reflecting mind in the nation. But there are good reasons, sir, why I, as one of the Senators from Missouri, should feel a special interest in the admission of Kansas. She, as well as my own State, is a part of that Louisiana ceded by France to the United States. The treaty of cession guarantees to Kansas, as well as to Missouri and the other States to be formed out of that territory, admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Kansas is in the nearest neighborhood of my own Missouri, stretching for the whole length of her eastern boundary coterminously with the western limit of Missouri, and separated from her, by only an imaginary line, from the Missouri river on the north to her uttermost southern extremity. Are there any good reasons why we should not admit her? If so, what are they? Has she not the requisite population? All concede that she has. No one raises an objection on this ground. Do not her people desire to be admitted? There can be as little question on this point. No party, and as far as I know, no person, in Kansas has opposed her admission, for the reason that the people prefer that she should continue to occupy a territorial condition. Even the disorganizers there, the opponents of the party who favor the constitution now before Congress, the opponents of order and of law, and of the Democratic party, had themselves, before the Kansas constitutional convention assembled at Lecomptton, assumed to form a State constitution at Topeka, and had actually presented it to Congress, and asked to be admitted as a State of the Union under it. Of course, the party which has presented the Lecompton constitution as the organic law of the Territory are in favor of the admission of Kansas as a State. Hence all parties and all individuals are in favor of Kansas coming into the sisterhood of States.

One other question, and only one, remains to be settled. Is the constitution before us republican in its form? I know of no one, unless it may be the Senator from Connecticut, who maintains that this constitution is not republican in form. That I consider a conceded point.

Thus, Mr. President, the whole case is presented in a nut-shell. The Territory of Kansas seeks to be admitted into the Union as one of the equal confederate States. She has the requisite population. Her people desire to be admitted; and her constitution meets the only demand of the Constitution of the United States. It is republican in form; yet her admission is opposed. It is resisted by argument, by denunciation, by strategy, by all the means that can be brought into requisition, "per fas et per nefas." As Senators, realizing the importance of the questions involved, and the momentous consequences that may be at stake, and penetrated with a sense of the responsibilities under which we are acting, let us examine the case fully, fairly, and dispassionately.

The constitution before us is the deliberate, formal, and solemn act of a convention chosen by the people of Kansas Territory, for the express purpose of making it. That convention was the result of a series of acts of the people, done under all the solemnities and all the forms of law; done, not all at once, but at regular and proper intervals; not in hot haste and without time to examine and reflect, but with sufficient time, at each successive stage of the proceedings, to enable the people to ascertain all the facts, and to weigh their consequences and bearings, and then to judge of every step and its tendency, before taking it.

Sir, let us look at these successive steps. The sense of the people is first taken as to the propriety of forming a constitution and State government. This was done by taking a vote of the people, at the polls, by a regular election, with all the forms and sanctions and officers proper to elicit a true expression of the popular will. This election was held in pursuance of a statute law, passed by the Territorial Legislature, acting under the authority, and according to the forms, of the organic act. This law was passed at the July session of the Territorial Legislature, in the year 1855; and the sense of the people was taken in compliance with it, on the first Monday of October, 1856—a year and a quarter thereafter. There was, therefore, full time given them for reflection, and for the formation of deliberate opinions. Not hasty, not precipitate, but calm, and fair, and temperate, and even slow. This vote of the people to express their opinions on the propriety of forming a constitution and State government for themselves, was not taken at a special election, at which only a few voters might have turned out to the polls; but it was fixed on purpose, at the same time and place as the general election for members of the Territorial Legislature and the other territorial officers. Thus, it was so ordered and ordained that there might be the fullest possible turn out of the people, and consequently the fairest utterance of the popular voice. That the popular will was fairly expressed by this election, I hold to be beyond doubt. No one can successfully impugn it. In the mean time, in the October preceding this election and next after the passage of the law for it, there was an election holden for a Delegate to Congress, from the Territory, which had the effect to fix the attention of the people upon this constitutional election.

Now, the next step in the progress of events: three months after it transpired, the result of this election for testing the sense of the people upon the question of forming a constitution and State government comes before the Territorial Legislature for their consideration and action. Time enough had intervened for the result to be known in every log-cabin in the Territory, and indeed throughout the whole country. This very Legislature had been chosen by the people, with the clear knowledge, on the part of both constituent and delegate, that the result of the election therefore held to test the sense of the people upon the expediency of a change from a territorial to a State government would come before it. The Legislature enter upon the consideration of the subject. Every member has had long time to inquire into all the circumstances of the election—its legality and significance; and after abundant time for deliberation—for they met on the first Monday of January, and acted on the 20th of February—they bow to the will of the people, and provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. For this purpose they pass a statute law. In the mean time—in 1856—the matter of passing a law for directing the people of Kansas as to forming a constitution and State government had been before Congress, and a bill for the purpose, known as the Toombs bill, had passed the Senate of the United States. This Legislature, in deference, it would seem, to the views of the Senate of the United States, pass an act providing for the election of members of a constitutional convention, which it is conceded on all hands embodies the main provisions of the Toombs bill, especially in the matter of the registration of voters. And it establishes a liberal standard of qualification for voters. It fixes the day of election on the third Monday of June, 1857. Thus there is an interval of four months between the passage of the law and the day of the election—a period long enough for making all the necessary preparations—for complying with all the requirements of the law, for bringing out candidates and canvassing their merits before the people—long enough for full investigation and intelligent voting.

The meeting of the convention is appointed for the 4th of September, 1857. A three months' interval is given between the day of the election and the session of the convention—an interval all-sufficient to enable any person who might desire to do so, to contest the seat of any member who may have received a certificate which he was not entitled to; and giving the members elected ample opportunity for preparing themselves to discharge well the responsible trust committed to them by their sovereign constituents. Contrast this with what transpired in Minnesota. (I do not by this mean to say that I am opposed to the admission of Minnesota into the Union.) There they elected delegates to a convention; and these delegates, when assembled, first determined by vote whether it was the wish of the people to be admitted into the Union. Yes, sir, on this first step of the procedure, the will of the people was determined by these delegates; and then these very delegates immediately proceeded to form a State constitution. What a contrast does this present in favor of Kansas! The great primordial question, whether they wished to come into the Union at all or not, under any constitution, and which must necessarily precede the formation of a constitution, is determined—how? Not by the people themselves, but by these delegates. To the people of Minnesota this question was never submitted for a direct vote. In Kansas it was. If it was necessary in the case of Kansas that the whole constitution should be submitted to the people at the polls, was it not equally necessary, in the case of Minnesota, that the question of whether they would have a State constitution at all, or not, should have been submitted to the people? In Kansas they submitted to the vote of the people the question whether they wished to come into the Union. In Minnesota they did not. In Minnesota they submitted the whole constitution to a vote of the people. In Kansas they submitted only a part—but that was the single and vital question before the people. The convention of Kansas met and framed a constitution. They made provision for submitting to the people, by direct vote, whether they would tolerate slavery by their constitution. That question was so submitted on the 21st of December last, according to the provisions of the constitution itself; and it was decided by an almost unanimous vote, and thus indisputably settled.

Mr. President, when we view these proceedings of the people of Kansas in forming for themselves a State constitution, in the successive stages of their development—not from the low arena of partisan strife and passion, but from the elevated stand-point of the patriot, who reveres the sovereignty of the people and loves representative liberty—liberty reposing on written constitutions and regulated by law, what a majestic spectacle is presented! The people marching forward in stately pace to the accomplishment of their purpose, with a movement as grand as the lapse of the tide or the travel of a planet.

This Kansas constitution, so formed, is now before us, conformably to the Constitution of the United States; and the nascent State prays to be admitted into the Union as one of the equal States of our glorious Confederacy. What its several provisions are, it is not for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to inquire, beyond the single question, is it republican in form? If inquired into, however, it will be found to be quite as unexceptionable as the constitutions of most of the States of the Confederacy. And, sir, if it did not contain an article tolerating slavery, I apprehend it would have passed without challenge from most of the persons throughout the land who are now raising the most vehement clamor against it.

But, objections are urged here against the admission of Kansas under this constitution, because, as it is alleged, there have been irregularities in some of the proceedings which preceded its adoption. And Senators, Mr. President, who have embarked with great zeal in this enterprise of opposition, and of consequent agitation in Kansas, and throughout the country, have fallen, in my judgment, into flagrant errors of fact and of theory, and, of course, have been led to conclusions most fallacious.

The Senator from Maine seems to have spoken against the admission of Kansas, under the mistaken impression that the delegates to the Lecompton convention were elected under the operation of a test oath; that persons were precluded from voting for them, unless they would do violence to their consciences by swearing to support the fugitive slave law. Sir, I don't understand how a man's conscience can be violated by assuming upon it the obligation to do only what the Constitution of his country imposes upon every one of its citizens as a sacred duty. That Constitution expressly declares that "persons held to service in one State, escaping into another, shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service may be due."

But, sir, the Senator is grievously mistaken. The law providing for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, ordained in its eleventh section that—

"Every bona fide inhabitant of the Territory of Kansas, on the third Monday of June, 1857, being a citizen of the United States, over the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have resided three months next before said election in the county in which he offers to vote, and no other person whatever shall be entitled to vote at said election."

These, sir, are all the qualifications the voters for delegates to the convention are required to possess. The act of the 20th February, 1857, fixing the qualifications for voters in all other elections, expressly excludes from its operation the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, though its standard of qualifications is exactly the same as that just given, except, only, that a residence of six months is required instead of three; and this law repeals all the laws referred to by the Senator from Maine as requiring "test oaths," as he termed them. And so it was expressly held by Governor Walker in his opinion published by him officially to the people of the Territory with reference to this very election.

Another Senator has told us that the sheriffs and probate judges, whose duty it was to make the enumeration of the voters for the purposes of the election of the members of the convention, were selected by the first Legislature. He then assumed, against the facts and the truth—as I will show—that that first Legislature was illegally elected; and concluded that the convention was, therefore, a fraudulent one. Sir, any such a conclusion is unwarrantable, even if it had been true that this first Legislature elected the sheriffs and probate judges. For, I hold, first, that it is the very essence of all uncharitableness to pronounce men dishonest and fraudulent knaves, (as this charge does, the sheriffs and probate judges,) against whom not a particle of proof is produced to condemn them. Again, it is the verdict of common fairness, I do not say charity, that every officer intrusted with the discharge of a legal duty, and sworn to its performance, has discharged that duty fairly and impartially. Sir, even the stern law, which knows neither mercy nor compassion, presume that every officer has faithfully discharged his legal duty. Would the Senator have had the first Legislature create these offices and leave them without incumbents until a popular election could be held? On the contrary, it was clearly their duty to have filled them, as they did. But, sir, before the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, and at the very next Legislature after the first, and at the very earliest moment at which it could be done, these offices were made elective by the people.

Mr. President, almost every gentleman who has either spoken or written in opposition to the admission of Kansas on the Lecompton constitution, both in and out of the Senate, and including both the actual Governor Walker and the acting Governor Stanton, seems to have labored to produce the false impression that about half of the legal voters in Kansas were disfranchised, and not allowed to vote for delegates to the convention for want of a registration of their names. When this had been substantially affirmed, on a former occasion, in the course of the debate on Kansas affairs, and when a semblance of verity had been assumed for it, by quoting the declaration of Governor Walker, and asserting that it had not been denied, I then took occasion to dissipate the untruthful inference by proving that the statement had been denied by gentlemen of respectability, both in the Territory and out of it; and among them, two of the members of the Lecompton convention itself, and also the Democratic candidate for Governor at the late election for State officers. And when that statement of facts presented by me had swept from under him the foundation upon which he had built up a charge of fraud in the election of members to the constitutional convention, the Senator from Michigan said that "there was but one reason for requiring a registration of voters in the election of the members of that convention," and that was, that under a show of fairness they might defraud the people, and the result had justified the prediction." And yet he admitted that the Kansas Legislature had taken the provisions of the Toombs' bill, and conceded that the provisions of that bill were wise and good. To show I do not misrepresent him, I read the paragraph of his speech on this point:

"It was perfectly clear to me that that Legislature had taken the provisions of the Toombs' bill, which was to be executed by men appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, whose character should be such as to secure an honest exercise of its provisions, and the provisions of that bill were designed for the purpose of excluding all who were not actual inhabitants and residents of the Territory."

Indeed, so highly did the Senator think of the excellence of that bill that he voted for it here in his place. I wonder if he then thought that the provisions of that bill might be used "to defraud the people." I wonder if the same provisions that were wise and good in the Toombs' bill can be any less so in the act of the Kansas Legislature. I read another extract:

"But, sir, there is an additional fact stated in that newspaper extract which goes to show either that those gentlemen did not understand the subject, or did not intend fairly to present it. It is this: that if anybody was aggrieved in that Territory they could apply to the Governor for redress, in regard to the registration of votes. There is not a single word in the law that authorized the Governor to act at all, and he had no more power to act in that case than I had."

This is strong language—strong assertion—Mr. President.

Let me now call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of that law. Its second section is as follows:

"In case of any vacancy in the office of sheriff, the duties imposed on such sheriff by this act shall devolve upon, and be performed by, the judge of the probate court of the county in which such vacancy may exist, who may appoint deputies, not to exceed one in each municipal township; and in case the office of both sheriff and probate judge in any county shall be or become vacant, the Governor shall appoint some competent resident of such county to perform such duty, who shall have the same right to appoint deputies, take and subscribe the same oath, and perform all the requirements of this act, as applied to sheriffs."

Sir, I forbear any remark, further than to inquire which is nearer the truth, nearer the very letter of the section just read, that "newspaper extract," as the Senator termed it, or the Senator's asseveration?

Let me here say, Mr. President, that since I read the statement in question, in regard to the fifteen counties in Kansas Territory attached to other counties for civil, and, of course, for election purposes, I have been able to get access to the laws of Kansas. And I find that that statement—that "newspaper extract"—is in the very words of the thirty-fourth section of the act of 20th February, 1857, which is as follows:

"The counties of Weller and Richardson are hereby attached to the county of Shawnee.

"The counties of Madison, Butler, and Wise, are hereby attached to the county of Breckinridge.

"The county of Coffey is hereby attached to the county of Anderson.

"The county of McGee is hereby attached to the county of Bourbon.

"The counties of Greenwood, Hunter, Dorr, Wilson, Woodson, and Godfrey, are hereby attached to the county of Allen.

"The county of Brown is hereby attached to the county of Doniphan.

"The county of Davis is hereby attached to the county of Riley."—Acts of Kansas Territory, 1855, p. 163, sec. 34.

But, sir, if we look at one of the exhibits accompanying the report of the Committee on Territories, we find that the Territory of Kansas was divided, for the purpose of this election, into eighteen districts. What else do we find? Why, that of these eighteen districts, there were only four in which there were no returns of the enumeration of voters. There were returns from every other district. We further find, that there were twenty-one counties represented; so that it took the whole number of the counties unrepresented to constitute four out of the eighteen election districts. Of course the population of these counties must have been exceedingly sparse. The fact is, that three of them, as has been already said—Clay, Dickinson, and Washington—are without inhabitants down to this present speaking. The four most populous of these counties were Anderson, Allen, Franklin, and Breckinridge. In the three first named, the rebellious Abolitionists prevented the census being taken by force and threats; and in Breckinridge, the judge of probate, being an Abolitionist, refused to execute the law. Anderson and Franklin severally constituted each one election district. This disposes of two out of four of the districts unrepresented; and as to the two others, it is sufficient to say that, to the county of Breckinridge, where an Abolitionist probate judge refused to act, were attached, for election purposes, the counties of Madison, Butler, and Wise; and to the county of Allen, in which Passmore Williams, the judge of probate, was not allowed to take the census, but driven out by the Abolitionists, were attached the counties of Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, Woodson, and Godfrey. What, then, becomes of the assumption that half of the voters of the Territory were disfranchised, and that by no act or default of their own?

It has been moreover said that this first election of a Legislature in Kansas was carried by illegal means—by frauds and violence—and that consequently that body was an illegal body. He who makes such an assertion ought to stand ready and able to prove it. The proof has not yet been produced. Can it be produced? I maintain that it cannot be. By the organic act, the Governor was empowered to declare who was elected, and to give certificates of election. Accordingly, he gave certificates to seventeen out of twenty-six members of the House, and refused them to nine. Of the members to the Council, he declared nine elected, and refused certificates to four. A new election was ordered by the Governor to fill these vacancies; and two of the members of the House and two of the Council, whose election had been set aside by the Governor, were reelected by the people, and he gave them their certificates. There were seven contested cases in the House, and two in the Council. All of the members, both of the Council and the House, attended at the time and place of the meeting of the Legislature. The two Houses passed on the questions of the contested seats in them respectively. They were the sole judges of the election and qualifications of the members of their respective bodies; and from their decision there was no appeal. This is as old as parliamentary law, and is one of its elementary principles. That decision, therefore, was final and conclusive; and accordingly it was submitted to and acquiesced in, both by the Governor and the contestants. The question, therefore, is forever closed, and it is too late to attempt to except to what has been done. But, sir, who ever heard of one legislative body claiming the power of passing on the election and qualifications of the members of another one? To my mind, the assumption of such a power is a monstrous proposition. What right has Congress to pass upon the election or qualification of the members of the Legislature of Kansas? None in principle, none in parliamentary law, none in the act organizing the Territorial Legislature.

Mr. President, I have looked into the voluminous House document that has been referred to in this debate, containing the evidence taken by the committee raised to investigate Kansas affairs. The census was completed in February, a month before the election. There were 2,905 legal voters registered. From the southern States there were 1,670, and from the northern 1,018, and from other countries 217; there was a majority, therefore, from the southern States, over and above those from the northern States, of 652, and over and above all other voters, of 435. The men from the southern States had the numbers, therefore, of registered voters in the Territory to carry this first election over all opposition and combinations.

Again, there were fourteen representative districts. In eleven of these, there were majorities of registered voters from the South, and majorities from the North in only three. And the majorities of the voters from the South in these eleven districts would give twenty-one members, while the majorities from the North in the remaining three would only give five members.

There were ten Council districts. Of these, there were majorities from the southern States in eight, while there were majorities from the northern in only two. And the majorities from the South in these eight Council districts would give ten out of the thirteen members of the Council, leaving only three for the North. I cannot take time, Mr. President, to make this demonstration more full. For a complete analysis of all the facts of this first territorial election, I refer to the masterly expose of the whole subject by the Hon. A. H. STEPHENS, made in the other end of the Capitol, on the 31st of July, 1856.

In such a condition of things, why talk of Missourians going over to Kansas in order to vote and carry this election? Sir, there was no necessity for any such thing. It would have been a work of absolute supererogation. There were pro-slavery men enough there already to carry the election overwhelmingly.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] admitted that the Missourians did not resort to fraud to carry the election. But he said that they marched over as an invading army and took possession of the polls, and so usurped the government of the Territory. And this has been repeated so often, and in so many forms of expression, that it would seem that Senators think to practice upon the credulity of the country, and to compel credence by pertinacious reiteration—vainly dreaming that falsities may be made to pass for truths by plausible and unceasing repetitions of them.

A sufficient and conclusive answer to all such charges, for all time to come, is the simple statement of the fact that there was no necessity for any such action; for the pro-slavery party, as it has been called, had already a controlling majority of the voters of the Territory.

But, sir, I make bold to assert that there can be no proof adduced to make good the charges. In the mass of evidence taken by the House committee, in 1856, there is not a single witness who swears that a single voter, in any single precinct, in any single representative or council district, was prevented from voting by any single Missourian, or any number of them. They were there with arms, it was said; but they made no aggression or attack upon anybody. It was strikingly a peaceful election—not interrupted by fights or violence. In that respect it contrasted well with similar occasions in some of the oldest of the States in the Union. The electors may have been at the polls, in some instances, in their wagons and with their rifles, their inseparable companions. To the mercenaries sent out by emigrant aid corporations, from the cellars and alms-houses and tombs of the great New England cities, this may have seemed strange and even alarming; but to those accustomed to frontier life, in a new country, it is known to be common and habitual.

I propose, Mr. President, to examine for a moment, the circumstances attending the election of the first Legislature in Kansas. Previous to the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, on the 30th of May, 1854, the settlements of Missouri had pressed up against the boundary of the unopened Territory, until an almost unbroken length of fences and farms marked the line for long miles of its course. The neighboring population were ready to pour in and occupy the land so soon as the Territory should be opened to settlement. And immediately upon the passage of the act, they did immigrate into the Territory. They "staked out their claims" and commenced their improvements. They built houses, made inclosures, and began to plow and to plant. During the fragment of this first season, many of them had not been able to make crops, nor surround themselves with warm houses, necessary to enable them to endure the rigors of an inclement winter on the inhospitable prairies of Kansas. They sought a temporary winter shelter in Missouri. They had, however, in most cases domiciliated themselves in Kansas, and when they left it, they left it "animo reverendi." So soon as the water should flow and the grass should grow in the spring, they intended to return to complete their houses and farms and to abide in their permanent homes. Sir, Mr. Webster, speaking eloquently in the language of filial veneration for his own revered sire, said of him, that in order to raise his children to a condition better than his own, he had moved up into the border settlements of New Hampshire so far that there was not a human habitation between the smoke that curled from his humble home over the frozen hills of the North, and the far off settlements of Canada. These fathers of families had gone into Kansas urged by the self same desire to improve the condition of their offspring, to raise their children to a condition better than their own. They went under the promptings of the better instincts of our nature, and in the same manner as these promptings have carried immigration into the other Territories that have grown into States.

Now, in contrast with such settlers, look at the emissaries sent into the Territory for political purposes by the Abolition fanatics. So soon as the first steamers began to navigate the Missouri river in the early spring, the dwellers on its shores were surprised to find their decks and cabins crowded by the New England immigrants making their way into Kansas with nothing but black carpet sacks in their hands, containing all their worldly goods. It was too early to go into the Territory in the way of ordinary settlement, and it was matter of wonder to see these immigrants pushed into this new and unsettled region in such crowds, and in such premature haste, before there were provisions there to feed them, and when all their supplies must be furnished from abroad. But, on inquiry, it was ascertained that Governor Reeder had issued his proclamation for the election of the members of the Territorial Legislature for the unusually early date of the 30th of March. This proclamation had been published in the East and northeast long before anything was known of it in Missouri or Kansas. The men who had been shipped into Kansas by associations organized and endowed for the express purpose, were among the first to bear the intelligence to the citizens of the borders of Kansas and Missouri. Sir, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] well said of these men, "they went there to vote, and they staid there to vote;" and he might also well have added that they staid there, many of them, no longer than to vote, and then came away forever.

To the citizens of Kansas who had settled there from Missouri this looked like a deliberate purpose to disfranchise them. They determined to defeat the consummation of the foul plan. Accordingly those of them who had temporarily left their homes, at once returned, in order to secure themselves against this outrage upon their rights. The party with which they acted had a majority of the qualified voters, and triumphed at the election. The men who had been hurried into the Territory by aid societies, who could not be trusted to manage their own removal, but who had to be sent under the conduct of overseers specially appointed for the purpose, and who had boasted, as they passed through Missouri, that they were flocking into Kansas in order first to abolishize that, and then to overrun Missouri, were disappointed in their unpatriotic designs. And then the plotters, foiled in their efforts, set up a shriek for bleeding Kansas, which has been retched by anti-slavery fanatics until the clamor has reached the remotest hamlet of the land.

After awhile these operators changed their tactics, and instead of sending their instruments into the Territory with black carpet sacks, they sent them with Sharpe's rifles and Colt's revolvers, and bowie-knives, and artillery. The armed invader was substituted for the unarmed hireling; and these were sent into the Territory in bands and companies, armed and equipped for the most desperate enterprises. One such company, two hundred and forty strong, came down into the Territory through its northern border, organized with military officers and discipline, and with all the equipments of a military camp.

But, in spite of all this original wrong, and of the lawlessness and rebellion which followed it, fortunately for the welfare of Kansas, the law and order party there, by their forbearance, their fortitude, their numbers, and their character, were able until the close of the labors of the Lecompton convention, to maintain and preserve the supremacy of the legal government in that Territory. The dominion of law and of legitimate authority there has produced and presented to Congress a constitution for Kansas.

Now, Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Vermont to concede, that if there was authority for the action of the Lecompton convention, then the constitution framed by it is binding, and that the vote cast on the 21st of December last was decisive and conclusive.

I do not stop to controvert or to discuss his distinction between "legal" and "authoritative." I think it is manifest, from what I have already said, that that constitution was authoritative. But how does the Senator undertake to prove that it is not authoritative? By maintaining, first, that the unlimited sovereignty of the Territory is in Congress; and, therefore, secondly, that the Territorial Legislature could take no step towards forming a constitution and State government without an enabling act; and then, that Congress had passed no enabling act.

Sir, it will not be questioned that the sovereign power of the Territory could form a constitution for its people. The sovereign power is the highest power; and if there is any power higher than the power to form a constitution and State government, I would like to be told what it is. I know of no better definition of sovereignty than that it is the power of forming a constitution and government for a people. If, therefore, Congress has the actual and present sovereignty over the Territory, it follows that Congress could form a constitution and State government for Kansas. That is a position it is useless to controvert. I do not understand anybody to assert it. It is against the very letter of the Federal Constitution. Even the power in Congress to establish a temporary territorial government is only inferential and by implication, not expressly granted. Anything beyond this, is utterly without warrant in the Constitution. The postulate, then, on which the Senator builds up his argument fails, and of course his whole effort to prove the Lecompton convention, and the constitution ordained by it, not to be authoritative, must, of necessity, fail also. That authority remains still untouched.

Sir, the State government which is to supersede a territorial organization, can be formed only—first, by the Congress of the United States; or, secondly, by the people of the Territory themselves. I have already shown that Congress cannot form a constitution and State government for a Territory. It follows, therefore, that the people of a Territory, and they only, can perform that high function. And, Mr. President, as citizens of a Government which recognizes the people as the only legitimate source of power—and especially as Democrats—we should never lose sight of the great cardinal truth, that it is the high prerogative of the people of a Territory, and of the people only, to form a constitution and State government. On this point, with all due deference to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] it is perfectly idle, it seems to me, to talk about the sovereignty of the Territories being "in abeyance, suspended in the United States in trust for the people when they become a State." For whenever a State government is formed—be that when it may—it must be made by the people of the Territory. Sovereignty is not vested in them after they have become a State, but before. For they exert the highest attribute of sovereignty in the very fact of forming a State government. And though we should concede that before then their sovereignty may have been, as it were, in adolescence; still, before that act is achieved, it has attained the maturity and perfection of its growth. It has been upon the recognition of this fundamental truth of our American political science, that a majority of the new States have been received into the Confederacy. The instances in which enabling acts have been resorted to, are the exceptions which establish the rule.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that even those whose opinions differ from my own on this point, must be convinced, on examination, that the people of Kansas needed no authorization to form a State government beyond the Kansas-Nebraska act. This is the opinion of the President of the United States, as announced in his instructions to Governor Walker, and in all his messages to Congress touching Kansas. It is the opinion of Governor Walker often repeated. In the same opinion, too, Mr. Secretary Stanton concurs. And the Senator from Illinois, himself, on the 12th of June, 1857, at the capital of his State, spoke as follows:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates, assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise. "If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit, and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secured to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined; and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity with the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls, and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Sir, this quotation from the Senator's Springfield speech is pregnant with meaning at this juncture, and bears on the question of the admission of Kansas in many other points than the one just now indicated. If authority, sir, can have any weight on this point, can any man ask for it any higher, or ask for any more? The very first Legislature that ever assembled in Kansas passed an act to take the sense of the people upon the question of forming a State government, and the topic has been before the country from that time to the present; and yet I have, for the first time, during the present session of Congress heard it affirmed that the Kansas constitutional convention "had no power to do any act, as a convention, forming a constitution; and that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning." By the terms of the act, "the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

Now, I remark, first, that passing a law to initiate proceedings to erect a Territory into a new State, is consistent with the Constitution of the United States, because that Constitution expressly provides for the admission of new States formed out of the Territories of the United States. Secondly, it is consistent with the provisions of the act. I know it has been argued that the Territorial Legislature could do nothing to destroy itself; but the argument does not apply to this case for the act itself expressly declares that the government organized by it is to be a temporary government. If so, then the act itself contemplates that the territorial government is to have an end put to it; in other words, it is to be superseded by a State government. How, then, can it be inconsistent with the provisions of the act that the Legislature should institute proceedings for facilitating the people in the formation of a State constitution?

The Lecompton convention, then, was not only legal, but it was vested with full authority to form a constitution for the people of Kansas. It was authorized by the Territorial Legislature. It was authorized by Congress. And last, and highest, and chief of all, it was authorized by the people of Kansas. It has made a constitution, and that constitution is authoritative.

But, it is objected that the constitution it made was not submitted—the whole of it—by the convention to the vote of the people. I answer, first, that of the eighteen new States that have been received into the Union, the constitutions of thirteen were never submitted to the votes of their people prior to their admission, while the constitutions of only five were submitted; secondly, of the thirteen original States, the constitutions of not more than a single one was ever submitted to a vote of the people before coming into the Union; and thirdly, the Constitution of the United States was never submitted to the votes of the people of a solitary State preparatory to entering into the national Union; that great act was done, in every instance, by a convention chosen for the purpose; and lastly, the very delegates to the Convention itself, which framed the Federal Constitution, were not elected by the votes of the people of the several States, but were chosen, in every instance, by the Legislatures of the States.

But, sir, what has Congress got to do with this question? Have we any right to reject a constitution made in a legal convention, clothed with full power to act in the premises, because we may not happen to like the manner in which it was made? Under the Constitution of the United States, which authorizes us to inquire only whether the constitution offered to us is republican in its form; have we any right to go beyond this, and to inquire what was the method the people saw fit to adopt in making their constitution? Especially, what right have we to set aside the great principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act—non-intervention—and to obtrude ourselves into the affairs of the people of the Territory by objecting to the manner selected by them for framing their fundamental law? This, it seems to me, would be a flagrant violation of the very spirit of the Kansas-Nebraska act. That act declares, in so many words, that "its true intent and meaning is not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Thus, the people were not only to be left free to form domestic institutions, of whatever kind they might please, but they were to be perfectly free to do this in their own way; that is, they shall determine the mode and manner of forming them, whether it shall be done by the people in mass meeting or through their representatives chosen expressly to that end. Now, sir, shall Congress take upon itself to prescribe the way they shall pursue in forming their domestic institutions by their constitution? Shall we arrogate to ourselves the authority to reject the State because its people have seen fit to adopt a way of forming their constitution which we do not approve?

Further, sir, the delegates constituting the Lecompton convention were the representatives and agents of the people of Kansas, not of Congress, nor of the United States. What right, then, has Congress, on the well-known law and relation of principal and agent, of constituent and representative, to inquire whether those delegates did right or wrong in not submitting their work to the vote of the people? "Who are we, that we should judge another man's servant? To his own master he shall stand or fall." But, sir, we know the fact to be that on this point these delegates faithfully discharged the trust committed to their hands. The people of the Territory had not required them to submit the constitution they should make to a popular vote. They were willing to give their delegates a commission in the same terms as had been used by the people of more than half of the Territories that had come into the Union as new States, and of every one of the Old Thirteen, in the formation, both of their own State constitutions, and of the Constitution of the United States. And this course was pursued deliberately and purposely. Governor Geary, it is well known, vetoed the bill providing for the convention for the very reason that it did not require the constitution that might be framed by it to be submitted to a vote of the people. It was yet passed, by a two-thirds vote, over his veto. All this was known, not merely to the party sustaining the Lecompton convention, but also to the disorganizers and rebellious recusants. These factionists were more than notified of it. They were appealed to on this very ground by both Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton to come forward and vote for delegates. They were argued with, and entreated—addressed in public and private—in season and out of season. They were warned of the consequences of standing out, and told that a constitution might be formed for them tolerating slavery which they professed so intensely to hate. And now, if they refused to vote after all this, does it lie in their mouths to complain? And if they do complain, has Congress any right, on account of their complaints, to reject an authoritative constitution legally formed, and that, too, against what has been its course and custom in all similar cases—against the express letter and spirit of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and against the plain provision of the Constitution of the United States on the subject of the admission of new States into the Union? The Kansas convention did not submit the constitution, as a whole, to a vote of the people; but it did submit the article on slavery.

I have not time, Mr. President, to stop to explode the shallow sophism that the convention resorted to a trick in the mode of submission, by which no man could vote either for or against the slavery clause without voting for the constitution. No man, it seems to me, can carefully read the schedule on this point without being convinced that this is a mere pretense, (if I may be allowed to use so harsh an expression in this presence,) and more deserving of the epithet of trick than that part of the schedule to which that epithet has been applied.

The article on slavery, sir, was the only part of the instrument about which there was any serious difference of opinion. Has any man ever heard any objection, even from the rebellious Abolitionists in Kansas, against the articles on banks, or taxation, or the qualifications prescribed for Governor, or against any other part of the instrument, except the article on slavery? Who has ever heard any exception taken against its provisions on these subjects, except from the Senator from Illinois? And he frankly admitted that his difference of opinion from the committee on these subjects, would not be sufficient ground for voting against the admission of Kansas. Where was the necessity, then, of submitting to a vote of the people provisions of the constitution about which there was no difference of opinion, and about which a difference of opinion is conceded to be unimportant?

The article in her constitution which was to fix the condition of Kansas as a slaveholding or non-slaveholding State, was the sole point of contest. This was the question that had agitated that Territory from the period of its first organization. Indeed, it was this that had populated her with emissaries sent out by the Emigrant Aid corporations. And this it was that had drawn to Kansas the attention of every section of the entire country. This question was submitted to a fair vote of the people; and that, too, in the fairest mode in which it could be done; that is, it was submitted alone, as an isolated issue. If it had been incumbered with other questions there would not have been so fair an expression of the popular will upon it. A man might have voted for or against the slavery article, in order to reach some other object. And, sir, this submitting a particular provision of a State constitution, as a single question, to be voted on by the people, is no strange proceeding. It has been done in the case of Oregon, whose constitution is now before this Senate. And it has often been done in other States.

Mr. President, in the estimation of those who profess to consider this action of the Lecompton convention a great outrage upon the rights of the people of Kansas, the people of Indiana must have been most deeply aggrieved by Congress when that State was admitted into the Union; for I am told, by one of her Senators on this floor, that an article establishing slavery in that State was voted out of her constitution by a majority of two votes only; and yet that constitution was never submitted to a vote of the people of that State. Still, she was admitted into the Union as a non-slaveholding State. Sir, when that vote was so very close in the convention, it is altogether possible that the result would have been different if it had been submitted to a direct vote of the people. But Congress did not stop to make this a condition precedent, which must be met before the State should be admitted.

So, too, the same was true in Illinois. There, an article proposing to establish slavery by her constitution was voted down, in her constitutional convention, by but a small majority of votes; and that constitution was never submitted to a vote of the people. Yet the people of Illinois have never found out that their rights were trampled on by Congress when that State was admitted into the Union. The submission of this article of the constitution was in exact compliance with the requirements of the Kansas-Nebraska act. That act repealed the Missouri restriction. That restriction excluded slavery from the Territory of Kansas. The repeal of the restriction left the people of that Territory free, "perfectly free," to introduce slavery into it at their option. What was the grand question that immediately followed? It was, shall slavery be introduced into the Territory of Kansas, or excluded therefrom? This question is left by the convention to the decision of the people, by a direct vote, clean and naked; separated from every other issue.

Again, this act declares that its true intent and meaning is, not to introduce slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom—yes, sir, slavery is the thing that it neither introduces nor excludes—"but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form their domestic institutions in their own way." What domestic institution is meant by this language? Sir, does not the first part of the sentence make it perfectly plain what domestic institution is meant? Before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act were not the people perfectly free to form all their other domestic institutions in their own way, except the institution of slavery only?

But, Mr. President, this issue was not only submitted to the people in the best possible way to procure a true decision upon it, in the grand fact that it was disentangled from every other issue, but in the further fact that it was submitted in such manner, as to time, as was best calculated to reach the unbiased judgment of the people. It was submitted, not at a general election, when offices were to be filled—offices both of emolument and of a political character, calculated to enlist personal feeling and the might of party discipline—but it was submitted with perfect fairness at a special election, held for this purpose only, where no disturbing influence could be brought to bear upon it; and that, too, in spite of the certainty that a comparatively small vote would be the consequence. After proceedings of such a character, shall any man be heard to accuse the Lecompton convention of contriving to secure the adoption of the slavery article into the constitution of Kansas by trickery? Sir, if they intended to impose this constitution upon the people of Kansas by contrivance, they were certainly bunglers in the business. They might have learned a lesson, perhaps, from the Minnesota convention. That convention first fixed the election of the State officers under the proposed constitution, on the very same day the people were to vote upon the constitution. They thereby secured a full vote. They next provide, in the eighteenth section of the schedule, that "no voter should vote for or against the constitution on a separate ballot from that cast by him for officers to be elected at that election under the constitution." Why not? Why should he not be permitted to vote on a separate ballot? Why subject the voter to this compulsion? I would say that, so far from compelling him to vote for or against the constitution only on the same ticket he should cast for State officers, if any compulsory mode was to be prescribed, it ought to have been the reverse. Could the mode adopted have any other effect than to compel votes for the constitution? Similar means were resorted to by the disorganizers in the Kansas Legislature when called together by acting Governor Stanton, no doubt for this very purpose. They fix the time for their illegal and fraudulent voting upon the Kansas constitution on the very same day ordained by the convention for the election of State officers under that constitution, but to be conducted, not by the same officers, but by officers of their own.

But, Mr. President, that Legislature proceeded without the shadow of authority, in attempting to take any action at all on the Lecompton constitution. The whole authority to make a constitution had been delegated, by the people of the Territory, to the convention that made that constitution. That convention had already acted, and was functus officio. The duty and trust committed to it had been already discharged. Its entire work had been executed—nothing remained to be done. Its members had fallen back into the mass of their fellow-citizens. A mere Territorial Legislature, therefore, could not interfere with the completed work of that convention, clothed, as it had been, with the sovereign authority of the people. Moreover, that Legislature was a body with only subordinate powers. It could act only within the limits prescribed to it by the act of Congress organizing the Territory. It could neither make a constitution, nor intervene in the making of one. Why, sir, think of the consequences of a contrary doctrine. If the Legislature which undertook to submit the Kansas constitution to a vote of the people was competent to do it, so could any subsequent Legislature do the same thing. And if it could be done within six weeks, it could equally be done within six years. What could be more anarchical or destructive? The calamities that must flow from such a theory put into practice are sufficient to demonstrate its fallacy.

I beg, Mr. President, to call attention for a moment to this 4th of January vote on the Lecompton constitution. The facts and figures, I think, demonstrate that the vote pretended to have been cast is fraudulent.

The vote cast for the slavery clause, at the special election on the 21st of December last, when there was not a full turn-out of the people, was 6,226. The vote, according to the certificate of C. W. Babcock and G. W. Dietzler, on the 4th of January was 10,226, making an aggregate of 16,452. But the average vote for the disorganizers' ticket, on the 4th of January, according to Babcock and Dietzler's pronunciamiento, omitting "returns received since," was 6,304, and that for the Democratic ticket was 6,519, making an aggregate of 12,823. So that the aggregate of the vote cast on the constitution, according to these figures, is 3,629 more than the whole vote of both parties cast at the election for State officers, when there was a full turn-out of the people.

Again, no fair-minded man will think I go too far, in assuming that all the electors who voted the constitutional ticket as against the ticket of the disorganizers, at the election for officers and members of the Legislature, on the 4th of January, under the Lecompton convention, were in favor of that constitution. Now, in the light of this position, how does the matter stand? The average vote cast for the pro-slavery ticket was 6,519. The vote for the constitution with slavery, on the 21st of December, was 6,226, or 293 votes less than the vote of the constitutional party on the 4th of January—a difference which is more than accounted for when we recollect that the voting on the 21st of December was at an election where no officers were to be chosen—where there had been no previous canvassing before the people.

How, Mr. President, does this refute the charge of fraud in the vote on the 21st of December? For the constitutional vote on the 4th of January was larger than the vote of the same party in December by near three hundred. So, too, it is justifiable to assume that those who were opposed to the constitution would vote for the disorganizers' ticket on the 4th of January; yet the vote purporting to have been cast against the constitution is 10,226; while the average vote for the disorganizers' ticket is only 6,304, or 3,922 less than the vote against the constitution. This election on the 4th of January, Mr. President, presents this still further singular spectacle: grown-up men, not under twenty-one years of age, citizens of the United States, saying they were opposed to the constitution, and yet at the same time voting for the State officers and legislators provided for by that very constitution; estopping themselves, in the most solemn manner, by the exercise of the highest franchise possessed by freemen; contradicting their words by their acts.

"Verba non audiam quum facta videam."

Mr. President, this pronunciamiento of Babcock and Dietzler about the votes for State officers under the Lecompton constitution, and which is quoted from by the Senator from Illinois, in his report of one, is certainly a most extraordinary paper. It bears date the 14th of January, 1858. They say, after giving a tabular statement of the votes, "returns received since." Since when, I ask? The only date that the paper gives is the 14th January, 1858. Therefore the word "since" must refer to that date. But that is impossible, because that is the very date of making the proclamation. It is contradictory, and necessarily false—absurdly so.

But there is this further extraordinary feature about these "returns received since;" and that is, that, according to them, each one of the candidates of the disorganizers gets exactly the same number of these votes, to wit, 637. But it does not stop here. Each one of the constitutional candidates, too, gets exactly the same number of them, to wit, 6.

How happens it, too, that of the "returns received since," the disorganizers get 637, while the constitutional candidates get only 6?

Why, sir, it appears from their own figures that, unless they can count "returns received since," their ticket is defeated; but 637 for the disorganizers, against 6 for the constitutional party, would prevent defeat. I read from that pronunciamiento as follows:

On the State ticket, the vote as returned stands as follows:

FREE STATE.
Smith, Gov.	Roberts, Lt. Gov.	Schwiler, Sec. State.	Mead, Treas.	Goodin, Auditor.	Parrot, Cong.
6,236	6,310	6,230	6,248	6,176	6,623

Mr. President, after a patient investigation of the case, I can see no serious obstacle to the admission of Kansas into our Federal Union, upon the constitution now before us. On the contrary, I see controlling reasons demanding this consummation for that people, reasons of expediency and right, reasons of legality and constitutional obligation. The welfare of the inhabitants of the Territory, and the exigencies of the whole nation, conspire to demand it, and the past action of the Government in like cases justifies it. For myself, sir, I cannot hesitate as to the vote I ought to give. With the convictions I entertain, I can meet my own responsibilities according to my own estimate of them, but by one course. But it is suggested that civil war may be the result of doing justice to Kansas. No man, sir, can contemplate that most direful of all calamities with more horror than I do. Hide, oh hide me from the day when American soil shall be reddened by fraternal blood, shed by fratricidal hands! That may be the day when the dying agonies of my country will begin. But, Mr. President, I cannot be deterred from duty by any such vain surmises of evil. I am convinced that the temperate, industrious, and order-loving citizens of Kansas want quiet and repose. The heads of families desire peaceful homes for themselves and their households. The people are not all, nor are the most of them, restless factionists and agitators, but solid men of worth and substance. And if the accounts we get from there are at all reliable, such men are longing for a cessation of the turmoil which political agitators from abroad have imposed upon them so long. Let the people of Kansas once assume the responsibilities of a State government, let them realize that they must bear its burdens and expenses, and soon their contentions will be composed. The heavy load of quelling turbulence, and of maintaining the officers and the supremacy of the law in that Territory, has heretofore been carried by the Government of the United States. Let it fall upon the shoulders of the people there, and it will reduce insubordination with marvelous rapidity.

Sir, the whole country is sighing for peace. It wants this slavery agitation banished from the halls of legislation, both State and national, and localized in Kansas, where it can be dealt with by those who alone are interested in the question. The admission of Kansas, therefore, so far from exciting rebellion in that Territory, I verily believe will prove a measure of pacification—pacification there and throughout the country.

I cannot sit down, Mr. President, without a word of comment upon another topic. A portion of the constituency which I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor, have been stigmatized, in connection with Kansas, with infamous names, and charged with vile outrages, without proof. Sir, I am one of those who think that vilifying epithets are seldom justifiable, under any circumstances, even against individuals—never against whole communities; that they are justly and always more disgraceful to the utterer of them, than to the subject. Moreover, that he who puts himself forward to make base charges, and does not fortify them with proof, by the fair-minded and the just will be classed in the same category with those who are denounced by Heaven's law as ready to "bear false witness against their neighbor." My constituents border ruffians! Sir, I undertake to say, that among the population inhabiting the counties of Missouri bordering on Kansas, are men who, in point of natural endowments, in point of breeding, education, and intelligence, will not suffer by comparison with the population of the same number of counties in any part of our wide-spread country.

The frontiersmen may also be found in these counties. Sturdy, and even sometimes rough of exterior—not sullen, and slippery, and supple, and yielding—the fit instruments of deception and treachery—but true, brave, generous, intrepid, hospitable. They are the stern and manly virtues which constitute the strongest intrenchments for the preservation of liberty, and the safest barriers against degeneracy and decline.

As a western man I may claim to know in some degree—inadequately, I admit—how much our country and the cause of humanity owe to these frontiersmen. They have been the first to follow "the star of empire" in its westward way. The wilderness has disappeared before them. The seeds of liberty and learning have been scattered by them broad-cast as they have advanced in their onward career, and, falling into the rich and virgin soil, they have sprung up and produced abundant fruit for the people who shall succeed them in all generations. In their march have risen cities and villages, and agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. Pioneers they truly are—pioneers of progress and population and prosperity; pioneers of liberty and law; pioneers of science and civilization. Our country and the race are their debtors. Courageous, and uncaring of personal consequences, the impetuosity of passion in moments of excitement may urge them sometimes to violence; but they are never false, never fraudulent—never.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, after the very able and eloquent discourse of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] if I had regard simply to my own reputation in giving utterance to the thoughts which I have conceived upon the subject now before us, I should better consult its interests by seeking another occasion for addressing the Senate; but I am admonished by the increasing impatience of the Senate, by the desire, not only in this Chamber, but in the public at large to arrive at an early vote on this subject, that all personal considerations must be made to give way, and that each of us must do his duty as promptly as he can.

Mr. President, the issue to which the American people have been looking forward for some years past, with almost instinctive apprehension, is now before us. The urgent, the imperative necessity for its decision is upon us. Again is a slaveholding State demanding admission into the Union, and again is that admission opposed by a large majority of the Senators and Representatives of the non-slaveholding States of the Confederacy. I am aware that every effort is being made to conceal the true motive for this hostility. Pretexts about the irregularity of the territorial government, charges of fraud and deception, vehement asseverations of a disregard of the popular will in the formation of the State constitution—every pretext, every cause, every motive, that the ingenuity of their ablest and most practiced debaters can suggest, have been brought forward as the grounds of this hostility. But, sir, as the discussion has progressed, as the excitement of debate has overcome the cold teachings of prudence, various Senators have made admissions; the truth, which has been concealed behind a cloud, has become apparent to us all, and it is now boldly avowed that Kansas shall never be admitted as a slaveholding State into the Confederacy, not even, to use the words of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] if the whole people of the Territory should establish a constitution recognizing that institution.

Opinions thus maturely formed, thus openly avowed, are not to be affected by any argument that I can hope to offer. But, sir, as long as the Constitution of my country endures, as long as I have a constitutional duty to perform upon this floor, I feel myself under the most sacred of all obligations to protest against the doctrines thus asserted, and to expose, as far as I can, the fallacies by which those doctrines are upheld.

I have still, sir, another duty to perform. As a member of that committee which is charged in the Senate with the examination of all subjects touching the judiciary of the country, it is my duty to make answer to those charges which are brought against the highest judges of the land with a violence, a recklessness, and, I regret to be compelled to add, with a disregard of truth and decency which will yet bring down upon their authors the indignant condemnation of their outraged countrymen.

Mr. President, the whole subject of slavery, so far as it is involved in the issue now before the country, is narrowed down at last to a controversy on the solitary point, whether it be competent for the Congress of the United States, directly or indirectly, to exclude slavery from the Territories of the Union. The Supreme Court of the United States have given a negative answer to this proposition, and it shall be my first effort to support that negation by argument, independently of the authority of the decision.

It seems to me that the radical, fundamental error which underlies the argument in affirmation of this power, is the assumption that slavery is the creature of the statute law of the several States where it is established; that it has no existence outside of the limits of those States; that slaves are not property beyond those limits; and that property in slaves is neither recognized nor protected by the Constitution of the United States, nor by international law. I controvert all these propositions, and shall proceed at once to my argument.

Mr. President, the thirteen colonies, which on the 4th of July, 1776, asserted their independence, were British colonies, governed by British laws. Our ancestors in their emigration to this country brought with them the common law of England as their birthright. They adopted its principles for their government so far as it was not incompatible with the peculiarities of their situation in a rude and unsettled country. Great Britain then having the sovereignty over the colonies, possessed undoubted power to regulate their institutions, to control their commerce, and to give laws to their intercourse, both with the mother country and the other nations of the earth. If I can show, as I hope to be able to establish to the satisfaction of the Senate, that the nation thus exercising sovereign power over these thirteen colonies did establish slavery in them, did maintain and protect the institution, did originate and carry on the slave trade, did support and foster that trade, that it forbade the colonies permission either to emancipate or export their slaves, that it prohibited them from inaugurating any legislation in diminution or discouragement of the institution—nay, sir, more, if at the date of our Revolution I can show that African slavery existed in England as it did on this continent, if I can show that slaves were sold upon the slave mart, in the Exchange and other public places of resort in the city of London as they were on this continent, then I shall not hazard too much in the assertion that slavery was the common law of the thirteen States of the Confederacy at the time they burst the bonds that united them to the mother country.

The first permanent colonial settlement made on this continent by the English was made under a charter granted in 1606, in the fourth year of James I., to Sir Thomas Gates and his associates. I leave out of view, as a matter of course, the few abortive attempts that were made toward the close of the sixteenth century by Sir Gilbert Humphreys in the north, and by Sir Walter Raleigh in the State which is represented by my friend from Virginia. Those attempts were all abortive. It is familiar to us all how disastrously they terminated. I say the first permanent settlement made under the authority of the British Crown on this continent was under the charter of 1606. That charter was subsequently superseded upon quo warranto issued at the instance of the British Crown, and in 1620 another charter took its place, granted to the Duke of Lenox and his associates, who were incorporated under the name of the Plymouth company. To that company the coast was granted from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude. This charter was followed by successive grants to different noblemen and companies, until the entire coast was disposed of. In 1664, to the Duke of York was granted all the territory as far south as Delaware Bay; and in 1663 and 1666, to Lord Clarendon and his associates the entire coast of the continent from the twenty-ninth degree of north latitude to that celebrated line of 36° 30' north, since so famous in the history of our intestine disputes. Thus was conveyed the whole coast comprised within our present limits.

Prior to this very first settlement, the slave trade had been inaugurated and established in Great Britain. The first notice which history gives us of it is the grant of a charter by Queen Elizabeth, to a company formed for the purpose of supplying slaves to the Spanish-American colonies. The Virgin Queen herself was a slaveholder. Subsequently, in 1662, under Charles II., a monopoly was created in favor of a company authorized to export to the colonies three thousand slaves per annum; and so valuable was this privilege considered, so much influence was required for the purpose of obtaining a share in it, that it was placed under the auspices of the Queen Dowager and the Duke of York. The King himself issued his proclamation, inviting his subjects to establish themselves on this side of the Atlantic; and as an encouragement to the migration, tendered a grant of one hundred acres of land for each four slaves that they would employ in the cultivation of it.

The merchants of London found their trade to the slave coast very much cramped by this royal monopoly, granted to royal favorites; and they continued to stun the ear of the Commons with loud complaints that they were excluded from the advantages of so prosperous a traffic; and in 1695 the Commons of England, in Committee of the Whole, resolved "That for the better supply of the plantations, all the subjects of Great Britain should have liberty to trade in Africa for negroes, with such limits as should be prescribed by Parliament."

In the 9th and 10th William III., an act was passed partially relaxing this monopoly, the preamble to which states that—

"The trade was highly beneficial and advantageous to the kingdom, and to the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging."

This partial relaxation was unsatisfactory. Petitions continued to pour in. In 1708 the Commons again resolved—

"That the trade was important, and ought to be free and open to all the Queen's subjects trading from Great Britain."

And in 1711 they again resolved that "this trade ought to be free in a regulated company; the plantations ought to be supplied with negroes at reasonable rates; a considerable stock was necessary for carrying on the trade to the best advantage, and that an export of £100,000 at least, in merchandise, should be annually made from Great Britain to Africa." Finally, in the year 1749, these repeated resolutions of the Commons, and petitions of the merchants of London, accomplished the desired result. They gained their object by the passage of the act of 23d George II., declaring "the slave trade to be very advantageous to Great Britain, and necessary for supplying the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging with a sufficient number of negroes at reasonable rates."

This legislation, Mr. President, as I have said before, emanating from the mother country, fixed the institution upon the colonies. They could not resist it. All their right was limited to petition, to remonstrance, and to attempts at legislation at home to diminish the evil. Every such attempt was sternly repressed by the British Crown. In 1760, South Carolina passed an act prohibiting the further importation of African slaves. The act was rejected by the Crown; the Governor was reprimanded; and a circular was sent to all the Governors of all the colonies, warning them against presuming to countenance such legislation. In 1765, a similar bill was twice read in the Assembly of Jamaica. The news reached Great Britain before its final passage. Instructions were sent out to the royal Governor; he called the House of Assembly before him, communicated his instructions, and forbade any further progress of the bill. In 1774, in spite of this discouraging action of the mother Government, two bills passed the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica; and the Earl of Dartmouth, then Secretary of State, wrote to Sir Basil Keith, the Governor of the colony, that "these measures had created alarm to the merchants of Great Britain engaged in that branch of commerce;" and forbidding him, "on pain of removal from his Government, to assent to such laws."

Finally, in 1775—mark the date—1775—after the revolutionary struggle had commenced, whilst the Continental Congress was in session, after armies had been levied, after Crown Point and Ticonderoga had been taken possession of by the insurgent colonists, and after the first blood shed in the Revolution had reddened the spring sod upon the green at Lexington, this same Earl of Dartmouth, in answer to a remonstrance from the agent of the colonies, replied:

"We cannot allow the colonies to check or discourage in any degree a traffic so beneficial to the nation."

I say, then, that down to the very moment when our independence was won, slavery, by the statute law of England, was the common law of the old thirteen colonies. But, sir, my task does not end here. I desire to show you that by her jurisprudence, that by the decisions of her judges, and the answers of her lawyers to questions from the Crown and from public bodies, this same institution was declared to be recognized by the common law of England; and slaves were declared to be, in their language, merchandise, chattels, just as much private property as any other merchandise or any other chattel.

A short time prior to the year 1713, a contract had been formed between Spain and a certain company, called the Royal Guinea Company, that had been established in France. This contract was technically called in those days an asiento. By the treaty of Utrecht of the 11th of April, 1713, Great Britain, through her diplomatists, obtained a transfer of that contract. She yielded considerations for it. The obtaining of that contract was greeted in England with shouts of joy. It was considered a triumph of diplomacy. It was followed, in the month of May, 1713, by a new contract in form, by which the British Government undertook, for the term of thirty years then next to come, to transport annually 4,800 slaves to the Spanish American colonies, at a fixed price. Almost immediately after this new contract, a question arose in the English Council what was the true legal character of the slaves thus to be exported to the Spanish American colonies; and, according to the forms of the British constitution, the question was submitted by the Crown in council to the twelve judges of England. I have their answer here; it is in these words:

"In pursuance of his Majesty's order in council, heretofore annexed, we do humbly certify our opinion to be that negroes are merchandise."

Signed by Lord Chief Justice Holt, Judge Pollexfen, and eight other judges of England.

Mr. MASON. What is the date of that?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It was immediately after the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. Very soon afterwards the nascent spirit of fanaticism began to obtain a foothold in England; and although large numbers of negro slaves were owned in Great Britain, and, as I said before, were daily sold on the public exchange in London, questions arose as to the right of the owners to retain property in their slaves; and the merchants of London, alarmed, submitted the question to Sir Philip Yorke, who afterwards became Lord Hardwicke, and to Lord Talbot, who were then the solicitor and attorney general of the kingdom. The question was propounded to them, "what are the rights of a British owner of a slave in England?" and this is the answer of those two legal functionaries. They certified that "a slave coming from the West Indies to England, with or without his master, doth not become free; and his master's property in him is not thereby determined nor varied, and the master may legally compel him to return to the plantations."

And, in 1749, the same question again came up before Sir Philip Yorke, then Lord Chancellor of England, under the title of Lord Hardwicke, and, by a decree in chancery in the case before him, he affirmed the doctrine which he had uttered when he was attorney general of Great Britain.

Things thus stood in England until the year 1771, when the spirit of fanaticism, to which I have adverted, acquiring strength, finally operated upon Lord Mansfield, who, by a judgment rendered in the case known as the celebrated Somerset case, subverted the common law of England by judicial legislation, as I shall prove in an instant. I say it not on my own authority. I would not be so presumptuous. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] need not smile at my statement. I will give him higher authority than anything I can dare assert. I say that in 1771 Lord Mansfield subverted the common law of England in the Somerset case, and decided, not that a slave carried to England from the West Indies by his master thereby became free, but that by the law of England, if the slave resisted the master, there was no remedy by which the master could exercise his control; that the colonial legislation which afforded the master means of controlling his property had no authority in England, and that England by her laws had provided no substitute for that authority. That was what Lord Mansfield decided. I say this was judicial legislation. I say it subverted the entire previous jurisprudence of Great Britain. I have just adverted to the authorities for that position. Lord Mansfield felt it. The case was argued before him over and over again, and he begged the parties to compromise. They said they would not. "Why," said he, "I have known six of these cases already, and in five out of the six there was a compromise; you had better compromise this matter;" but the parties said no, they would stand on the law; and then, after holding the case up two terms, Lord Mansfield mustered up courage to say just what I have asserted to be his decision; that there was no law in England affording the master control over his slave; and that therefore the master's putting him on board of a vessel in irons, being unsupported by authority derived from English law, and the colonial law not being in force in England, he would discharge the slave from custody on habeas corpus, and leave the master to his remedy as best he could find one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Decided so unwillingly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman is right—very unwillingly. He was driven to the decision by the paramount power which is now perverting the principles, and obscuring the judgment of the people of the North; and of which I must say there is no more striking example to be found than its effect on the clear and logical intellect of my friend from Maine.

Mr. President, I make these charges in relation to that judgment, because in them I am supported by an intellect greater than Mansfield's; by a judge of resplendent genius and consummate learning; one who, in all questions of international law, on all subjects not dependent upon the peculiar municipal technical common law of England, has won for himself the proudest name in the annals of her jurisprudence—the gentleman knows well that I refer to Lord Stowell. As late as 1827, twenty years after Great Britain had abolished the slave trade, six years before she was brought to the point of confiscating the property of her colonies which she had forced them to buy, a case was brought before that celebrated judge; a case known to all lawyers by the name of the slave Grace. It was pretended in the argument that the slave Grace was free, because she had been carried to England, and it was said, under the authority of Lord Mansfield's decision in the Somerset case, that, having once breathed English air, she was free; that the atmosphere of that favored kingdom was too pure to be breathed by a slave. Lord Stowell, in answering that legal argument, said that after painful and laborious research into historical records, he did not find anything touching the peculiar fitness of the English atmosphere for respiration during the ten centuries that slaves had lived in England.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some passages in that celebrated decision, in answer to another proposition which the Senators who are opposing this bill assume in nearly all their arguments, and that is, that slavery is the creature of positive legislation, and cannot be established by customary law or usage. That point was raised in this case, and Lord Stowell thus disposed of it:

"Having adverted to most of the objections that arise to the revival of slavery in the colonies, I have first to observe that it returns upon the slave by the same title by which it grew up originally. It never was in Antigua the creature of law, but of that custom which operates with the force of law; and when it is cried out that malus usus obolendus est, it is first to be proved that, even in the consideration of England, the use of slavery is considered as a malus usus in the colonies. Is that a malus usus which the court of the King's privy council and the courts of chancery are every day carrying into full effect in all considerations of property, in the one by appeal, and in the other by original causes; and all this enjoined and confirmed by statutes? Still less is it to be considered as a malus usus in the colonies themselves, where it has been incorporated into full life and establishment; where it is the system of the State and of every individual in it; and fifty years have passed without any authorized condemnation of it in England as a malus usus in the colonies."

This, sir, was fifty years after Lord Mansfield's speech in the Somerset case:

"The fact is, that in England, where villenage of both sorts went into total decay, we had communication with no other country; and, therefore, it is triumphantly declared, as I have before observed, 'once a freeman, ever a freeman,' there being no other country with which we had immediate connection, which, at the time of suppressing that system, we had any occasion to trouble ourselves about. But slavery was a very favored introduction into the colonies; it was deemed a great source of the mercantile interest of the country, and was, on that account, largely considered by the mother country as a great source of its wealth and strength. Treaties were made on that account, and the colonies compelled to submit to those treaties by the authority of this country. This system continued entire. Instead of being condemned as malus usus, it was regarded as a most eminent source of its riches and power. It was at a late period of the last century that it was condemned in England as an institution not fit to exist here, for reasons peculiar to our own condition; but it has been continued in our colonies, favored and supported by our own courts, which have liberally imparted to it their protection and encouragement. To such a system, whilst it is supported, I rather feel it to be too strong to apply the maxim, malus usus obolendus est. The time may come when this institution may fall in the colonies, as other institutions have done in other flourishing countries; but I am of opinion it can only be effected at the joint expense of both countries, for it is in a peculiar manner the crime of this country; and I rather feel it to be an objection to this species of emancipation, that it is intended to be a very cheap measure here by throwing the whole expense upon the country."—2 Haggard's Reports, 126, et seq.

After that decision had been rendered, Lord Stowell, who was at that time in correspondence with Judge Story, sent him a copy of it, and wrote to him upon the subject of his judgment. No man will doubt the anti-slavery feelings and proclivities of Judge Story. He was asked to take the decision into consideration and give his opinion about it. Here is his answer:

"I have read, with great attention, your judgment in the slave case. Upon the fullest consideration which I have been able to give the subject, I entirely concur in your views. If I had been called upon to pronounce a judgment in a like case, I should have certainly arrived at the same result."

That was the opinion of Judge Story in 1827; but, sir, whilst contending, as I here contend, as a proposition, based in history, maintained by legislation, supported by judicial authority of the greatest weight, that slavery, as an institution, was protected by the common law of these colonies at the date of the Declaration of Independence, I go further, though not necessary to my argument, and declare that it was the common law of the whole continent of North and South America alike. Why, Mr. President, the European continental powers, which joined and co-operated with Great Britain in the discovery and establishment of colonies on this continent, all of them followed the same views of policy. France, Spain, Portugal, and England, occupied the whole continent, North and South. The legislation of all of them was the same. Louis XIII., by royal edict, established slavery in all his colonies in America. Everybody knows that it was through the interference of Las Casas that the Spanish Crown inaugurated the slave trade with a view of substituting the servile labor of the African for that of the Indians, who had been reduced to slavery by their Spanish conquerors. As regards Portugal, she inaugurated the trade; she originally supplied all the colonies; and the Empire of Brazil to-day, with its servile labor, is the legitimate fruit of the colonial policy of the Portuguese Government in the sixteenth century. She began her trade in 1508, and some authors say even before the colonization of America in the fifteenth century.

I say that slavery was thus the common recognized institution of the New World. I do not thereby mean to admit for a moment that it was not the common law of the Old World when this nation was formed. Have we all forgotten that white slavery existed in England until a comparatively very recent period? It did not finally disappear until the reign of James II. What was that system of villenage, of which all the old law-writers speak? They were all slaves. These villeins were divided into two classes—villeins-regardant and villeins in gross—both slaves. The only difference between them was, that the villeins-regardant were attached to the soil; they could not be sold away from the glebe; they followed the conveyance of the estate into the hands of the new lord; but the villeins in gross were mere chattels, sold from hand to hand, just as negroes are sold at the present hour. If any gentleman is curious to see something on this subject, he will find a concise account of it in the first volume of the celebrated treatise of Mr. Spence, on the equity jurisdiction of the courts of chancery. That volume contains a very concise and admirable history of the English law. He will find there some statements in relation to the law of villenage in England. But, sir, a true picture, a fair picture of the state of the villeins of England, is nowhere better given than in the celebrated argument of Hargrave, the great lawyer who was the counsel for the slave in the Somerset case. One passage will give us his description of what the villain was under the common law of England:

"The condition of a villain had most of the incidents which I have before described in giving the idea of slavery in general. His service was uncertain and indeterminate, such as his lord thought fit to require; or, as some of our ancient writers express it, he knew not in the evening what he was to do in the morning; he was bound to do whatever he was commanded. He was liable to beating, imprisonment, and every other chastisement his lord might prescribe, except killing and maiming. He was incapable of acquiring property for his own benefit, the rule being 'quicquid acquiritur serco, acquiritur domino.' He was himself the subject of property; as such, salable and transmissible. If he was a villain-regardant, he passed with the manor or land to which he was annexed, but might be severed at the pleasure of his lord. If he was a villain in gross, he was a hereditament or a chattel real, according to his lord's interest; being descendible to the heir where the lord was absolute owner, and transmissible to the executor where the lord had only a term of years in him. Lastly, the slavery extended to the issue, if both parents were villeins, or if the father was a villain; our law deriving the condition of the child from that of the father, contrary to the Roman law, in which the rule was 'partus sequitur ventrem.' The origin of villenage is principally to be derived from the wars between our British, Saxon, Danish, and Norman ancestors, whilst they were contending for the possession of this country. Judge Fitzherbert, in his reading on the fourth of Edw. I., stat. 1, entitled 'extenta manerii,' supposes villenage to have commenced at the Conquest, by the distribution then made of the forfeited lands; and of the vanquished inhabitants resident upon them. But there were many bondsmen in England before the Conquest, as appears by the Anglo-Saxon laws regulating them; and therefore it would be near the truth to attribute the origin of villeins as well to the preceding wars and revolutions in this country as to the effects of the Conquest."—20 Howell's State Trials, pp. 35-7.

I say, then, sir, that white slavery was the common law of England down to James II.; and if any man is peculiarly curious to learn the process by which it gradually disappeared, and has any taste for antiquarian lore, if he will look to the appendix to the twentieth volume of Howell's State Trials, he will find a commission issued by Queen Elizabeth to Cecil, Lord Burleigh, and Sir William Mildmay, giving them authority to go into her counties of Gloucester, Cornwall, Devon, and Somerset, and there to manumit her slaves, by getting from them a reasonable price for their liberty. That is the way slavery was abolished in England. It was abolished by the gradual emancipation of the slaves, resulting from the sale by the lord to the slave himself, of his right over him. I will read a passage of this commission:

"ELIZABETH, by the Grace of God, &c. To our right trustee and well-beloved counsellor, sir W. Cecil of the Garter Knights, lord Burghley and High Treasurer of England, and to our trustee and right well-beloved counsellor, sir Walter Mildmay, Knight, chancellor and under treasurer of our exchequer, greetings.

"Whereas, divers and sundrie of our poore faithfull and loyal subjects, being borne bonde in blode and regardant to divers and sundrie our manors and possessions within our realm of England, have made humble suite unto us to be manumysed, enfranchised, and made free, with their children and sequells by reason whereof their children and sequells may become more apte and fite members for the service of us and of our common wealtie.

"We therefore, having tender consideration of their said suite, and well considering the same to be acceptable to Almighty God"—

Now, we all suppose she is going to give them their freedom. Not at all. She is willing to sell them to themselves at a fair price; and so she goes on:

"And we do commytt and give unto you full power and authoritie by these presents, to accept, admitte, and receive to be manumysed, enfranchised, and made free, suche and so many of our bondmen and bondwomen in blood, with all and every their children and sequells, their goodes, landes, tenementes, and hereditaments, as are now apperteynyng or regardaunte to all or any of our manors, landes, tenementes, possessions, or hereditaments within the said severall counties of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, and Gloucester, as to you by your discretions shall seeme mete and convenient, compounding with them for suche reasonable fines or sommes of money to be taken and received to our use for the manumysion and enfranchisement, and for the possessions, and enjoying of all and singular their landes, tenementes, hereditaments, goodes and chattells whatsoever, as you and they can agree for the same after your wisdomes and discretions."

Here, then, was slavery in its widest and broadest acceptance, in Great Britain, in the time of Elizabeth, and it never finally disappeared from the kingdom until the reign of James II.

How was it in France? In France they had a system of white slaves of the same kind. There they called them gens de main morte—mortmain people, because they belonged to the estates; and they, in 1779, were enfranchised by royal edict, in these words:

"We have been greatly affected by the consideration that a large number of our subjects, still attached as slaves to the glebe, are regarded as forming part of it as it were: that deprived of the liberty of their persons, and of the rights of property, they themselves are considered as the property of their lords; that they have not the consolation of bequeathing their goods, and that, except in a few cases rigorously circumscribed, they cannot even transmit to their own children the fruits of their own labor."

That caused the last remnant of white slavery to disappear in France in 1779, after our independence.

As regards Spain, let any one who is in the habit of reading the literature of that country for the eighteenth century tell me if he remembers a solitary tale or romance of her authors in which some Moorish or negro slave is not introduced as the familiar inmate of the household. As regards the remainder of the European continent, it is still governed with beneficent sway by the civil law, and all know that that law protects, in every aspect, the relation between master and slave.

Thus, Mr. President, I say that even if we admit for the moment that by the common law of the nations which colonized this continent, the institution of slavery at the time of our independence, was dying away by the manumissions either gratuitous or for a price of those who held the people as slaves, yet so far as the continent of America was concerned, North and South, there did not breathe a being who did not know that a negro, under the common law of the continent, was merchandise, was property, was a slave, and that he could only extricate himself from that status, stamped upon him by the common law of the country, by positive proof of manumission. No man was bound to show title to his negro slave. The slave was bound to show manumission under which he had acquired his freedom, by the common law of every colony. Why, sir, can any man doubt, is there a gentleman here, even the Senator from Maine, who doubts that if, after the Revolution, the different States of this Union had not passed laws upon the subject to abolish slavery, to subvert this common law of the continent, every one of these States would be slave States yet? How came they free States? Did not they have this institution of slavery imprinted upon them by the power of the mother country? How did they get rid of it? All, all must admit that they had to pass positive acts of legislation to accomplish this purpose. Without that legislation they would still be slave States. What, then, becomes of the pretext that slavery only exists in those States where it was established by positive legislation, that it has no inherent vitality out of those states, and that slaves are not considered as property by the Constitution of the United States?

When the delegates of the several colonies which had thus asserted their independence of the British Crown met in convention, the decision of Lord Mansfield in the Sommerset case was recent-known to all. At the same time, a number of the northern colonies had taken incipient steps for the emancipation of their slaves. Here permit me to say, sir, that, with a prudent regard to what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] yesterday called the "sensitive pocket-nerve," they all made these provisions prospective. Slavery was to be abolished after a certain future time—just enough time to give their citizens convenient opportunity for selling the slaves to southern planters, putting the money in their pockets, and then sending to us here, on this floor, representatives who flaunt in robes of sanctimonious holiness; who make parade of a cheap philanthropy, exercised at our expense; and who say to all men, "look ye now, how holy, how pure we are; you are polluted by the touch of slavery; we are free from it."

I say that was the position of the delegates when they met in convention; and it was necessary to make provision in relation to slaves. In the northern States slavery was about to be abolished. If Lord Mansfield's decision in the Sommerset case was to be followed as the rule, it was obvious that southern slaves were exposed to being plundered, robbed, carried away from their masters. On the other hand, by a compromise between the North and the South, slaves had entered into the representative basis of the country. What was to be done? Two clauses were put in the Constitution, one to guaranty the South its property—it provided for the return to the southern owner of the slave that was recognized as his property; another clause for the North, to prevent a disturbance of the representative basis by importation of slaves. The North said to the South, "You shall not increase your laboring population by importation after twenty years, because we of the North have an interest in that question; we have agreed they shall be counted in the representative basis, and we want protection as well as you." That is all the Constitution says on this subject. It guaranties to the South the sanctity of its peculiar property; it protects the North against any abnormal augmentation of the number of slaves in the South which might give them an undue preponderance in the representation of the different States of the Union.

Now, sir, because the Supreme Court of the United States says—what is patent to every man who reads the Constitution of the United States—that it does guaranty property in slaves, it has been attacked with vituperation here, on this floor, by Senators on all sides. Some have abstained from any indecent, insulting remarks in relation to the court. Some have confined themselves to calm and legitimate argument. To them I am about to reply. To the others, I shall have something to say a little later. What says the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN?] He says:

"Had the result of that election been otherwise, and had not the [Democratic] party triumphed on the dogma which they had thus introduced, we should never have heard of a doctrine so utterly at variance with all truth; so utterly destitute of all legal logic; so founded on error, and unsupported by anything like argument, as is the opinion of the Supreme Court."

He says, further:

"I should like, if I had time, to attempt to demonstrate the fallacy of that opinion. I have examined the view of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of the power of the Constitution to carry slavery into free territory belonging to the United States, and I tell you that I believe any tolerably respectable lawyer in the United States can show, beyond all question, to any fair and unprejudiced mind, that the decision has nothing to stand upon except assumption, and bad logic from the assumptions made. The main proposition on which that decision is founded; the corner-stone of it, without which it is nothing, without which it fails entirely to satisfy the mind of any man, is this: that the Constitution of the United States recognizes property in slaves, and protects it as such. I deny it. It neither recognizes slaves as property, nor does it protect slaves as property."

The Senator here, you see, says that the whole decision is based on that assumption, which is false. He says that the Constitution does not recognize slaves as property, nor protect them as property, and his reasoning, a little further on, is somewhat curious. He says:

"On what do they found the assertion that the Constitution recognizes slavery as property? On the provision of the Constitution by which Congress is prohibited from passing a law to prevent the African slave trade for twenty years; and therefore they say the Constitution recognizes slaves as property."

I should think that was a pretty fair recognition of it. On this point the gentleman declares:

"Will not anybody see that this constitutional provision, if it works one way, must work the other? If, by allowing the slave trade for twenty years, we recognize slaves as property, when we say that at the end of twenty years we will cease to allow it, or may cease to do so, is not that denying them to be property after that period elapses?"

That is the argument. Nothing but my respect for the logical intellect of the Senator from Maine could make me treat this argument as serious, and nothing but having heard it myself would make me believe that he ever uttered it. What, sir! The Constitution of our country says to the South, "you shall count as the basis of your representation five slaves as being three white men; you may be protected in the natural increase of your slaves; nay, more, as a matter of compromise you may increase their number if you choose, for twenty years, by importation; when these twenty years are out, you shall stop." The Supreme Court of the United States says, "well; is not this a recognition of slavery, of property in slaves?" "Oh, no," says the gentleman, "the rule must work both ways; there is a converse to the proposition." Now, sir, to an ordinary, uninstructed intellect, it would seem that the converse of the proposition was simply that at the end of twenty years you should not any longer increase your numbers by importation; but the gentleman says the converse of the proposition is that at the end of the twenty years, after you have, under the guarantee of the Constitution, been adding by importation to the previous number of your slaves; then all those that you had before, and all those that, under that Constitution, you have imported, cease to be recognized as property by the Constitution, and on this proposition he assails the Supreme Court of the United States—a proposition which he says will occur to anybody!

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should be very glad to enter into this debate now, but I fear it is so late that I shall not be able to get through to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it is of no consequence.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What says the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who also went into this examination somewhat extensively. I read from his printed speech:

"I do not say that slaves are never property. I do not say that they are, or are not. Within the limits of a State which declares them to be property, they are property, because they are within the jurisdiction of that government which makes the declaration; but I should wish to speak of it in the light of a member of the United States Senate, and in the language of the United States Constitution. If this be property in the States, what is the nature and extent of it? I insist that the Supreme Court have often decided, and everybody has understood, that slavery is a local institution, existing by force of State law; and of course that law can give it no possible character beyond the limits of that State. I shall no doubt find the idea better expressed in the opinion of Judge Nelson, in this same Dred Scott decision. I prefer to read his language. He declares:

"Every State or nation possesses an exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction within her own territory; and her laws affect and bind all property and persons residing within it. It may regulate the manner and circumstances under which property is held, and the condition, capacity, and state, of all persons therein; and, also, the remedy and the modes of administering justice. And it is equally true, that no State or nation can affect or bind property out of its territory, or persons not residing within it. No State, therefore, can enact laws to operate beyond its own dominions; and, if it attempts to do so, may be lawfully refused obedience. Such laws can have no authority extra-territorially. This is the necessary result of the independence of distinct and separate sovereignties."

Here is the law; and under it exists the law of slavery in the different States. By virtue of this very principle it cannot extend one inch beyond its own territorial limits. A State cannot regulate the relation of master and slave, of owner and property, the manner and title of descent, or anything else, one inch beyond its territory. Then you cannot, by virtue of the law of slavery, if it makes slaves property in a State, if you please, move that property out of the State. It ends whenever you pass from that State. You may pass into another State that has a like law; and if you do, you hold it by virtue of that law; but the moment you pass beyond the limits of the slaveholding States, all title to the property called property in slaves, there ends. Under such a law slaves cannot be carried as property into the Territories, or anywhere else beyond the States authorizing it. It is not property anywhere else. If the Constitution of the United States gives any other and further character than this to slave property, let us acknowledge it fairly and end all strife about it. If it does not, I ask, in all candor, that men on the other side shall say so, and let this point be settled. What is the point we are to inquire into? It is this: does the Constitution of the United States make slaves property beyond the jurisdiction of the States authorizing slavery? If it only acknowledges them as property within that jurisdiction, it has not extended the property one inch beyond the State line; but if, as the Supreme Court seems to say, it does recognize and protect them as property further than State limits, and more than the State laws do, then, indeed, it becomes like other property. The Supreme Court rest this claim upon this clause of the Constitution: "No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." Now the question is, does that guaranty it? Does that make it the same as other property? The very fact that this clause makes provision on the subject of persons bound to service, shows that the framers of the Constitution did not regard it as other property. It was a thing that needed some provision; other property did not. The insertion of such a provision shows that it was not regarded as other property. If a man's horse stray from Delaware into Pennsylvania, he can go and get it. Is there any provision in the Constitution for it? No. How came this to be there, if a slave is property? If it is the same as other property, why have any provision about it?"

It will undoubtedly have struck any person, in hearing this passage read from the speech of the Senator from Vermont, whom I regret not to see in his seat to-day, that the whole argument, ingeniously as it is put, rests upon this fallacy—if I may say so with due respect to him—that a man cannot have title in property wherever the law does not give him a remedy or process for the assertion of his title; or, in other words, his whole argument rests upon the old confusion of ideas which considers a man's right and his remedy to be one and the same thing. I have already shown to you, by the passages I have cited from the opinions of Lord Stowell and of Judge Story, how they regard this subject. They say that the slave who goes to England, or goes to Massachusetts, from a slave State, is still a slave, that he is still his master's property; but that his master has lost control over him, not by reason of the cessation of his property, but because those States grant no remedy to the master by which he can exercise his control.

There are numerous illustrations upon this point—illustrations furnished by the copy-right laws, illustrations furnished by patent laws. Let us take a case, one that appeals to us all. There lives now a man in England who from time to time sings to the enchanted ear of the civilized world strains of such melody that the charmed senses seem to abandon the grosser regions of earth, and to rise to purer and serener regions above. God has created that man a poet. His inspiration is his; his songs are his by right divine; they are his property, so recognized by human law; yet here in these United States men steal Tennyson's works and sell his property for their profit; and this because, in spite of the violated conscience of the nation, we refuse to give him protection for his property. Examine your Constitution; are slaves the only species of property there recognized as requiring peculiar protection? Sir, the inventive genius of our brethren of the North is a source of vast wealth to them and vast benefit to the nation. I saw a short time ago in one of the New York journals, that the estimated value of a few of the patents now before us in this Capitol for renewal, was $40,000,000. I cannot believe that the entire capital invested in inventions of this character in the United States can fall short of one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars. On what protection does this vast property rest? Just upon that same constitutional protection which gives a remedy to the slave owner when his property is also found outside of the limits of the State in which he lives.

Without this protection, what would be the condition of the northern inventor? Why, sir, the Vermont inventor protected by his own law would come to Massachusetts, and there say to the pirate who had stolen his property, "render me up my property or pay me value for its use."

The Senator from Vermont would receive for answer, if he were the counsel of this Vermont inventor, "Sir, if you want protection for your property go to your own State; property is governed by the laws of the State within whose jurisdiction it is found; you have no property in your invention outside of the limits of your State; you cannot go an inch beyond it." Would not this be so? Does not every man see at once that the right of the inventor to his discovery, that the right of the poet to his inspiration, depends upon those principles of eternal justice which God has implanted in the heart of man, and that wherever he cannot exercise them it is because man, faithless to the trust that he has received from God, denies them the protection to which they are entitled?

Sir, follow out the illustration which the Senator from Vermont himself has given; take his very case of the Delaware owner of a horse riding him across the line into Pennsylvania. The Senator says: "Now, you see that slaves are not property like other property; if slaves were property like other property, why have you this special clause in your Constitution to protect a slave? You have no clause to protect the horse, because horses are recognized as property everywhere." Mr. President, the same fallacy lurks at the bottom of this argument, as of all the rest. Let Pennsylvania exercise her undoubted jurisdiction over persons and things within her own boundary; let her do as she has a perfect right to do—declare that hereafter, within the State of Pennsylvania, there shall be no property in horses, and that no man shall maintain a suit in her courts for the recovery of property in a horse; and where will your horse-owner be then? Just where the English poet is now; just where the slaveholder and the inventor would be if the Constitution, foreseeing a difference of opinion in relation to rights in these subject-matters, had not provided the remedy in relation to such property as might easily be plundered. Slaves, if you please, are not property like other property in this: that you can easily rob us of them; but as to the right in them, that man has to overthrow the whole history of the world, he has to overthrow every treatise on jurisprudence, he has to ignore the common sentiment of mankind, he has to repudiate the authority of all that is considered sacred with man, ere he can reach the conclusion that the person who owns a slave, in a country where slavery has been established for ages, has no other property in that slave than the mere title which is given by the statute law of the land where it is found.

I never heard this question disputed before; I never heard a suggestion that slaves were not protected as property by the Constitution of the United States till I heard it from the Senator from Maine here the other day. In the sixteenth volume of Peters's Report there is the report of a case which occurred between the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania. It was elaborately argued. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania sent her attorney general into the room below to affirm her right to the legislation which she had passed. Although the suit was in the name of an individual, really it was the rights of Maryland that were concerned, and it was the State of Maryland that was interested in the decision. The case is known by the title in the law books of Prigg versus the State of Pennsylvania. Every judge on the bench gave his decision in that case. Every judge on the bench concurred in the decision. Judge Story delivered the opinion of the court, the other judges delivering their individual opinions, where they did not precisely agree with the general language of the court. Amongst those judges was Judge McLean, one of the dissentient judges in the Dred Scott case. Let us hear what he says about slaves being property under the Constitution. I shall read a short passage, a paragraph or two only. I take this out of his statement of his opinion at page 661, of 16th Peters. He quotes the clause of the Constitution that protects us in our rights to fugitive slaves, and he says:

"It was designed to protect the rights of the master, and against whom? Not against the State, nor the people of the State in which he resides; but against the people and the legislative action of other States, where the fugitive from labor might be found. Under the confederation, the master has no legal means of enforcing his rights in a State opposed to slavery. A disregard of rights thus asserted, was deeply felt in the South. It produced great excitement, and would have led to results destructive of the Union. To avoid this, the constitutional guarantee was essential."

Now, what is this guarantee? He tells us, at page 671 of the same volume:

"I cannot perceive how any one can doubt that the remedy given in the Constitution, if, indeed, it give any remedy without legislation, was designed to be a peaceful one; a remedy sanctioned by judicial authority; a remedy guarded by the forms of law. But the inquiry is reiterated, is not the master entitled to his property? I answer that he is. His right is guaranteed by the Constitution; and the most summary means for its enforcement is found in the act of Congress. And neither the State nor its citizens can obstruct the prosecution of this right."

That was Judge McLean's language. When I find language like this, even from the minority, of the court in the Dred Scott case; when I find the entire court, man for man, concurring that the constitutional rights of the South are guaranteed in slaves as property by this clause in the Constitution, I must express my intense surprise at hearing the Senator from Maine declare that the Dred Scott decision was not to be supported, because it rested as a corner-stone on the assumption that slaves were recognized by the Constitution as property, and that he denied that fact.

But, Mr. President, all these gentlemen who thus fall in the slightest degree to impugn the opinion of the court by argument, attempt to shake its authority by an assertion entirely destitute of the slightest foundation. Every Senator who has spoken on the subject of this decision has declared that the court said it was without jurisdiction to determine it, and then determined it. I say that all the judges declared that they had jurisdiction of the merits, and determined that point before they decided the merits; and I am prepared to prove it. There was not a judge on the bench who did not declare that he had jurisdiction of the merits. There were some of the judges who declared that they had jurisdiction of no other question; and Judge McLean was one of them. He said the question of jurisdiction was not before them at all, and so did Judge Catron; and both those judges said that the court had nothing before them but the merits. Every judge said that he had the merits before him. I will prove it.

When this decision was first published; when, as I am sorry to say, two of the judges of that court so far forgot the proprieties of their judicial station as to send forth a minority opinion, to forestall the public judgment, and to produce among the people of the country the impression that the integrity of their judiciary was no longer to be relied upon, and thus to subvert one of the foundations of our Government; when those opinions first went abroad, they were seized upon by the Republican presses through the land, and it was said everywhere, "this court is usurping power; it has no such power as that which it assumes; it first says it has no jurisdiction, and then, after declaring itself to be without power over the subject-matter, presumes to determine it." Every Senator on this side of the Chamber, who has spoken, has repeated this. I want to nail the assertion to the counter; the coin is false.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to make a suggestion as to the statement of the court.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand the Senator to assert that two judges sent forth their opinions. Did they do anything more than put their opinions on file in the clerk's office, where they were copied?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think they did; but I am not going to enter into that now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand it is not the fact. They simply put their opinions on file in the clerk's office, as was the rule of the court; the others kept theirs back.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am so instructed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman is mistaken. The copies of those opinions were not furnished by the clerk of the court.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They were not sent forth by the judges, that I am aware of.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not mean to say that the judges themselves took their opinions and carried them to the printing offices; but they furnished them for publication. It is idle to deny it. Everybody knows it.

Now, sir, I come back to the point from which I started. I say that every judge of the court, in his opinion, declared that he had jurisdiction—jurisdiction over the merits of this case. First let us take the Chief Justice, who was the organ of the court. I cannot read all the reasoning; I should detain the Senate too long if I were to do so, and I see too many visible signs of impatience about me to desire to detain them any longer. The Chief Justice said this:

"But, before we proceed to examine this part of the case, it may be proper to notice an objection taken to the judicial authority of this court to decide it; and it has been said, that as this court has decided against the jurisdiction of the circuit court [not its own jurisdiction] on the plea in abatement, it has no right to examine any question presented by the exception; and that anything it may say upon that part of the case will be extra-judicial, and mere obiter dicta."

"This is a manifest mistake; there can be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of this court to revise the judgment of a circuit court, and to reverse it for any error apparent on the record, whether it be the error of giving judgment in a case over which it had no jurisdiction, or any other material error; and this, too, whether there is a plea in abatement or not."—19 Ibid., 427.

That it is the language of the Chief Justice, the organ of the court, who delivered the opinion of the majority. Judge Wayne says the same thing, at page 456. Judge Nelson says, in giving his opinion:

"In the view we have taken of the case, it will not be necessary to pass upon this question, [of jurisdiction,] and we shall therefore proceed at once to an examination of the case upon its merits."—Ibid., p. 458.

Judge Grier says:

"The record shows a prima facie case of jurisdiction, requiring the court to decide all the questions properly arising in it; and as the decision of the pleas in bar shows that the plaintiff is a slave, and therefore not entitled to sue in a court of the United States, the form of the judgment is of little importance."—Ibid., p. 469.

Mr. Justice Daniel (p. 482) says that the questions arising on the pleas in bar might be passed by after determining the plea in abatement; but he does give his opinion on the merits, although he thought it would be possible to decide the case without a decision on its merits.

Mr. Justice Campbell says:

"My opinion in this case is not affected by the plea to the jurisdiction, and I shall not discuss the questions it suggests. The claim of the plaintiff to freedom depends upon the effect to be given to his absence from Missouri, in company with his master, in Illinois and Minnesota, and this effect is to be ascertained by a reference to the laws of Missouri."—Ibid., p. 493.

He determines nothing but the merits. Mr. Justice Catron (p. 518) says that the judgment of the circuit court upon the plea in abatement—that is, the plea to the jurisdiction—was not, in his opinion, open to examination in the Supreme Court; and that they had nothing before them but the merits.

Mr. Justice McLean says:

"The plea to the jurisdiction is not before us, on this writ of error. A demurrer to the plea was sustained, which ruled the plea bad, and the defendant, on leave, pleaded over."

"The decision on the demurrer was in favor of the plaintiff; and as the plaintiff prosecutes this writ of error, he does not complain of the decision on the demurrer. The defendant might have complained of this decision, as against him, and have prosecuted a writ of error, to reverse it. But as the case under the instruction of the court to the jury, was decided in his favor, of course he had no ground of complaint."—Ibid., p. 530.

Judge McLean then says that the court had no question of jurisdiction before it at all, nothing but the merits. Mr. Justice Curtis says the same thing.

"That as the plea to the jurisdiction in this case shows no facts, except that the plaintiff was of African descent, and his ancestors were sold as slaves, and as these facts are not inconsistent with his citizenship of the United States, and his residence in the State of Missouri, the plea to the jurisdiction was bad, and the judgment of the circuit court overruling it was correct."—Ibid., p. 588.

And, therefore, he goes on to determine the merits. Now, shall I detain the Senate by reading passages from the speeches which I hold in my hand, and in which every Senator in succession, who has spoken of this decision, has spread before the country the bold, plain statement that the Supreme Court first decided that it had no jurisdiction, and then went on to determine the merits?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must beg the Senator to give me leave to explain, because I do not know that I shall have an opportunity to answer him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will yield for a few minutes, of course.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely wish to explain on this specific point. I do not know what particular language I used myself in the speech I made on this subject. I remember very well the idea which I meant to convey; and I presume that idea is conveyed in sufficiently distinct language. It is this: I did not speak of the individual judges, but I said that, in the opinion of the court, which was delivered by Judge Taney, and to which only I alluded, the point decided in the first place, was, that the court below, and consequently the court above, had no jurisdiction of the case, for the reason that the party plaintiff was not qualified to sue; he had no standing in the court. That was the decision; and the inference I drew (I do not know whether I used the term or not) was, that the court admitted they had no jurisdiction. I did not mean to say that they admitted in terms that they had no jurisdiction beyond that, and over the merits of the case; but that the substance of their decision was, that the plaintiff having no standing in the court whatever, the case must consequently be dismissed; and that, whatever they undertake to say afterwards, was mere assertion.

I know they go on to give a reason for expressing their opinion, and that is, that in all writs of error they may confine themselves to the particular error which they find in the record below, or do not find, as the case may be; but that, in certain cases, they may look into other parts of the record in order to preclude the necessity of revising the case afterwards. The Senator, however, is perfectly aware that this idea has been answered over and over again by the remark, that the case could not possibly come before them again, when the decision was that the plaintiff had and could have no standing in court. What my particular language was I do not undertake to say. I may have said that the court admitted they had no jurisdiction of the case; not that they admitted it in terms, but by the original decision they made that the plaintiff had no right in the court below, and consequently could have none in the court above. I did not undertake to dispute that the Supreme Court of the United States had power to revise the decision of the court below, if properly brought there; but I say, when they decided that the plaintiff had no standing in the court originally, there was an end of the whole matter, and the court could not properly, and it was contrary to all custom, go into an examination of other questions that did not necessarily arise. That is the position I mean to take. I did not go into it at length, as perhaps I may hereafter; but the Senator misrepresents me, not intentionally; he misunderstands me if he asserts that I said, or meant to be understood as saying, that the court had in terms admitted that they had no jurisdiction of any question beyond the first. He may read the language of my speech, if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is rather late in the day, and I have not time to go at any length into this discussion, but I have the Senator's language before me; I have the language of the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] and of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.] Every one of those Senators said that the Supreme Court had decided that it had no jurisdiction. The language is here; and now what does the Senator from Maine answer to that position? That although the Supreme Court decided it had jurisdiction, in his judgment its decision was wrong!

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not what I said.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It cannot be anything else. The Supreme Court of the United States was the only tribunal to determine in the last resort whether it had jurisdiction or not over the question. It determined that it had. The Senator says it began by determining that the plaintiff in the court below had no right to come into the court, and by reason thereof determined that the circuit court had no jurisdiction, and he puts in himself that consequently the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction. It is precisely his "consequently" that Chief Justice Taney says is a manifest mistake. Here is what the honorable Senator from Maine said:

"It is said that this question has been carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and settled there. Does the honorable Senator from Louisiana?"

The Senator turned to me. We are always having some little legal quarrels in this corner between us, particularly on the slavery question.

"Does the honorable Senator from Louisiana, as a lawyer, undertake to tell me that the question has been settled by a judicial decision in that court? Did that question ever arise and present itself to the mind of the court with reference to any necessity of the case? To what extent does the honorable Senator, or anybody else who is a lawyer, undertake to say that the decision of the court is binding? It is binding so far, and so far alone, as it can issue its mandate. Its opinion is of force only upon the question which settles the cause."

Who is to say what the question is that settles the cause in the opinion of the court? Is it the court or the Senator?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The court had settled it originally.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The court said, "in our judgment, there are two points which settle the cause; one is the jurisdiction, the other the merits." The Senator says that by the time they had got through stating the first half of their opinion, he has a right to shut their mouths and say, "you shall not go on and give any other reason; the reason you have given is enough; you cannot say another word." This is a most curious proposition to maintain to anybody that has ever heard decrees or opinions rendered in courts of justice. Hear the Senator again:

"Am I bound to recognize opinions that may be advanced by any set of judges, in any court, simply because, after they have decided a cause, they undertake to give their opinions? They may be bad men, they may be weak men, but their mandate in the cause before them must be obeyed; and I will go as far and as readily as any man to obey the mandate of any court to which I am bound to render obedience; and I am bound to render obedience to the Supreme Court of the United States; but when they undertake to settle questions not before them, I tell them those questions are for me as well as for them."

Then, sir, the honorable Senator declares, point blank, that this question was not before the court. They consider that it was; the dissenting judges said it was; everybody there said it was; everybody but the Senator from Maine and his worthy colleagues, the Senator from New York and the Senator from Vermont. This notion was first started by some indecorous expressions in the opinions of the dissenting judges. They themselves, declaring that they had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, suggested that they would not consider the opinion of the other judges binding, because, in the opinion of other judges, the court below had no jurisdiction; "but," said Judge Taney, "this question is before me on its merits; I must decide it; it is my duty to decide it; I cannot avoid the duty." That is the language, if the gentleman will refer to it.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another point in my argument, which I approach with extreme pain, with unfeigned regret. From my earliest childhood, I have been taught to revere the judges of the highest court in the land, as men selected to render justice between litigants, not more by reason of their eminent legal acquirements, than because of a spotless purity of character, an undimmed luster of reputation which removed them far, far beyond even a doubt of their integrity. The long line of eminent judicial worthies which seemed to have culminated in a Marshall, has been continued in the person of one upon whom the highest eulogium that can be pronounced is to say that he was eminently worthy of being the successor of that illustrious judge. I know not, Mr. President, whether you, as I, have had the good fortune to see that magistrate in the administration of justice in his own circuit, or in the court sitting below us, of which he is the honored chief. I know not, sir, whether it has been your good fortune, as it has been mine, to hear the expressions of affectionate reverence with which he is spoken of by the people amongst whom he has passed his pure, his simple, and his spotless life. I know not, sir, whether you have listened, as I have, with interest to the expressions of respect and admiration that come from the members of his bar in their familiar intercourse with each other—spontaneous tributes, worth a thousand labored eulogies, to his eminent sagacity, to his vast legal learning, to the mild and serene dignity of his judicial deportment; above all, sir, above all, to the conscientious, earnest, almost painful sense of responsibility with which he holds the scale of justice in even and impartial hand between the litigants whose rights depend upon his judgment.

Mr. President, he is old, very old. The infirmities of age have bowed his venerable form. Earth has no further object of ambition for him; and when he shall sink into his grave after a long career of high office in our country, I trust that I do not rudely or improperly invade the sanctity of private life in saying that he will leave behind him, in the scanty heritage that shall be left for his family, the noblest evidence that he died, as he had lived, a being honorable to the earth from which he sprang, and worthy of the heaven to which he aspired.

This man, sir, thus beloved, thus revered, thus esteemed, has been compared upon this floor to the infamous Jeffreys, by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] This man has been charged by the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] with a corrupt coalition with the Chief Magistrate of the Union. He charges in fact—not always in direct language, but partly by bold assertion and partly by insidious suggestions—that the Supreme Magistrate of the land and the judges of our highest court, and the parties to the Dred Scott case, got up a mock trial; that they were all in common collusion to cheat the country. He represents the venerable Chief Magistrate of our country, whose reputation hitherto has been beyond reproach; he represents the venerable Chief Justice as enacting a solemn farce in the face of the American people on the eastern portico of this Capitol; and he tells us that on the day when that great sea of upturned faces was here presented, all looking on the solemn pageant that was passing before them, the Chief Justice of the nation was whispering into the ear of the President the terms of this nefarious bargain, and that, too, at the very moment when the former was administering and the latter taking the oath of office by which the high majesty of Heaven was invoked, as witness to the purity of his intentions in the administration of the Government of his country.

Mr. President, accursed, thrice accursed, is that fell spirit of party which desecrates the noblest sentiments of the human heart; and which, in the accomplishment of its unholy purposer, hesitates at no reckless violence of assault on all that is held sacred by the wise and good. It was difficult, extremely difficult, for us all to sit here and hear what was said, and observe the manner in which it was said, and repress the utterance of the indignation that boiled up within us. All this is charged by the Senator without the proof of a solitary fact, without the assertion even of a fact on which to base the foul charge. Luckily, sir, luckily for us, these eminent men are too highly placed in the reverence, the estimation, and the regard of the American people, to have their bright escutcheon injured by such attacks as these. Mr. President, in olden times a viper gnawed a file. Although it may not be possible to make direct answers to all these insinuations, because no fact is even suggested on which they rest, there are certain facts so insinuated, in relation to which I have the authentic evidence upon my desk in proof of their falsity.

Was this case got up? What are the facts? Men should be a little careful in making such accusations as these; unless, indeed, they care not whether they be true or false, being intended to answer some purpose, whether the one or the other. This case was got up, was it? By accident or design? In the exquisitely decorous and appropriate language of the Senator from New York, the Chief Justice of the United States and the Chief Magistrate of the Union were gambling at cards for the case, and Dred Scott was dummy in the imaginary game! What truth is there in these insinuations of design? Why, sir, Dred Scott had sought his freedom by the assertion of his rights in the State courts of Missouri years before the Kansas-Nebraska act was ever suggested, and years before the President of the United States was even a candidate for office; years before he was even Minister to England.

This case was determined in the supreme court of the State of Missouri, in 1852, adversely to Dred Scott, and was remanded to the lower court for further trial. Mr. Buchanan had, I believe, not then gone to England. The Kansas bill had not been heard of, and was not in the imagination of any man. When the case got back into the lower court, the counsel for Dred Scott, finding that the opinion of the supreme court of the State was adverse to his rights, withdrew his case from the State court, and endeavored to better his client's chances by going into another jurisdiction. That is the way the case got into the Federal court; and when was this? The case was carried into the Federal court in the city of St.

Louis, in November, 1853, before even the meeting of the Congress which passed the Kansas-Nebraska act; of course months before Mr. Dixon, the Senator from Kentucky first sprang upon the country, by his amendment, the question in relation to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Here is the record:

"Be it remembered that heretofore, to wit: on the second day of November, in the year of our Lord 1853, came the abovenamed plaintiff, Dred Scott, by his attorney, and filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for the Missouri district, the following declaration against the defendant, John F. A. Sandford."

Was that a case gotten up by design, between the President and the court here? It was never carried there until they had lost all chance in the State court; it was carried there as the last desperate resource of defeated counsel; eager to maintain what he conceived to be the rights of his client. Who was the counsel? The Senators from Missouri can tell us who R. M. Field, of St. Louis, is, and probably they will verify the assertion which I make here upon hear-say—I give it only upon hear-say—that he is one of the most determined Free-Soilers in the State of Missouri; has always declined to vote at elections until he was able to cast his vote for a Free-Soil candidate, and until he aided in the election of the Free-Soil Representative from the St. Louis district who now sits in the other Chamber.

This case, thus brought up in November, 1853, was determined in the court below, and a writ of error was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, before the Kansas bill was passed, and whilst Mr. Buchanan was in England! When it reached the Supreme Court of the United States what became of it? What does the Senator from New York say became of it?

"The counsel who had appeared for the negro had volunteered from motives of charity, and ignorant of course of the disposition which was to be made of the cause"—

—which the Senator had previously insinuated was gotten up by design—

—"had argued that his client had been freed from slavery by operation of the Missouri prohibition of 1820. The opposing counsel, paid by the defending slaveholder"—

I happen to know, however, whatever may be the fact with the other, that one of the opposing counsel was not paid by any slaveholder at all; that one of the opposing counsel volunteered as amicus curiæ by virtue of his position as head of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, by virtue of his position as ex-Attorney General of the United States, by virtue of his position as a compeer of the honorable Senator, and his former colleague on this floor from the State of Maryland, Mr. Reverdy Johnson. That gentleman volunteered in the case as amicus curiæ, because the whole section of the country to whose interests he had been devoted from his birth had an interest in this great question to be decided, and which, at the time of his volunteering in the case, he did not yet know to be represented by counsel. The honorable Mr. Geyer, of Missouri, afterwards entered his name of record, and appeared for the defendant.

Says the Senator from New York:

"The opposing counsel, paid by the defending slaveholder, had insisted, in reply, that that famous statute was unconstitutional. The mock debate had been heard in the chamber of the court in the basement of the Capitol, in the presence of the curious visitors at the seat of Government, whom the dullness of a judicial investigation could not disgust. The court did not hesitate to please the incoming President!"

Where are we, sir, that such language as this is used? Is this the Senate of the United States, and are we here, the ambassadors of coequal sovereignties, to be insulted by language like this? Is not this an insult to every one of us, direct and personal?

"The court did not hesitate to please the incoming President by seizing this extraneous and idle forensic discussion, and converting it into an occasion for pronouncing an opinion that the Missouri prohibition was void, and that, by force of the Constitution, slavery existed, with all the elements of property in man over man, in all the Territories of the United States, paramount to any popular sovereignty within the Territories, and even to the authority of Congress itself."

"The day of inauguration came—the first one among all the celebrations of that great national pageant that was to be desecrated by a coalition between the executive and judicial departments, to undermine the National Legislature and the liberties of the people."

Is there a solitary word of truth in this? Not one. Is a solitary fact alleged? Not one; but a broad and naked charge is made, which is intended to stamp infamy upon characters hitherto beyond the breath of reproach. Shame, shame upon the Senator that makes such charges as these and has no proof to support them.

"The President, attended by the usual lengthened procession, arrived and took his seat on the portico." The Supreme Court attended him there, in robes which yet exacted public reverence. The people, unware of the import of the whisperings carried on between the President and the Chief Justice, and imbued with veneration for both, filled the avenues and gardens far away as the eye could reach. The President addressed them in words as bland as those which the worst of all the Roman Emperors pronounced when he assumed the purple. He announced (vaguely, indeed, but with self-satisfaction) the forthcoming extra-judicial exposition of the Constitution, and pledged his submission to it as authoritative and final."

Does anybody find that in the President's inaugural? Does anybody find in the President's inaugural anything on this point, except that he learns the question is to be decided by the highest tribunal of the land, and that he, as every other good citizen is, is willing to render obedience to that tribunal?

"A few days later, copies of this opinion were multiplied by the Senate's press, and scattered, in the name of the Senate, broadcast over the land, and their publication has not yet been disowned by the Senate."

As if we were going to disown publishing the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Simultaneously, Dred Scott, who had played the hand of dummy in this interesting political game, unwittingly, yet to the complete satisfaction of his adversary, was voluntarily emancipated; and thus received from his master, as a reward, the freedom which the court had denied him as a right."

Now, does not the Senator from New York know, was it not published in every newspaper in the country, that the slave's master had died? Was it not known that the man who emancipated the slave was a Black-Republican compeer in the other House, of the Senator of New York, [Mr. CHAFFEE, of Massachusetts,] who was forced to give this emancipation after having long hesitated, by the indignant denunciations of the fellow-Republicans around him. Everybody knows that, and yet here we are told by the Senator that this gift of freedom to the slave was the reward granted by his master, the defendant, for playing the hand of dummy in a game of cards—a political game—with the venerable Chief Justice and Chief Magistrate of the Union. Shame, shame once more, upon the Senator who makes charges like these, without the shadow of ground for their support.

Mr. President, I am tired. I have no doubt that others are too. I have gone so much at large into these collateral subjects that, so far as regards the simple question before us, as to the admission of Kansas under this constitution, what I have to say is little indeed. The subject has been exhausted, thoroughly so, admirably so, this morning, by the honorable Senator from Missouri. I will, however, make one or two suggestions and close.

I take the ground that the Congress of the United States is not bound to give to the people of a Territory any more protection than they are willing to receive. I take the ground that about eighteen months ago, the Congress of the United States listened to the complaint of the present rebels in Kansas, who said to us this: "A band of armed marauders has invaded us from a neighboring State; they have possession of our Territorial Legislature; they have passed a law by which they are about to call together a convention to form a constitution for the new State of Kansas; they will not allow us to vote fairly; we are a majority, and unless you come to our relief, there is no help for us." They asked us then to admit them as a State into the Union under the Topeka constitution, as the best of all possible remedies against the usurpations of which they complained. At that time the Territorial Legislature had inaugurated the scheme for the adoption of a constitution. The law for calling a convention had been passed. They were about to vote for delegates. That was the precise time in which this vaunted majority of Free-Soilers in Kansas approached the Congress of the United States with complaints that they were down-trodden.

What did the Senate of the United States reply? The Democrats were in a majority here, and they said, "it may be that what you say is true; it may be that you are down-trodden and oppressed in violation of law; you assert it yourselves, and you have complainant advocates here on this floor to prove it; but it is no remedy for that, that we shall admit you as a State into this family of States, under a constitution formed by one party in the Territory. We cannot do that. You say that if the territorial law is carried out, a constitution will be formed by the other party alone. Come now, we will do justice to both sides; we will pass a law by which all shall be protected, Free-Soilers and Democrats, by the strong arm of the Federal Government, by which you shall be free all to vote, free all to exercise this vaunted popular sovereignty, free all to make manifest to the nation that great majority of which you boast." The Senator from Georgia elaborated a bill for the purpose with the greatest possible care; and every possible safeguard that human ingenuity could throw around the rights of these people to protect them from invasion, was there employed. Every Senator on this side suggested amendments, and when the bill finally passed the Senate, it extorted from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] the admission that it was fair, that it was unexceptionable; "give us that, and we are content."

Now, what occurred? In the progress of the debate upon that bill the leaders of this Republican party in the Territory informed their advocates here, in both branches of Congress, that that would not suit them; that it would put a stop to violence; that it would put a stop to uproar and confusion; and that thus the Black Republican candidate for the Presidency would be in a very lean minority, as the injured form of "bleeding Kansas" could not be presented to the eyes of the people during the impending canvass. So, sir, after the Democratic party—being in a majority in this Hall—had passed the bill to do justice to these men, and sent it to the other House, they, who now stand up for the outraged rights of these down-trodden people, defeated the bill; themselves prevented the protection which they now say it was our duty to give; and then tell us here to-day that it would be a monstrous outrage to admit Kansas into the Union with the constitution which the people formed under their own legislation. Both modes were before them; the Territorial Legislature was proceeding to pass enactments which were to result in the formation of a constitution for the new State, and the Republican party—the Free-Soil party—was imploring us for help. We told them, "choose now between the territorial legislation, and take your own chances at the polls; or take the full, strong, firm, protection of the Government of the United States, which is now tendered you." They refused the latter. They said they would have Topeka or nothing; and having taken that choice, nothing, with my consent, shall they have. Topeka! Topeka! that miserable rabble of insurgents; a miserable raking together of men, the very scum of the large northern cities, seeking naught but violence and bloodshed; presuming to set up their populace law, their will, against the Government of this country; presuming to come and dictate to the Congress of the United States, "you shall do this or we will fight; you shall give us this Topeka constitution, or there shall be blood shed!" Miserable, miserable, indeed, would be our dereliction from duty; despicable, indeed, would fall the Congress of the United States if it grounded arms and bowed in submission to the insurgent violence of these traitors. Every law that has been passed for their protection has been scorned by them. Every attempt to give them full and adequate maintenance of their rights, has been repudiated. Now, again, the attempt is made to make us do what they please, to sacrifice all rights to their threats of violence, and we are again told, upon this floor, where a cheap display of valor is made, that they will be cowards if they do not fight for their rights; and some Senators even insinuate an intention of going to help them. Mr. President, the day of that fight will never come, and the vaunt coats nothing.

The territorial legislation has gone into effect in the absence of congressional legislation, which they refused. All the forms of law, which gentlemen around me so deride, but which I respect, have been observed, and the last and sole question that remains for us, is, shall Kansas still be "bleeding Kansas?" shall she still continue to display her wrongs and to cry aloud to the people of the land during another presidential canvass? or shall that noise be hushed forever? That is the sole question, sir. The object is to keep up the excitement for another canvass. We say to these men, you shall not do it. Their object is to keep the people of this country constantly inflamed and excited. They shall not succeed in it. And now, now the great wrong and outrage that is to be done to this community is to admit her as a State into the Confederacy! Great heavens, they are crying all around us, "what an outrage, what an outrage!" The history of the world has never seen anything like this.

This outrage, this horrible wrong, consists in admitting them into the Union! That is all, all. Who is to organize this State government? Who is to administer it? Who will have supreme power over it, uncontrolled by congressional intervention, uncontrolled by the Federal bayonet? The people of Kansas; none but the people of Kansas. What a foul wrong it is to give them sole control of their own affairs! The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] would have us believe that this is an abandonment of the principle of popular sovereignty. Mr. President, it is its very essence; it is carrying out its true intent and meaning. Let any man here tell me what higher, what more exalted example can be afforded of the right of a people to govern its own institutions, than that which is given by the people of a sovereign State of this Confederacy. That is the right we now want to bestow upon Kansas. That is the legitimate fruit of the Kansas bill. That is the act now before us. For that act I will vote.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. WADE addressed the Chair. ["Adjourn." "Go on."]

The VICE PRESIDENT recognized Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Michigan yield me the floor?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Senators ought to recollect that the Senator from Michigan is about to make his first speech in the Senate, and it is not usual to force a Senator to proceed at this late hour of the day; I move therefore that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It seems to me strange that Senators should undertake to act thus.

Mr. BROWN. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call for the yeas and nays. I do not think it right that the Senate should now adjourn. We are too close to the time of taking the final vote to adjourn thus early.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Harlan, Houston, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sliedell, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—19.

And thereupon the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. L. D. FINCKEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] was entitled to the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 307) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to introduce for reference only two sets of resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Texas.

Mr. STANTON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas relating to Indians west of the Pecos river; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, asking the establishment of a military post and relating to Indians in Texas; referred in part to the Committee on Military Affairs, and in part to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILL TO RAISE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, it is, perhaps, my duty to state to the House my reasons for opposing the propositions of both the majority and minority of that committee. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] referred to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNINTON] and myself, when he said that the proposition of the majority of the committee received votes in the committee which it will not receive in the House, I have only to say in reply that he is entirely mistaken. If he will take the trouble to turn to the minutes of the committee, he will find our names recorded, with his own, against the bill reported by the chairman of the committee from the majority. It is true that we voted for volunteers in preference to regulars, but we also voted against any increase whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is precisely what I stated. I said that you would be found opposed to both bills; that although you voted for the bill proposed by the chairman in committee, you would oppose it here.

Mr. STANTON. I voted against the volunteer proposition in the committee; against reporting the bill; and my record here will be precisely what it was in committee. Can the gentleman from Virginia say as much?

I desire to say in the outset that, if it is the pleasure of Congress to make any addition to the present military force of the country, I have a very strong and decided preference for the plan reported by the chairman of the committee [Mr. QUITMAN] from the majority, over that reported by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] from the minority of the committee.

In the first place, if it can be claimed that any increase of the military force of the country is required, it can only arise out of the disturbances in Utah, which I think it may be safely assumed may be settled in a single campaign; and hence the increase should only be temporary.

In the next place, regular troops who enlist permanently in the service as a refuge from starvation, will consist mainly of the refuse population of your cities and large towns, who have no knowledge of border life or border warfare, and will therefore be peculiarly unfit for the service which will be required of them. On the other hand, if volunteers are called into the service, they will be taken mainly from the border States, accustomed to border life and border warfare, and therefore peculiarly fitted for that kind of service.

But there is a still stronger reason for my preference of the proposition of the chairman of the committee. By his bill, the volunteers are to be raised and officered according to the laws of the States from which they come. It gives the President the appointment of no officer, from a colonel to a corporal. By the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, the officers are all to be appointed by the President, and will amount to about one hundred and eighty-five in number. I am at all times opposed to any increase of Executive patronage. I am especially opposed to it at this time, because I have no confidence in the President, and believe that any patronage we may confer upon him will be prostituted to base and unworthy purposes. I may add that the bill reported by the majority has been well considered by the committee, and will be found well adapted to the object which it proposes to accomplish.

But I am opposed to any increase of the military force of the country, either permanent or temporary, because I do not believe the exigencies of the service require it. The power to "raise and support armies" is vested in Congress. Congress, therefore, is responsible, not only for the unnecessary expenditure which will be required for the support of the increased force, but for the improper and unauthorized use which may be made of them by the President, under whose command they are to be placed. It is our duty, therefore, carefully to scrutinize the exigencies of the service, that we may be able to judge whether any increase is required.

The Army now consists, in round numbers, of eighteen thousand men. That is, the President is authorized by existing laws to call that number of men into the service. The question before us, therefore, is, whether the public service required a larger number? I confess myself wholly at a loss to imagine what purpose of safety or utility can require a larger force. It seems to be generally conceded that eight thousand men is all that will be necessary, and, indeed, all that can be advantageously employed in the Utah expedition, even if it is designed to exterminate the whole population. Indeed, I do not understand it to be denied that if the two thousand five hundred troops in Kansas were employed in the Utah expedition that they would be sufficient for the next campaign upon the plan adopted or contemplated by the War Department. The question would therefore seem to resolve itself into this: whether Congress will furnish the President with a military force to aid him in establishing slavery in Kansas?

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] says that this is not a party question, and that he does not wish to urge considerations of a party character in the discussion of it. Mr. Speaker, you and the House will bear me witness that I am not in the habit of appealing to party prejudices, or urging arguments of a party or sectional character, when they do not legitimately belong to the subject under consideration. But I am not so fastidious as to withhold a legitimate and proper argument which, in my judgment, ought to be conclusive upon the question under consideration, because it may have a sectional or party application. I believe this whole movement for the increase of the Army is essentially a sectional and party measure. This Administration has staked its very existence upon the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and the permanent establishment of slavery there. To secure the admission of Kansas, it is very important to secure the additional patronage which these regiments would give to the President. The troops themselves are indispensable to the establishment and maintenance of slavery there. I think I understand the secret counsels which control the Executive in this movement.

Kansas is to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, if party discipline and Executive patronage can accomplish it. Calhoun is then, in the face of the most infamous frauds, to issue certificates of election to the pro-slavery State and legislative tickets. And no man in the nation knows better than the President that, when this is done, the State government cannot be organized in Kansas under these officers without United States troops. That they cannot enter the Territory, except, as was well said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES] the other day, in a hollow square of United States troops. In this state of things, Calhoun's bogus Governor will represent that there is an insurrection in Kansas too powerful to be overcome by the militia of the State; that the Legislature cannot be convened; and that he wants United States troops to suppress the insurrection and execute the laws. The President will insist that it is his duty to guaranty to every State a Republican form of government, and protect it "against domestic violence." And these troops are asked for to carry out this interesting programme. And in this aspect of the case, I do not see that it is much difference whether we give him regular troops, or give him volunteers, for the Utah expedition, so as to enable him to use the troops now in the service in Kansas. If he gets either, he will get them without my vote.

Believing this to be the real issue, I am not to be frightened from my propriety by any apprehensions of danger to the troops now engaged in the Utah expedition.

If the President chooses to expose these troops to destruction by keeping in Kansas, for the purpose of accomplishing his own unhallowed purposes, a sufficient body of troops to protect and save their comrades in Utah, I am willing to let the country judge whether Congress or the President is justly responsible for whatever calamities may befall them.

But every sensible man in the country knows that no force that can be raised under this bill, whether volunteers or regulars, can be organized and marched to the scene of operations until the fate of the troops now engaged in that expedition shall have been definitively settled. The idea, therefore, of passing this bill with the view of raising troops under it, for the relief of the troops now engaged in that expedition, is a sheer delusion. If there was really a necessity for additional troops to quell the disturbances in Utah, it would be the duty of Congress, before granting them, to inquire into the causes of the disturbances, that we might judge whether the sword was the only proper remedy for the evils complained of. But, as there are other reasons which satisfy me that there is no necessity for any increased force, I do not propose to go into that question.

There is another view of this question, which to my mind is equally conclusive, and vastly more important than any that I have yet alluded to. For some seven or eight years past the President has claimed and exercised the power of using the regular Army as a police, to aid the civil officers in the execution of process, in arresting fugitives from justice, in capturing runaway slaves, in suppressing riots and partial and temporary insurrections, in guarding the polls, in preserving the peace at elections, and in performing the various duties of a civil posse or a municipal police.

Thus the Army and Navy were used to aid in the arrest of Anthony Burns, in Boston; to aid the bogus authorities of the Territory of Kansas in executing process in execution of the bogus laws of that Territory; to disperse the Legislature elected by the people of that Territory; to overawe the people of Lawrence, and prevent them from adopting municipal regulations for the government of the town, in surrounding the polls and controlling the election, not only in that Territory, but in this District, and under the very shadow of this Capitol.

We may differ in opinion as to the wisdom and expediency of using the troops upon any or all of the occasions I have enumerated; but I deny the power to use them for these or any similar purpose. Some gentlemen may think the use of the troops in Boston and in Kansas all very proper, who may entertain an entirely different opinion of the use of them in this city. For myself, I see no difference. I think the use of the marines in aid of the Mayor and municipal authorities of this city, (who had the whole police force of the city at their command,) and shooting down peaceful and inoffensive citizens in the streets as though they were so many dogs, has no parallel in the history of this country, except in the still more atrocious outrages that have been committed against the people of Kansas.

But it is not now my purpose to inquire into the necessity for the interference of the Executive in the cases referred to. I refer to them for the purpose of showing the importance of examining carefully the power which was claimed and exercised in these cases.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. While engaged in efforts to execute the fugitive slave law, was he not engaged in executing the law of the land?

Mr. STANTON. That is just the question I am discussing. I hold that he had no right to use them in executing the laws of the land. I am not very particular about terms. I am not certain that the fugitive slave law is a constitutional law of the land. But if it is proper for him to use the regular Army in executing the law of the land, then it is proper for him to use it in executing that law.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him, I desire to know if the party with which the gentleman is acting did not, during the last Congress, denounce the President for not sending an army to Kansas, when our side was in power there?

Mr. STANTON. It is most unquestionably true that the Republican party, in the last Congress, did insist that it was the duty of the President to send the regular Army to Kansas; but that was for the purpose of preventing an invasion of a neighboring State. But, sir, they never asked for an army to be sent to the Territory of Kansas for the purpose of protecting the people there against their own citizens, or to execute the laws. And I contend now that it is the duty of the President to use the regular Army to protect every portion of the Confederacy against invasion.

I desire to lay down the constitutional proposition which I submit, in definite and explicit terms, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

I claim that the President has no power to use the standing Army, or any part of the regular military force of the country, except in open, public war, either foreign or domestic, or to repel invasion. That they can in no case be used as a posse to aid the civil authorities in the execution of the laws, nor to act as a police force for the preservation of the public peace, nor to quell riot, disturbances, or insurrections, not amounting to open and organized rebellion.

At the foundation of every argument on the constitutional power of any department or officer of the Government, lies the proposition, that this Government is a Government of delegated powers, having such powers as are specifically granted by the Constitution, and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry into execution the powers that are expressly granted, and no others. From what part of the Constitution does the President derive the powers that are claimed for him? By article two, section two, of the Constitution, he is made the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. By article two, section three, he is required to see that "the laws are faithfully executed." These are the only provisions of the Constitution granting power over the Army to the President. The power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army depends upon the state of the country, whether we are at war with any foreign nation, or rebellious State or Territory, or at peace with all the world.

When war has been declared by Congress, the President has the absolute control of the Army, and, if public safety require it, may declare martial law and suspend the writ of habeas corpus within such places, and subject to such limitations, as the public safety may require; may compel citizens to enter the military service against their will; appropriate private property to public use, and exercise various other oppressive and despotic powers. But the moment peace is restored, there is instantly an end of all this. The laws resume their sway, and the power of the President to commit acts of hostility upon anybody, except in repelling an invasion, is at once extinguished. He has no power in time of peace to "make war," either upon a foreign nation, or any portion of the American people. He may control the location of the troops, and keep them so posted as to meet the exigencies of the service in any anticipated war or invasion that he may have reason to apprehend. He may exercise such discretion as may be conferred upon him by Congress in increasing or diminishing the rank and file of the Army, &c. But this is the end of his powers over the Army in time of peace, as Commander-in-Chief.

I presume, however, it will hardly be claimed that he may, in his capacity, or by virtue of his authority as Commander-in-Chief, use the Army in aid of the civil authorities in executing process, or in the preservation of the public peace. This is supposed to result from the duty which is enjoined upon him to "see that the laws be faithfully executed." This grant of power is supposed to carry with it the power to use all the means necessary to enforce their execution. There would certainly be great plausibility in this, if the means which he might use were not specifically enumerated and pointed out in another provision of the Constitution.

But the Constitution expressly requires Congress to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws. And it is a well-settled rule of construction, that when the mode of executing a given power is prescribed, it excludes the use of any other mode. If the law requires the execution of the sentence of death upon a person convicted of a capital crime, by hanging, the sheriff may not shoot him, although the party convicted may desire it. If he depart from the mode of execution prescribed by the law, he is guilty of murder.

Now take these two clauses of the Constitution together, and what is their plain, common-sense construction? He shall see that "the laws be faithfully executed." To that end, he shall require his subordinates, who are immediately charged with the execution of the laws, to perform their duties with fidelity and in good faith; and if they are resisted by combinations or associations of persons too powerful to be overcome by the officer and such force as he may be able to command, then the President shall call forth the militia. This is certainly the plain, natural import of these two provisions of the Constitution, when taken together and construed with reference to their subject-matter. It is also worthy of remark in this connection, that while Congress is authorized to organize, arm, and discipline the militia, the officers are to be appointed, and the militia trained by the States.

The subject of the power of calling forth the militia to execute the laws was very much discussed in the Virginia convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States. It was said, by the opponents of the Constitution, that it armed the President with a despotic power which was capable of being greatly abused. In reply, it was said that the militia was taken from the body of the people; was identified with them in interest and in feeling, and therefore could not be used as instruments of despotism to oppress the people. Nobody, then, seemed to have imagined that the Army could be used to execute the laws.

Mr. Madison, in reply to an argument of Mr. Henry, says:

"The constitution does not say that a standing army shall be called out to execute the laws.

"Is not this (calling the militia) the more proper way? The militia ought to be called forth to suppress smugglers. Will this be denied? The case actually happened at Alexandria. There were a number of smugglers who were too formidable for the civil power to overcome. Should a number of smugglers have a number of ships, the militia ought to be called forth to quell them."—Elliott's Debates, vol. 2, p. 309.

Mr. Nicholas urges the necessity of giving the power to call out the militia on the express ground that it will save the necessity of giving power to use the standing Army. (Elliott's Debates, vol. 2, p. 218.)

The legislation of Congress, and the acts of the Executive during the administrations of Washington and the elder Adams, were in strict conformity to this construction of the Constitution.

The first law that was passed on this subject, was in 1793, on account of the Whisky Insurrection in western Pennsylvania. It followed closely the language of the Constitution, and gave no power to call any force into the service, for the purpose of executing the laws or suppressing insurrection, except the militia. This law expired by its own limitation in 1795, and was then reenacted in substantially the same terms.

In 1807 a law, containing but a single section of half a dozen lines, was passed, authorizing the President, in all cases where he was authorized by law to call out the militia to execute the laws or suppress insurrection, to call out the regular troops. This is doubtless the origin of the power which has been exercised so freely of late years, of using the troops as a posse to aid civil officers in the execution of process. I have no doubt, in my own mind, that this law is unconstitutional, and ought to be repealed at once, that it may no longer be used as a cloak for further usurpation. Public opinion ought at once to be aroused to the magnitude of this question. If a standing army of mercenary troops, whose officers are appointed by the President, are to be recognized as a proper and legitimate police force to aid in the execution of the laws, suppress riots, and keep the peace at the polls on election days, in the States and Territories of the United States, it is time the people knew it.

The rank and file of the regular Army is made up mainly of the lowest class of foreign emigrants, and such native-born citizens as are found about the purlieus of your cities and large towns, who have become so depraved in their habits and character that they are no longer able or willing to procure a livelihood by honest labor. Destitute of family or friends; they have no feelings or sympathies in common with the people at large. Such an Army, so constituted, looking to the President as the fountain of patronage and promotion, is well fitted to become the blind instrument of despotism. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] truly remarked, regular soldiers are mere machines, moved by the hand of superior intelligence. But the militia is composed of the whole body of the people; and such portions of them as may be called into the service when an exigency arises, will sympathize with their neighbors, and will be commanded by officers elected by themselves, who will have no patronage or promotion to expect from the President, and will not be used as instruments to promote the ambitious schemes or purposes of the President.

But the idea of requiring the Army to follow the heels of the sheriff as a posse comitatus to aid in the arrest of thieves and smugglers, is a total perversion of the first principles of civil government. The posse comitatus, as the term imports, means simply the "power," or people, of the county who are within the jurisdiction and bound to obey the commands of the sheriff. He cannot go out outside of his bailiwick to command the services of a single citizen of an adjoining county. But this idea of using the Army authorizes persons who may have been mustered into the service in Maine, to be called upon to act as a posse comitatus to aid in the execution of the laws in California or Texas. This is "intervention" with a vengeance. The people will not long submit to the idea of having strangers and foreigners brought from distant States to compel submission to laws which they may regard as odious and oppressive, at the point of the bayonet.

The people of this country are very deeply impressed with the conviction that they are capable of governing themselves, and will resist to the utmost all attempts to govern them by mercenary soldiers from distant States.

I insist upon it, that the Constitution does not tolerate any such thing; and that we are not at the mercy of the President in this particular.

It is the constitutional right of the people, when the laws are resisted, to be called upon to execute them themselves, and not to be subjected to the tender mercies of a mercenary soldiery whenever it may suit the sovereign will and pleasure of the President of the United States. Suppose the militia of the District of Columbia had been called upon to keep the peace, at the last municipal election in this city. Does anybody believe that a dozen of the peaceable and inoffensive citizens of this city would have been shot down in cold blood? And does anybody doubt that the peace would have been as well kept, and that the people would have been as well protected in the exercise of the right of suffrage? Very grave and serious questions may grow out of that and similar transactions. Suppose the officer in command of these marines should be indicted for murder, and the court should hold, as I have no doubt it should do, that the President had no right, no power, to give the order under which they acted? Could he escape a conviction? It is true that the President, who gave the order, would undoubtedly grant him a pardon. But it is possible that a President may one day be in power who will be of a different opinion from the one who gave the order.

But what ought to be done with a President who would give an order that would expose his subordinate to such consequences? That question I leave for the country to answer. It is not only dangerous to the country, but disgraceful to the Army to employ it in any such service as this. Officers of the Army must feel themselves degraded, by requiring them to follow the heels of a constable with their companies or regiments to aid in capturing thieves and smugglers. How would the gentleman from Mississippi like to have that laurel crown which he has earned so richly, and wears so gracefully, interspersed with such herbage as he would gather by following with his brigade at the heels of policemen and making an onslaught upon a nest of pickpockets or counterfeiters?

I insist upon it, therefore, that for the honor of the service, if for no other reason, this practice ought to be abolished. If I am right in supposing that the President has no right to use the regular Army to aid in the execution of the laws, or to suppress an insurrection which does not amount to an open organized rebellion, it follows that the troops which are proposed to be raised by the bill of the gentleman from Virginia cannot be used in the Utah service, unless we first declare that Territory to be in a state of rebellion. This I do not understand that his bill proposes to do.

Mr. CURTIS. The Governor of the Territory, in his message to the Legislature, speaks of the time when peace shall be restored, and the Legislature also speaks of the time when peace shall be restored. I therefore reply that they regard themselves in a state of war.

Mr. STANTON. That may be so; and there may be very good reason why Congress should declare them in rebellion. But I deny that the Executive has any power to declare any portion of the country in rebellion, or to make a declaration of war against it without the authority of Congress. No, sir; the idea of the gentleman from Iowa, that there may be a rebellion without the authority of Congress, is utterly subversive of all the distinctions provided by Congress between the powers of the different departments of this Government. There may or there may not be occasion for declaring that Territory in rebellion; and I do not care, for the purpose of my argument, whether there is or is not. All I say is, that that has not yet been done. Whether the forces proposed to be raised by the bill reported by the chairman of the Military Committee can be used in that service, depends upon the question whether they are regular troops or militia, within the meaning of the Constitution. The chairman of the committee is certainly correct in saying that they are not strictly either the one or the other. But the Constitution only recognizes two kinds of military forces—regulars and militia. But it recognizes more than one kind of militia; it recognizes State and United States militia. State militia, in the common acceptation of the term, means the whole body of the people, who are enrolled as militia under the laws of the State, and are liable to be called to perform military duty. Certainly the forces provided for in the bill reported by the Military Committee are not "militia" in this sense of the term. But they are required to be organized by States in separate and distinct corps; and their officers are to be appointed according to the laws of the States from which they come. After they are mustered into the service, they will still be recognized and known as troops of the State from which they come, called into the service of the United States. By the Constitution of the United States, the States can have no troops, or military force of any kind, except militia.

I think, therefore, that these troops will come within the constitutional meaning of the term militia. It will be recollected that the Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be called into the service of the United States, reserving to the States the power to appoint their officers, &c. I think the troops here provided for will be raised under the power granted by this provision of the Constitution.

I certainly mean no disparagement of this kind of force, by calling them militia; for I certainly regard them as the most effective and desirable troops of any that can be provided for—certainly in every way preferable to regular troops, except in the mere matter of military drill and discipline. It will, therefore, in my opinion, be competent to use the forces to be raised under this bill in quelling the disturbances, or suppressing the insurrection, or whatever you may call it, in Utah, without declaring the Territory in rebellion. But, believing the present military force of the country is quite as large as is necessary for all the purposes for which the President is authorized to use the regular Army, I must vote against any increase whatever.

Mr. PENDLETON obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield me the floor, that I may move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will proceed with his remarks now; otherwise we will not get through this bill for a week.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should be very glad, indeed, to yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but those who are around me, and who feel an interest in the bill now under discussion, seem to indicate to me that it is proper for me to go on with what I have to say.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not wish to take the floor from the gentleman from Ohio, but I wish to suggest to him, that within ten minutes from this time the morning hour will have expired, and I will then be obliged to ask to go to the business on the Speaker's table. I do not wish to interrupt him in ten minutes, and I would say that it is for the gentleman's benefit to yield the floor now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be entitled to move to go to the business on the Speaker's table, but it will depend on a vote of the House whether the House will pass from the Army bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. If that is the case, I will give way.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Before that question is put, I wish to submit a question of privilege to the House. The question to which I wish to call the attention of the House is connected with the action of the special committee appointed by order of the House on the 8th of February last. Myself and six others, members of that committee—

Mr. LETCHER. Is that a question of privilege?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Virginia will wait till he hears the statement, it will be then time enough for him to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the statement of the gentleman from Illinois far enough at least to ascertain whether there is a question of privilege involved or not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Myself and those who act with me on that committee—seven members in all—feel it due to ourselves and to the House under whose order the committee was appointed, to present facts to the House sustaining the view which they entertain, that the committee has failed to execute the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that does not involve a question of privilege.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have not yet presented the question fully, unless the Chair wishes to decide it before presented. I desire to state, in behalf of myself and Messrs. ADRIN, MORRILL, WADE, BENNETT, WALBRIDGE, and BUFFINTON, of the select committee, appointed under the order of the House of Representatives of the 8th of February last, to whom was referred the President's message concerning the Lecompton constitution with instructions, that in their opinion said committee had failed and refused to execute the order of the House contained in the resolution for their appointment, and has adjourned sine die; and in proof thereof I propose, as a question of privilege, to read the journals and minutes of said committee, and a written statement relating thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the question that no privilege can be involved from the statement of facts submitted by the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the facts turn out to be as stated, does the Chair decide that that does not involve a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair undertakes to decide this point: that no report of facts can emanate from the minority of a committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. With deference to the Chair, I wish to present my statement, that there may be no misapprehension of it either on my own part, or on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order.

The Chair has decided that this is not a question of privilege, and the gentleman's remarks are not in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The point which I wish to present to the House is this: that the select committee has not discharged its duty or executed the order of the House; and that I claim to be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois on two grounds. In the first instance, there is no such thing known to parliamentary law, or to practice, as a report from a minority of a committee. It has been usual in the practice of this and other deliberative bodies to receive the views of a minority of a committee, but it is a matter of courtesy, and not of right; and secondly, the majority have submitted no report, and the House cannot, therefore, know whether its order has been obeyed or not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. With the permission of the Chair, I wish to say that this is not a report from a minority. It is simply a statement of facts on which to present a question of privilege to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that, in that aspect of the case, the gentleman cannot present this as a question of privilege, inasmuch as no report has been submitted from the committee appointed in the matter, and inasmuch, therefore, as the House can have no official information of what that committee has done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I would inquire of the Chair whether it is not the practice to submit to the House whether it be a question of privilege or not?

The SPEAKER. That is sometimes done, and at other times is not done. The gentleman from Illinois will recollect that the first question of privilege raised during the present session was decided by the Chair, because it was clearly a question of privilege. On two subsequent occasions, when there was doubt in the mind of the Chair, the Chair referred the question to the House for decision. The Chair has no doubt on the present question, and decides it for himself, giving the gentleman from Illinois, as a matter of course, the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do appeal from the decision of the Chair; and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to lay the appeal on the table; and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the Chair hold that it is not a privilege of the House that its committees shall obey the instructions of the House?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the decision of the House. If it shall appear from the report of the committee that the committee has not obeyed the order of the House, it is competent for the House to recommit to the committee, to discharge the committee, or to censure the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the Chair, then, hold that a minority of a committee, or a single member of the House, cannot bring the question before the House that the majority has been guilty of malfeasance of duty, or disregard of the orders of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair undertakes to decide—and the gentleman from Maine knows it as well as the Chair—that, according to parliamentary law, no report can emanate from a committee, except that from a majority of the committee. As the Chair has stated, it is the practice of the House to receive the views of the minority of a committee. That is done by courtesy, but not as a matter of right.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it in order at this time for the majority of that committee to report?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move a call of the House; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 99, nays 108; as follows:

WASHBURN, ISRAEL WASHBURN, WILSON, and WOOD—108.

So the House refused a call of the House.

Pending the vote,

Mr. LETCHER stated that his colleague, Mr. GARNETT, had been called from the city on public business, and had paired off with Mr. MORSE, of New York.

Mr. MILES stated that his colleague, Mr. KEITT, had paired off with Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE.

Mr. REILLY stated that his colleague, Mr. LEIDY, was confined to his room by sickness.

The question recurred on Mr. STEPHENS's motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 97, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ANDERSON, ARNOLD, ATKINS, AVERY, BARKSDALE, BOECK, BONHAM, BOYCE, BRYAN, BURNETT, CASKIE, JOHN B. CLARK, CLAY, CLEMENS, CLINGMAN, COBB, JOHN COCHRANE, CORNING, JAMES CRAIG, BURTON CRAIG, CRAWFORD, CURRY, DAVIDSON, DAVIS OF MISSISSIPPI, DIMMICK, DOWDELL, EDMUNDSON, ELLIOTT, FAULKNER, FLORENCE, GARTRELL, GILMER, GOODE, GREENWOOD, GREGG, HATCH, HAWKINS, HILL, HOPKINS, HUGHES, HUYLER, JACKSON, JENKINS, GEORGE W. WASHBURN, ELIHU B. WASHBURN, ISRAEL WASHBURN, WILSON, and WOOD—112.

So the appeal was not laid on the table.

Pending the motion,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that his colleague, Mr. SANDIDGE, was detained at his lodgings by sickness.

Mr. COX stated that his colleague, Mr. HALL, was detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. TRIPPE asked to be excused from voting, on the ground that he had not been in the Hall, and did not understand the question.

Objection was made.

Mr. TRIPPE. Well, I vote "Ay."

Mr. WINSLOW, (at four minutes before two o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that I call for the yeas and nays. I make the motion merely to allow time for absent members to come in, and to secure a full House on the vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 129; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—129.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. EDIE stated that he had paired off on all questions, till Monday at twelve o'clock, with the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Moore.]

The question then recurred upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This matter involves a very important question of parliamentary law, upon which I should like to consult the books. I move that this question be postponed till to-morrow at one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no sort of objection to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, if, as I suggested yesterday, the House will allow the majority of the committee to make their report. Then set down the consideration of the subject for to-morrow, or any day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] pleases, when the subject will legitimately come up; and it may be recommended to the committee, or the committee may be discharged from its consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia is willing that this question shall be postponed until to-morrow, provided the report which he says he offered to present yesterday shall be allowed to come before the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. Is this motion of the gentleman from Kentucky debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is debatable to a limited extent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Has the gentleman from Indiana the right to take the floor from me? That gentleman is prolific in questions of order. I say the gentleman from Georgia is willing this question shall be postponed until to-morrow, provided the House will give its unanimous consent to the reception of the report which he yesterday asked to leave to make. So far as the propriety of having that report go with the proposition which I make is concerned, I shall not object to it. It then comes in as a part of the minutes and proceedings of the committee, which I proposed to read to the House. I think it may very properly be embodied as a part of the minutes and proceedings of that committee.

Mr. SEWARD. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to postpone.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I find that report published in the Union of this morning. By what authority that was done I shall not now undertake to discuss. It is a most singular proceeding that this report should have thus gone before the country without the authority of the House, and in contravention of the rule of the House. It is in keeping with the whole proceeding on this question. But, sir, the report, as published and printed here, I believe is the same as that read to the committee and adopted by them. I have no objection whatever to its being embodied in the minutes of the proceedings of the committee, as I now desire to present them, and have the whole printed by the House, and postponed until some given day for consideration. But, sir, I am not willing to accede to the proposition of the gentleman that his report shall be received as the report of the committee for the action of the House, when I stand here as the representative of six other colleagues on that committee, who unite with me in declaring that the committee, in their action, have not executed the order of the House. We deny that a report can properly emanate from that committee until it has executed the functions which were imposed upon it by the House. I am unwilling, therefore, and I will not consent, that their report shall come before the House as the report of the committee. I am, however, willing, as I have said, that the report which was read to the committee and adopted by them shall go into the minutes of the proceedings of the committee and be printed with them, so that the House may see and judge to what extent the committee has executed the order under which it was raised. The gentleman from Georgia, by that means, will accomplish his purpose of getting his report printed, which he desired yesterday to have done.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois is not discussing the question of postponement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Illinois will confine his remarks to the question of postponement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am peculiarly unfortunate in being interrupted. When the gentleman from Georgia rose to submit his report, which had nothing to do with the question of privilege which I had presented, there was no objection, no interruption of points of order; but when I attempt to speak in reply, I am interrupted at least three times in four minutes. It is still in keeping with the whole proceedings, from the beginning to the end of the Kansas question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois is hardly in order. The gentleman from Georgia has the right to submit a point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. If this whole question is to be opened to debate on both sides, I withdraw all objection.

The SPEAKER. On the motion to postpone, a general discussion of the question is not in order. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will confine themselves to the question of postponement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will endeavor to confine myself to the question of postponement. The gentleman from Georgia stated that he did not object to the postponement proposed, provided he should have an opportunity of presenting his report. I have endeavored to confine my remarks to the question of the propriety of his presenting that report as the report of the committee. I will say again that I presume there is no gentleman in the House who will object to having that report go as a part of the minutes of the proceedings of the committee. Let it be printed, and go before the country.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is just this: to deny to the majority of a committee, appointed by this House in pursuance of its own resolution, to make this report, and to give to a minority of the committee that right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia must confine himself strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am confining myself strictly to a reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman from Illinois were objected to as not in order. The Chair feels it to be his duty to insist that gentlemen must confine their remarks to the question under consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I believe all objection was waived. But, sir, I do not wish to detain the House, and will confine myself strictly to the merits of the motion pending. The object of the gentleman from Illinois is, that the report of the majority shall never be brought before the House. He says he will allow me to put it upon the minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me a minute: he says it is my object that the report of the majority shall never come before the House. I deny that such is my purpose. I said this: that if the House shall determine, from the records which I propose to place before it, that the committee has executed the order of the House, then I shall not object at all to the report being made.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is a question which the House can judge of when their own committee have made their report. That is what I said just now; and what I said yesterday. According to parliamentary law, a majority of a committee constituted by the House certainly have the right, in due time and order, to present their views in response to the instructions of the House. I am, therefore, willing to pursue that course. Let the majority make their report, and if, in the opinion of the House, the majority have failed to execute the order of the House, let the report be recommitted, or the committee discharged, or the committee enlarged. Let gentlemen then take such course as they please.

But, as I stated and I must repeat, as I understand the motion of the gentleman, it raises this extraordinary question of privilege—the privilege of a minority of a committee to come into the House, and to say that the majority have not discharged their duty. Ransack parliamentary law, from the beginning of the British Parliament, and the like of it cannot be found. No such motion, no such precedent, I venture to say, from the foundation of the British Parliament, can be found either in England or in this country.

I cannot discuss the merits of this matter under this motion; but I was anxious yesterday, and I repeat it now, that the majority of the committee should be permitted, by general consent of the House—as was the case last Congress with the Kansas investigating committee, and as is usual in all such cases—that they may present their report, and then the question will come up. Let us make our report; let the question then be postponed until to-morrow, or the next day, or any other day the gentleman may desire, and then the whole question will be before the House as to whether the committee have discharged their duty or not.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to correct the statement of the gentleman from Georgia. The report of the Kansas investigating committee was presented, and strenuously objected to upon the other side of the House; and it was only admitted as a question of privilege as affecting the right of a Delegate to a seat upon this floor. The objection was strenuous, and the report was only admitted after a vote on the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I recollect very well that the report was received, and that there was an understanding that the minority should have ten days to prepare and present a minority report; and that then the majority and minority reports should go together and be printed. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia, in reply to remarks made by me, has undertaken to denounce the proposition which I introduced this morning as one unheard of in parliamentary proceedings; that you might ransack the whole parliamentary law and find no precedent for it. I think the gentleman will find himself mistaken, when he comes to examine this question; and if there were not a particle of law upon the question, a common-sense view of the matter would make a law for the occasion. I think the gentleman will find law sufficient to justify any member of the committee, or any member of the House, on any occasion, whenever he sees fit, to rise in his place and bring to the knowledge of the House that its order upon any subject whatever has not been obeyed. If the question is postponed until to-morrow, I will present the law on this point, which I think will satisfy the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois how it is possible for this House to hear from the committee until they receive the report? It seems to me that the gentleman from Georgia is perfectly right, and that the House cannot move in the matter in order, until they have received the report of the committee; and upon that—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he has indulged the gentlemen from Illinois and Georgia in remarks not strictly in order. The Chair feels it to be his duty to confine any further remarks strictly to the pending motion. If the House does not choose to postpone, the general subject will be in order; but so long as the pending proposition is a motion to postpone, all remarks must be confined strictly to the propriety of postponing.

Mr. QUITMAN. Does the Speaker intend to intimate that my remarks are not in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi are not strictly pertinent to the pending proposition; which is a motion to postpone the consideration of the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. QUITMAN. At the proper time I can repel the intimation thrown out in reference to a settled purpose and design to suppress any investigation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. My friend from Mississippi will pardon me, I know, for saying that no imputation has ever been cast by me, of any settled design to suppress anything, or to do any improper act. I have a high regard for the gentleman as a man, and a high regard for the members of the committee, and I hope there will no idea remain lingering in the mind of any gentleman that any such imputation was intended. A question of opinion, as to whether a gentleman has discharged the duties imposed upon him, and an imputation of a settled purpose to suppress anything, are quite different things.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. If the House should receive the report, would it discharge the committee?

The SPEAKER. This being a special committee, the Chair is of the opinion that the reception of the report would discharge the committee.

Mr. SICKLES. But would it not be in order to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. The House could then recommit it, of course, if a majority were in favor of that course.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay the pending motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move to lay upon the table a motion to postpone.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, to postpone until to-morrow; and it was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for paper, printing, binding, and engraving ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed; whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

The question then occurred on the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FLORENCE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the debate was closed upon the pending bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I presume the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASE] is entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed upon this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do not propose to debate the bill, but I desire to know if the gentleman from Indiana will not be entitled to the floor when the next bill is taken up?

The CHAIRMAN. If the present occupant of the chair still occupies it when another bill comes up, he will decide that question when it arises. The Chair, however, thinks it due to the gentleman from Ohio to say, that he would feel it to be his duty to accord the floor to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That is all I desire. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that he is not governed by the censure attempted to be cast upon him yesterday by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.] The Chair has made no bargains to farm out the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise for the purpose of interposing an objection to the Chairman saying, in advance, who shall be entitled to the floor. I have a few remarks which I desire to submit, and I must object to any violation of the parliamentary rule, by intimations from the Chairman that he intends to give the floor to a particular gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to exercise all the judgment he can in assigning the floor.

The bill was then read by clauses for amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to amend the bill by striking out the following clause:

"For compensation of the commissioner provided in the first article of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the following as a substitute for the clause just stricken out. The estimate for this item was not furnished until after the bill was printed. My amendment is as follows:

For compensation and per diem of the commissioners, compensation of the surveyor, and for the payment of all expenses of the commission under the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, $23,000.

I will merely say, in relation to that amendment, that an appropriation of $2,000 was put in the bill for this purpose before the estimate had been made. Subsequently the estimate came from the State Department, and it will require the whole amount proposed in the amendment for the next year, although a portion of the balance now in hand will go back into the Treasury, under the law providing for reversions to the surplus fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid out of the Treasury for any expenses which accrued, or shall accrue, before the commencement, or after the termination of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1853; and so much of the act approved August 26, 1843, as authorizes the surplus of an appropriation to be applied to supply any deficiency of any other item in the same department or office, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I trust the amendment will meet with the general consent of the committee. It is intended to correct certain abuses which have grown up in the application of appropriations.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. GROW. I submit that the amendment is in order. It merely proposes to limit the appropriations contained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken, as the amendment proposes to repeal an existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. To avoid any question of order, I will modify my amendment so as only to embrace the first clause of it.

My purpose in offering this amendment is to correct certain gross abuses that have arisen in some of the Executive Departments. These abuses have all grown out of a law passed in the second session of the Twenty-Seventh Congress, when Mr. Fillmore was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He ingrafted on the general appropriation bill the following section:

"SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That in case the sum appropriated for any object shall be found more than sufficient to meet the expense thereby contemplated, the surplus may be applied, under the directions of the head of the proper Department, to supply the deficiency of any other item in the same Department or office."

The construction given by the Departments to this section was that, where a fund was specially appropriated in an appropriation bill and any of it remained unexpended, the balance of the fund might be applied to any other purpose, or to supply deficiencies in any other item in that Department of the public service, and for any other year. There have been many gross abuses growing out of this law. The law was, in my judgment, only intended to apply to the appropriations then made, and was not intended to have general application to all future legislation. The effect given is much more extensive. It was but the other day that complaint was made to us that the Secretary of War had diverted appropriations made for one purpose to another purpose. We have another case, which is, perhaps, somewhat of a political kind, and I will mention it as an illustration. We appropriated money last Congress for the fiscal year ending 30th June next, to pay the expenses of the Kansas Legislature; and now I am informed that that appropriation was used to pay the expenses that had accrued prior to the commencement of the fiscal year, of a body which was declared by the House of Representatives to be a usurping body, entitled to no authority whatever.

This, in my judgment, was clearly a violation of law. The construction given by the Departments in repeated instances makes this law, which was only intended to apply to that particular appropriation bill, one of general application, so that now any Department of the Government may apply money appropriated for a certain specified purpose to another purpose and for another year. Such a construction is, in my judgment, not only unjust, but it is unconstitutional. The Constitution vests in Congress, and in Congress alone, the right to appropriate money, and to designate the purpose for which it shall be expended; and Congress cannot delegate this power to the Departments. But whether it is or is not unconstitutional, it seems to me to be unwise and improper. Therefore we ought to limit the expenditures of money by the Executive Departments of this Government, and ought to require them to apply the expenditure to the purpose for which the appropriation is made, and to the fiscal year, and for that only. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask him if the purpose of his amendment is to confine the appropriations contained in this bill to the specific purposes for which they are made, and to the fiscal year beginning 1st of July next?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That is my purpose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, the bill on its face purports to be for that purpose, and I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment. But I may remark that I am not aware of the abuses to which the gentleman alludes. I do not know that the practice is followed except in those cases in which it is supposed that a discretionary power is lodged in the Departments. I know that there are frequent instances in which a Department applies to Congress to give it power when there is a reappropriation of money, to use the balance on hand. There is a case in this very bill where a reappropriation is asked for; but in consequence of there being a balance on hand which would go to the surplus fund, the appropriation is made in accordance with the provisions of law. I concur, however, with the gentleman from Ohio in all that he has said. I am decidedly in favor of having specific appropriations, and that balances shall not be used for other purposes; but unless they are used during the fiscal year they shall pass to the surplus fund, and afterwards be reappropriated.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to add a remark. I hope that now since the attention of the House has been called to this abuse, that it will be corrected. I hope this clause in the act of 1842 will be repealed. There should be no objection made to it. This clause stands there as a monument of unwise legislation, and ought to be repealed; and I trust the gentleman will allow that to be done.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I may possibly agree with the gentleman in the propriety of having that clause repealed; but I have taken ground against independent legislation in appropriation bills. I do not object to the gentleman's amendment as now modified, because it is germane to the bill; but I must object to the other, because it proposes to repeal a law. If the gentleman brings it up in the shape of an act to repeal that clause, I may concur with him, and vote for it.

Mr. GROW. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the portion omitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I presume that my colleague [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] will agree to it, for this reason: the amendment will cover this whole question as to every appropriation bill as it comes up, and will obviate the necessity of offering it as an amendment to each. It is the proposition to confine appropriations to the specific purposes for which they are made, and to the fiscal year. The gentleman from Ohio, my colleague, and myself, all agree that the Departments should not have the discretion of diverting appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit the Chair to suggest that the amendment which he proposes is not in order.

Mr. GROW. I was proposing to my colleague to accept the amendment in order to obviate the necessity of offering it to each appropriation bill as it comes up. I hope, therefore, as attention has been called to it, that there will be no objection. Its object is to confine each appropriation to the specific object for which it is appropriated, and that it may not be diverted to any other purpose. The habit has grown up in the Executive Departments of estimating very low on some things and very high on other things, and diverting appropriations from one to the other. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection, and that this question may be disposed of now.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. GROW. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is mistaken, and that his amendment will not effect the object he intends.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no proposition before the committee on which debate is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I move to strike out so much of it as relates to the money appropriated in the act.

The bill before the committee is to make appropriations to defray the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, as read, prohibits the payment of any money appropriated by this act for any expenses that shall accrue after the expiration of the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1858. If you incorporate this amendment as proposed by him, it defeats every appropriation in the bill. The gentleman must have meant that it should be the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think the gentleman misunderstood the amendment. It provides that the money appropriated in this bill shall not be used in payment of expenses which shall accrue after the fiscal year commencing with the 30th of June, 1858.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I certainly understood the amendment as I have stated it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If the gentleman is correct, the copy of the amendment sent to the Clerk contains a clerical error, and I modify it so as to make it apply to the expenses accruing after the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. GROW. I move to amend the amendment by adding the clause which the gentleman from Ohio first proposed, to make the provision general.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope my colleague will not insist upon that amendment. I may be with him as to its adoption if it is incorporated in a separate bill.

Mr. GROW. My colleague knows very well that we shall never have an opportunity of incorporating it in a separate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is not in order if any gentleman objects.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must object. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation to $15,000, in the following paragraph:

"For salaries of the secretaries of legation of the United States, $12,000."

And to strike out the following paragraph:

"For salary of the secretary of legation to China, acting as interpreter, $5,000."

And insert as follows:

For salary of interpreter of legation to China, $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, the appropriation in this bill is only $12,000 for secretaries of legation of the United States; and in it there is no provision made for the secretary of legation to China. In the law, provision is made for an interpreter to the legation to China, at a salary of $5,000 per annum, when not acting as secretary of legation, and that the secretary of legation, when not acting as interpreter, shall get $3,000. I propose, therefore, to modify the bill so as to make it conform exactly to the law. I state from my experience, also, that it would be a very hard case to make the interpreter act as secretary of that legation. A separation of these offices is not only advisable, but proper.

Mr. LETCHER. It strikes me that this is a proposition to increase salaries.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Not at all. It only makes an appropriation for the salaries of such officers as are provided for by law. The bill as it now stands does not conform to the law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The law provides, as the gentleman from Kentucky has stated, that the interpreter to the legation to China shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, when acting both as interpreter and secretary of legation, or when he acts simply as interpreter, and not as secretary of legation; and that, in that contingency, the secretary of legation shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year. I understand the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is merely to make an appropriation for the salaries of these officers, in the contingency that they shall be vested in different persons. If that is the understanding, I have no objection to it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has misstated the law in this respect. The law provides that the interpreter shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year when not acting as secretary of legation.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I so stated.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to state that he was to receive that salary when discharging the duties of both offices.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I stated that, as I understood the law, when the interpreter acts as secretary of legation, he is to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. If he acts as interpreter alone, he is to receive a salary of $5,000 a year; and the secretary of legation is to receive a salary of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. LETCHER. That comes back to the point where I thought it stood. It makes an appropriation for an additional sum of money for a contingency which may possibly arise. Now, sir, that is not the kind of economy I go for. I raise the question of order upon this amendment, upon the ground that it is to raise the salary of officers, and that you cannot change salaries in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. LETCHER. I think the Chair does not understand my point of order. It is that it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole, on an appropriation bill, to raise the salaries of officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that he overrules the point of order, because he believes that there is a provision of law which authorizes the appropriation of the money.

Mr. LETCHER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will read from the act of 1856:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, for the legations at London and Paris, respectively, an assistant secretary of legation, who shall be entitled to compensation for their services, respectively, at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum; for the legation to China, an interpreter, when the secretary of legation shall not be acting as such, who shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of five thousand dollars; and for the legation to Turkey, a dragoman, when the secretary of legation shall not be acting as such, who shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. In a previous part of the same law we find this proviso:

"Provided, That the compensation of the secretary of the legation to China, acting as interpreter, shall be at the rate of $5,000, and if not acting as such, at the rate of $3,000; and that of the secretary of legation to Turkey, acting as dragoman, at the rate of $3,000, and if not acting as such, at the rate of $2,000 per annum."

Then in another section it is provided that the President be authorized to appoint, for the legation to China, an interpreter, when the secretary of legation shall not be acting as such, who shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $5,000.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understand it, the interpreter, when acting as secretary of legation and interpreter both, shall receive a salary of $5,000. Now, what my friend from Kentucky is after is to separate the duties of the secretary and the interpreter, and to make two distinct officers in that connection. I hold that, under the proviso which the gentleman has read, a secretary of legation may be appointed, who shall be an interpreter; and that the secretary of legation, so being an interpreter, shall receive a salary of $5,000.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would inquire whether, under the law as it now exists, the President cannot appoint an interpreter at a salary of $5,000, who shall not be secretary of legation?

Mr. LETCHER. A correct interpretation to that act has been given in the appointment of a secretary of legation who is an interpreter. That is the interpretation given to the law by the President. But it is proposed now to set aside that executive interpretation and construction, and to make two officers, instead of one, and to pay $8,000, instead of $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has made a point of order which the Chair has overruled.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to say a word or two upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not debatable.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I know it is not debatable; but it has been debated.

Mr. QUITMAN. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BOWIE. Will the Chair state what the point of order is, on which the decision appealed from was made?

Mr. LETCHER. I will state it. It is that under the law which has been read, and executive interpretation has been given to it by the action of the President, and that that interpretation carries with it a given salary for a given work; that under the present amendment it is proposed so to construe that law as to expend upon a new officer $3,000 more than is provided for by the bill.

The Committee was then divided, and eighty-four voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LETCHER. I will not insist upon a further count, but I give notice that I shall ask the yeas and nays upon the amendment in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" in each case and inserting "three."

As I understand the law, it provides that if there is a secretary of legation and interpreter in the same person, then the salary shall be $5,000; but that if there is a secretary who does not discharge the duty of interpreter, he shall receive $3,000 per annum, and that an interpreter shall have $5,000. The Executive is left free to appoint the same person to discharge both duties at a salary of $5,000. And, sir, the President has so appointed an interpreter and secretary of legation in the same person, as is shown by the Blue Book; and, as I understand it, an estimate was made for one officer at $5,000. The Committee of Ways and Means have reported in accordance with that estimate, as made by the Administration; and the effect of this amendment will be to require the President to appoint both a secretary of legation and an interpreter. The President has now the power, when he cannot get a person competent to perform the duties, both of secretary and interpreter, to get different persons to perform the duties of those respective offices. I have no doubt that hereafter the President will be able to find some person who is competent to perform the duties of both offices, as he has now. The effect of the amendment will be to require the President to appoint a person to each office.

Mr. PHILIPS. I oppose the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I think it brings the whole question before the committee. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has been ruled to be in order; and it is a proposition to increase the appropriation from $12,000 to $15,000 with a view of giving to the secretary of legation $5,000 even when he does not discharge the duties of interpreter, and also to pay an interpreter $5,000.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not the object.

Mr. PHELPS. Then why propose to increase the amount for the payment of the salary of the secretary of legation? I am opposed to this modification, in an appropriation bill, of the salaries of officers. Certainly there is a sufficient amount contained in the bill to compensate the secretary of legation if he is acting as interpreter. Were it not for the amendment which has been adopted, and to which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means did not object, there would have been no difficulty in compensating the secretary of legation, if he did not act as interpreter, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, and the interpreter at the rate of $5,000. But the construction given to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will be to give the secretary of legation, as such, $5,000, and to pay the interpreter, if the office is held by another person, $5,000.

The amendment of Mr. Jones was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer a pro forma amendment, for the purpose of explaining this matter, for gentlemen seem to have gone off in the dark about it. When the bill was introduced into the last Congress, which became a law, I myself introduced these amendments, and I introduced them with the intent to separate the offices of interpreter and secretary of legation. There is no possible relation between the duties of the two offices; and my opinion is, that no one man can fill the two offices. You give the interpreter, by law, a salary of $5,000, when you do not impose upon him the duties of secretary of legation. With what sort of propriety can you force him, for the same salary, to discharge the duties of an office for which, in another clause of your law, you provide a salary of $3,000? Do you not perceive that, by so doing, you are either taking his services as secretary of legation for nothing, or cutting down his salary as interpreter to $2,000?

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] said that the effect of my amendment would be to increase the salary of the secretary of legation to $5,000. Not at all. It only proposes to give the secretary of legation the salary provided by law when he is not acting as interpreter, and to give the interpreter $5,000 when he is not acting as secretary of legation, as is provided by law. The gentleman says that the amendment would force the Executive to appoint two officers. Not at all. It merely gives the Executive power to appoint two officers, provided in his judgment the two officers ought to be appointed. It only appropriates the salaries now provided for by law, and which the Committee of Ways and Means ought to have reported.

Sir, the interpreter to the legation at China has to be a scholar who knows all the dialects of the eastern languages. You have now such a man in the office—a man of delicate health, but a scholar. Your Minister has to pass from point to point and must have the secretary with him to transcribe the documents that he receives in his correspondence. He has to act most of the time as a mere amanuensis to copy the dispatches that pass between the Minister and this Government and the Minister with the Chinese Government.

I know very well that when I was Minister to China, I not only had a secretary, but I had a private secretary, who was paid out of my own pocket; and I know that he was almost constantly employed in transcribing papers that were in my office. You want your interpreter for other purposes. You want him for the purpose of translating to your Minister the thousand and one papers that exist in the Chinese language, and that may give him important information.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not think that this amendment ought to pass; and the more I hear about it, the more perfectly am I satisfied of that fact. Under the existing law, you have had a secretary of legation appointed, who has acted as interpreter.

The Congress of the United States has said by law that the secretary of legation performing this additional duty was justly entitled to a compensation of $5,000 per annum; and now my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] introduces his amendment, for the purpose of paying to the interpreter, when he does not act as secretary of legation, $5,000 a year for that simple duty alone, while he has been heretofore performing both duties for that amount of compensation.

Then, sir, the more we see of it, and the more we hear of it, the more perfectly apparent is it to this committee that the object of the amendment is to give to this interpreter now, for that service alone, a compensation greater than he received for performing that and the additional service of secretary of legation. And then what is bound to come on the heels of it? According to the gentleman from Kentucky, after you have taken this $5,000 for this branch of the service, you will have to appoint a secretary of legation, who is to be paid $3,000 more, making $8,000 for the service to be performed, instead of $5,000, as now provided.

Well, then, what more? The gentleman says it is creating no new office. Is it not a direct invitation to the President to select a secretary of legation who is not an interpreter of the language, and who will get $3,000 a year for his services? Is it not an invitation, having selected him, to select another man as interpreter, who is to get a compensation of $5,000 a year? And how does the gentleman sustain his position on this subject? He tells you that the present interpreter there is a man of fine education, but of a feeble constitution. Then, is not the object palpable? Is it not clear, on that argument, that he intends that this man of feeble constitution shall be relieved from labor, and shall have a large compensation for what he does? Can it mean anything else? No, sir; that is its meaning, direct, palpable, and positive.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question. Suppose the President of the United States appoints this man of feeble constitution as interpreter alone, what provision then have you made by this bill for the salary of the secretary. And does not the law require you in making up this bill, to make provision for the secretary, in case the President shall choose to appoint this man interpreter alone?

Mr. LETCHER. "Sufficient unto the day," Mr. Chairman, "is the evil thereof." If the President of the United States desires to divide these offices and to increase the expenditure of the Government $3,000, I imagine he will say so to this House, either through the Secretary of State or through somebody else. Whenever he does say so, it will be time enough then for this House to appropriate money. But when the President comes here to the Committee of Ways and Means through his Secretary of State, and tells you that he wants a secretary of legation who shall also act as an interpreter, at a salary of $5,000, I take it that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means not to appropriate money for a purpose which the Executive in his construction of the law, disclaims and repudiates.

I do not conceive it to be our business to appropriate more money than is asked for. God knows there is money enough asked for under this Government for various purposes, and I would rather see these demands cut down than, by an invitation to the President of the United States, ask him to increase them, and offer him the temptation of appointing another one of a hungry crew of officers.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, having withdrawn the last modification of his amendment, the question recurred on his amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, asked leave to withdraw it.

Mr. SEWARD objected.

Mr. COBB demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COBB and COLFAX were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWIE. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the eighty-seventh line:

Sec. —. And be it enacted, That it shall be, and hereby is, made the official duty of all consuls of the United States, in all foreign ports, to make out and send to the Department of State, at least once in every month, a statistical table or tables of the retail and wholesale prices of all articles of import, the produce of the United States, both in the form of the raw material and the manufactured article, which said tables of prices shall be published by the State Department from time to time, as it may direct, for the information of the people.

Sec. —. And be it enacted, That if any consul of the United States, in foreign ports, shall fail to comply with the requisitions of this act, his name shall be stricken from the list of foreign consuls, and the vacancy thus created shall be filled by the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. BOWIE. The Chair has no right to decide that my amendment is out of order, when no question has been raised upon it. Why is my amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order under the 81st rule, which is as follows:

"81. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—September 14, 1837—unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying."

Mr. BOWIE. That has just as much to do with the question as I have to do with the man in the moon. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. LETCHER, the committee then proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 306, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

The first reading of the bill was by general consent dispensed with.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to make a statement in reference to the merits of the bill; but unless the committee wish it I will not do it to-night.

Mr. CASE. I desire to speak, and if the gentleman will allow me I will go on to-night.

No objection was made.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, the argument in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Le-compton constitution that has had the most extensive circulation throughout the country, and which, from the official position and prestige of its author, has attracted, and will yet attract, most attention, is that which the President sent us on the 2d ultimo. The local press has everywhere published it; and it is being scattered broadcast by the Administration party as the latest gospel of Democracy. I propose, therefore, to use my hour in examining some of its propositions and sentiments. When that document was read by the Clerk, and when its startling statements and bitter charges were so heartily and promptly indorsed by one of my colleagues, [Mr. HUGHES,] I felt a desire, for the first time, to speak—to say something of a State paper so extraordinary in its phraseology, assertions, and conclusions. Rising at this late period to gratify that desire, it is proper to say that some of the remarks I have to submit were prepared soon after the delivery of that message. In the mean time, it has been quite boldly discussed here and in the other branch of Congress; and many of the ideas which lie directly in my path have been better expressed by others. Some of them will bear repetition, and for the rest, I have no apology beyond this explanation.

Though addressing this body for the first time, it will hardly be necessary in advance to multiply words in defining my position. The subject will give sufficient opportunity to indicate it. Let me only premise that, while I was elected to a seat in this House as a Republican—charged, too, by political adversaries with being a very black one—while I cling to the leading tenets of that party as tenaciously as ever, and am ready, in my poor way, at all proper times to defend them, yet I propose to-day to say but little on the distracting subject of slavery—not that the able and earnest vindications of that institution, to which I have listened here, have in the least shaken old and deep convictions. In its essential characteristics I can see nothing to love or admire—much, very much, to abhor and condemn. I ought, perhaps, to add; that my intense objection is to the principle of the institution; to its inherent injustice, which no kindness on the part of the master can compensate, though such kindness may be, and probably is, quite generally practiced; for I have never supposed our southern brethren to be sinners above all others. I dismiss this thought without further comment, content that for the present my remarks shall be confined to the rights of freemen, and the manner in which they are treated and proposed to be treated by the President; alluding only incidentally and necessarily, if at all, to the rights or interests of any other class. The subject demands great plainness of speech; and that demand is a sufficient apology for its use. The President has set the example. He has not been choice in his words, or mealy-mouthed in his opinions. Those words and opinions are immediately in my way. I cannot avoid them if I would; though he is old, and I am young.

Towards the close of his message, the President throws out a suggestion upon which he had done well to have acted if he would have it control the actions of others. He tells us, as in his annual communication, that "already have the affairs of Kansas engrossed an undue proportion of the public attention." Ah! have they? Why did not this occur to him at the outset, and, as has been well suggested by others, induce him to send us the Lecompton constitution, as he did that of Minnesota, without lengthy comments of his, instead of accompanying it with a long argument, every sentence of which is provocative of discussion, and acrimonious discussion too? Not thus will he succeed in calming the troubled political sea; not thus can he brush away "the dark and ominous clouds" to his vision "impending over the Union." Sir, when from his high position he assumes to pass judgment upon ten thousand free citizens of Kansas, pronouncing them rebels, insurrectionists, and traitors, when he substantially tells us that by their conduct they have forfeited all right to complain, that though the burden of their wrongs be never so heavy we must not hear them groan, he should remember that these men are our brethren and kinsfolk, that they have sympathizing friends in every free State certainly, probably in every State, of this Confederacy; that but a little time ago they were a part of the seventeen millions of northern freemen, that every congressional district in the free North has contributed its fifties and its hundreds to the population of Kansas, and of these, ninety-nine of every hundred are now standing and acting with those whom he denominates usurpers and rebels.

Besides, sir, the President is probably familiar with the political platforms of 1856. It will be recollected that he yielded his personal identity to the solicitations of patriotic friends, and was no longer James Buchanan, but the impersonation of one of them. He doubtless studied the others, and can hardly have forgotten that the Topeka constitution and movement, which he asserts to have been, from the first, the ultimatum of his Kansas rebels, received the indorsement of the Republican organization of that year. The work of a convention elected by a popular vote in its favor larger than the aggregate of that cast for the members of the late Lecompton convention, and ratified by a vote nearly or quite as large, they deemed it then the voice of the people, which Congress should heed. When, therefore, he brands that measure as rebellious and treasonable, he indirectly makes every Republican of that year an abettor of these monstrous crimes. He has studied American character to little purpose if he has not learned that such charges, from any quarter, must provoke severe scrutiny and criticism. Rebellion, charged against American citizens grates harshly on American ears, and he must not complain if facts and precedents are examined to determine its justice and propriety.

My colleague (Mr. HUGHES) told us that "the President had struck the key note of all this difficulty," and that was "rebellion! REBELLION!" He might have added that, having struck it, he adhered to it with marvelous steadiness. There were no half notes, nor even thirds or fifths in the whole strain. Let us cull some of the mellifluous sounds which still linger on the ear—first pausing a moment to inquire to whom they are applied. They are designated in the message, beyond a peradventure, by names and localities. They are called Republicans and Abolitionists; the localities are "the towns, cities, or counties where the Republican party have a majority," or "Lawrence, the hot-bed of all the abolition movements in the Territory." The persons accused are "the great mass of the Republican party of the Territory." True, these designations occur in the more ancient dispatches of Governor Walker—dispatches sent off while he was Saul instead of Paul; before the scales had fallen from his eyes; but the President incorporates them in his message, and makes their sentiments his own. Who does not know that the men thus designated are none other than the free-State party of Kansas, very few of them being Abolitionists; many of them not claiming to be Republicans, but old-fashioned Democrats rather, who went there to carry out what they thought to be "the true intent and meaning" of the organic law, but found themselves of necessity siding with the party of freedom in that Territory, and have therefore been dubbed Republicans and Abolitionists by the loyalists there and elsewhere.

How are these men and their acts characterized in the message? Why, sir, as having from the first "endeavored, by force and usurpation, to overthrow the government established by Congress," as "subverters of government," "defying government," and "setting up a revolutionary government." They are spoken of as insurgents, as insurrectionary, rebellious; and to those deeds of shame, all culminating in the Topeka movement, we are told they have adhered "with treasonable pertinacity." These are specimens, only, of the choice literature of the Executive. How many times some of these adjective phrases occur in the message, I cannot say. They constitute its warp and woof; and, to return to the figure of my colleague, are but the same key-note, or its octaves above and below. What a harmony of soft words, if not of soft music!

While the tones of its lofty patriotism and heaven-born charity yet captivate the sense, while friends are praising its signal ability and opponents smarting under its benevolent castigations, it is grievous to be compelled to say, in truth, that the production is scarcely original. Key-note and all, it is little more than a recast of an old chant—of a tune sang many years ago, perhaps before Yankee Doodle had become a national air. Painful as the task may be, and precious as my time certainly is, I must take occasion briefly to demonstrate this, both as a matter of justice to the dead, and that the living may see which way the Administration is drifting. The data may also be useful to the friends of the President elsewhere. His message has been assailed by the Opposition press as being without parallel or precedent in the past. To his friends throughout the country it must be interesting to learn that in sentiment it is not new to American history. Republicans are prone to refer to early writings to sustain their doctrines—to show that they were those of the fathers; that even their territorial policy had its origin in a Jeffersonian ordinance older than the Constitution. And while the public heart venerates the deeds and the patriotism of those great men, they will not appeal in vain to the voice which comes to them through the vista of years, and assures them they are right. It must please the friends of the Administration (not here, but in the rural districts) to learn that they, too, can appeal to writings older than the present Government to vindicate the language of this remarkable State paper—to show that in tone, argument, and phrases, it has its prototype in the productions of that past generation whose law-loving spirit the President so beautifully commends.

This earlier document I have before me. It is an unpretending book, occupies but little space, and has probably attracted little attention among the sixty thousand volumes of your congressional library. Certainly it is a kind of literature to which Republicans are not partial, and of which Democrats, in other days, were not specially fond. It was written in 1774. That, like the present, was a time of excitement. Then, as now, there was a controversy between Governors and governed; then, as now, a party which asserted the Governors ever right, the governed ever wrong. To this party the author seems to have belonged. His name does not appear in print, but some hand, (I had almost said an unkind one,) has penciled it on the title page; it shall not escape my lips.

He was undoubtedly a Tory; but he has gone to his grave, and no descendant of his, if he has one, would thank me for proving, or intimating, this work to be the deed of his ancestor. It is entitled—"A Friendly address to all Reasonable Americans on the subject of our Political Confusions, &c.," and seems to have been published for purchasers, at the moderate price of one shilling sterling. A few extracts from both will show the striking resemblances between the ancient book and the modern message. I begin with the latter. The President says:

"A great delusion seems to pervade the public mind in relation to the condition of parties in Kansas. This arises from the difficulty of inducing the American people to realize the fact that any portion of them should be in a state of rebellion against the Government under which they live. When we speak of the affairs of Kansas, we are apt to refer merely to the existence of two violent political parties in that Territory, divided on the question of slavery, just as we speak of such parties in the States. This presents no adequate idea of the true state of the case. The dividing line there is not between two political parties, both acknowledging the lawful existence of the Government, but between those who are loyal to this Government and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and by usurpation—between those who sustain and those who have done all in their power to overthrow the territorial government established by Congress. This government they would long since have subverted, had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States. Such has been the condition of affairs since my inauguration. Ever since that period, a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion against the government, with a military leader at their head of a most turbulent and dangerous character. They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority. They have all the time been endeavoring to subvert it, and to establish a revolutionary government under the so-called Topeka constitution in its stead. Even at this very moment the Topeka Legislature are in session."

Similar in sentiment is the extract from one of the dispatches of Governor Walker, adopted by the President, which says:

"Lawrence is the hot-bed of all the Abolition movements in this Territory. It is the town established by the Abolition societies of the East; and, whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by Abolition societies to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question. Having failed in inducing their own so-called Topeka State Legislature to organize this insurrection, Lawrence has commenced it herself; and if not arrested, the rebellion will extend throughout the Territory. And again: In order to send this communication immediately by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this Territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by eastern societies, having in view results most disastrous to the Government and to the Union."

In the same strain are the two following key-note extracts:

"The truth is, that up till the present moment, the enemies of the existing government still adhere to their Topeka revolutionary constitution and government."

"This Topeka government, adhered to with such treasonable pertinacity, is a government in direct opposition to the existing government prescribed and recognized by Congress."

Observe, sir, the grave charges and causes of complaint: "regular authority defied and denied;" loyalty at a discount, leaning on paid soldiery for support; particular places in open revolt, and by their hot-bed movements striving to make the dire disturbance universal; legal officials repudiated, and legislators, Governors, even a turbulent and dangerous military leader of their own choice set up in their stead! And yet the people all unconscious of an existing continued rebellion. The picture is graphically drawn, but lacks one great merit—originality, as a few extracts from the book before me will clearly prove. In the deeds and designs of his countrymen eighty-four years ago, the author saw and painted the same rank mischief and treason that constitute the startling features of the modern drawing. He says:

"Friends, countrymen, and fellow-subjects: Let me entreat you to rouse up at last from your slumber, and to open your eyes to the danger that surrounds you—the danger of being hurried into a state of rebellion before you are aware of it, and of suffering all that resentment which a mighty nation can discharge on a defenseless people."

"If you persist in the steps which many of you have taken, the time cannot be distant in which both you and they will be legally proclaimed rebels and traitors—they as principals, you as their abettors; and especially if you go on to encourage the New England fanatics to attack the King's troops!"

Again he says:

"To this wretched and accursed state of rebellion, the principles that have been propagated, and several steps that have been taken in the American colonies, directly tend. Nay, a rebellion is evidently commenced in New England, in the county of Suffolk, without room for retreating; the inhabitants of that large and populous county have openly hid defiance to the united authority of the King, Lords, and Commons in Parliament assembled; they have most contemptuously rejected the regulations of their courts of justice, &c., established by Parliament; and not only so, but they have set up in direct opposition to their authority a Government of their own. In the spirit of outrageous licentiousness they have compelled, by brutal violence, those respectable gentlemen that held commissions under the Crown to resign them, in forms of their own inditing, and to relinquish their stations, and they have appointed others of the same factious and turbulent disposition with themselves to fill their places, till their long projected Republic shall be settled; which is the glorious object. They have already, if we may believe credible information, marked out the inland town of Worcester for the seat of this Republic; they are now collecting artillery for its defense, and some of them have nominated the man who is to be their PROTECTOR. Whether this be so or not, it appears from authentic intelligence from Boston, that they have done as bad. For the selectmen and committee of correspondence have proclaimed the King's troops to be public enemies."

Quoting from a dispatch of the King's Governor, he makes the charge against these Bostonians yet more explicit; for Boston then, and that New England region, like Lawrence now backed by its New England aid, seems to have been the hot-bed of sedition. Plymouth Rock is, I believe, somewhere in that vicinity, and it seems that the pernicious principles of the Pilgrim Fathers were even then working out legitimate fruits! The Governor (not Mr. Buchanan's, but the King's) says:

"They have given orders to prevent all supplies for English troops; straw purchased for their use is burnt, vessels with bricks sunk, carts with wood overturned, and all this is not the effect of rash tumult but of evident system."

Why, sir, you can scarcely find in the history of Lawrence such systematic lawlessness as this, unless in that spontaneous municipal organization that demonstrated its contempt for the authorities, in the willful removal of sundry dead animals from the streets of that town, and rendered the presence of United States troops necessary to preserve order! Our author adds:

"Now these rebellious republicans, these hair-brained fanatics, as mad and distracted as the Anabaptists of Munster, are the people whom the American colonies wish to support."

Let full justice be done to both productions. In the message we are informed that there "are respectable people in Lawrence." So in the elder author we learn that even in Boston there were "many innocent and respectable persons—many more than was commonly imagined."

The comparisons made sufficiently indicate the family resemblances; but there are others equally striking and suggestive. More than once we are told in the message, in reference to the Lecompton convention and its results, that if that body did not represent the sentiment of the Territory, if its doings were an outrage upon the wishes of the people, it was their own fault; that by their votes that should have sent to that body different men—men representing their views—and having failed (refused, if you please) to do so, "it is not for them to complain that their rights have been violated." What an argument, sir, for a statesman and moralist! The plain English of it, as we must apply it, is this: admit that this constitution does violate the people's rights: they committed the first wrong, and that will excuse ours. We may, therefore, thrust it down their throats without even asking them how they relish the prescription. When and where did the President learn that in politics, more than elsewhere, one wrong justifies another? Ah! I forget myself; he might have learned it in the very book before me.

In those early days, as we all know, the legislation of the parent Government interfered with the tea drinking of the Colonies—imposing a tax on that "domestic institution." Then arose a contest among the people—the rebellious asserting that they should have a voice in the making of laws that taxed them. Our author, ever loyal to those in power, was upon this grave question true to the administration. He first denies the right claimed by the people, and then concludes his argument as follows:

"Yet, notwithstanding all this, they (the people of the Colonies) have lately been told by their agents, who had it from the best authority, that if they chose to send over persons to represent them in Parliament, they should be admitted to seats in the House. In my opinion, they have done wisely in not accepting the offer; but after refusing it, they surely have no reason to complain that they have no representatives in the Parliament that must govern them."

Sir, if the work is good authority, the language of the message is vindicated by a precedent of respectable years.

The analogies are by no means exhausted.

Passing from the question of right, the Executive missive invites our attention to arguments of expediency. We are asked to consider the benefits that will result to Kansas and the country from its immediate admission and the disasters which may follow its rejection. In the catalogue of benefits to be assured by its admission, we have "domestic peace restored, and that fine Territory, hitherto torn by dissensions, rapidly increasing in population and wealth, and speedily realizing the blessings and comforts which follow in the train of agricultural and mechanical industry."

The figures of the other and darker picture are not clearly brought out. We have dim images of "agitation renewed in a form more alarming than it has ever yet assumed," "people of sister States estranged from each other with more than former bitterness," and "consequences which no man can foretell," on a background of "dark and ominous clouds impending, which, if Kansas is rejected, will become darker and more ominous than any which have yet threatened the Constitution and the Union." I shall not attempt to finish the picture, especially when it is intimated that the background may yet require a deeper shading. But our ancient author, in his "address to reasonable Americans," left neither of these sketches unfinished. He reminded them that under British laws and protection "they were already rich, from practicing at their ease the peaceful arts of agriculture and commerce; and they had but to pursue the same path to flourish and prosper, till, in process of time, they would excite either the admiration or envy of the whole world." Then, turning the canvas, he pointed to them "the darkness of a rising tempest," while "the roar of distant thunder broke upon their ears." In bold relief stood out the frightful images of his grouping. The demon of discord rising to distract; the dogs of war let loose; brother fighting against brother; the rebels vanquished and treated accordingly; their estates forfeited and confiscated; themselves handed over to the hands of the executioner; and "only the lower classes spared," to speak of the mercy of their conquerors!

All honor to those same reasonable Americans, for whom arguments of advantage had no controlling charms; pictures of disaster no restraining terrors; whose steady and practical reply to all expediency men was that noble adage, "millions for defense, not one cent for tribute;" or that other immortal sentiment, "give me liberty, or give me death!"

In strange contrast with the reasoning just considered is the argument of insignificance to be found in the old work as well as in the new, the subjects discussed being different, but the principle involved the same. In the former, submission to British power was counseled, because the tax imposed was too insignificant to be ground of complaint, and because the people could themselves cure the evil, and yet be loyal to constituted authorities. The author says:

"In what do you suffer? Why, it seems a duty of three pence a pound has been laid by Parliament upon their teas exported to America; and we cannot purchase the tea without paying the duty. But, if this may be called a burden, so may the weight of an aton on the shoulders of a giant. Besides, this burden may be easily avoided; for we have no occasion to purchase the tea, and unless we do purchase it, we are under no obligations to pay the duty."

Sir, why did not this argument settle the confusions of 1774? Because, above and beyond the insignificance of the tax demanded, rose the eternal principle that the people's consent must be the basis of all laws to which they are subjected; and because trifling and insignificant violations of it were then, as now, more dangerous to the public good than flagrant denials of its justice. The one, adopted, might become a precedent; while the other, if successful, would be branded as tyranny.

And yet, though the same principle is involved now as then, we are told in the message—

"If Kansas is rejected, agitation more alarming than we have ever known will be revived; and this from a cause more trifling and insignificant than has ever stirred the elements of a great people to commotion."

What is the argument by which we are to be convinced on this point? Why, in substance, this: if the proposed constitution does not accord with the popular will of Kansas, we have only to drag her into the Union under it, and then the people can immediately help themselves! Thus, we are told there is "only a difference of time" between us. Granting the legal view to be sound, (and upon that I express no opinion now,) why do we not yield the point at once, and have done with this angry strife? Because thereby we would yield that undying principle which, in the eyes of our fathers, towered like a mountain peak above the trifling impost that violated it, and which must never, never be surrendered—the assent of the governed to laws, and above all, fundamental laws, to be imposed upon them. When that principle is involved, nothing which demands its abandonment, or postponement for a single hour, is trifling or insignificant.

One other characteristic of both documents deserves a passing notice. It is the common standpoint from which they view and judge the actions of the authorities on the one hand, and of the people on the other. Read the old book through, and from beginning to end you can find in it no admission of any real wrong on the part of British power. The rulers were ever right, submission to their behests ever a duty; the people were always wrong, their remonstrances unreasonable, their action "brutal violence and rebellion." So, sir, in the message, from its first line to its last, there is not an intimation that, in a solitary instance, pretended authorities or real ones have outraged public decency or private rights in Kansas; not a word from which you can infer that there has been the slightest excuse for the continued rebellion and pertinacious treason which is charged, without scruple, upon ten thousand freemen in that Territory. Like the Tory writer of 1774, the President sees no act of the authorities in Kansas to condemn, scarcely one act of its people to approve. I shall return to this feature of the message soon, and therefore dismiss it for the present.

Enough, perhaps, has been said to show, not where the President did find, but where he might have found, "the key note" of his message—enough to remove all wonder that even Democrats are startled at the strain and loth to keep time to the tune. And now, sir, I have done with comparisons between these extraordinary productions. As to the justice and propriety of the one, the public voice, if consulted, would give no uncertain sound. Let but an American come forward now and thus speak of the deeds and men of eighty-four years ago, and he would be deafened with the hisses of the civilized world. Let us leave the author where we found him, sleeping in a political oblivion that perchance should not have been disturbed, while we return to the document of our own times, with the charitable prayer that similar errors may not ultimately be rewarded by a similar repose.

Time fails me to notice many important propositions of the message. I must be content with a hasty glance at one or two more. Here is one deserving attention, not only for its indication of executive partiality, but for its grave error as to the real issue to be settled. It is a sort of postscript to the argument of insignificance which has been considered, and shows that in the President's opinion the struggle may not be so trifling to others as it is to the people of Kansas. He says:

"In considering this question it should never be forgotten that—in proportion to its insignificance, let the decision be what it may, so far as it may affect the few thousand inhabitants of Kansas who have, from the beginning, resisted the constitution and the laws—for this very reason the rejection of the constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of fourteen of the States of this Union where slavery is recognized under the Constitution of the United States."

Sir, does the President imagine that northern men are statues, that in the free States of this Union there will be no "keen feeling" on this question? If our southern brethren may be so strenuous about a barren victory, may not we as strenuously decline to yield? Suppose we reverse the argument, and say, "in proportion to its insignificance, &c.; for this very reason the adoption of this constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of the sixteen States of this Union where slavery is not recognized." Is not the reasoning equally sound? Yet he seems to be blissfully unconscious that the people of the North have any interest, or any right to be interested, in this matter. But on this I do not dwell. I wish rather to refer to a graver error, apparent in the passage last quoted, and more prominent still in other parts of the message. It is the assumption that this constitution is to be rejected, if at all, because it tolerates a certain peculiar institution. In another place, you may remember, he speaks of the "disasters to result, if we reject Kansas because slavery remains in her constitution." Now, sir, this assumption is sadly wrong. With me, and with many others, under the circumstances, it would be a sufficient reason for voting against the adoption of that constitution, if there were no other. But the President must know, or should know, that in this House there are those who are earnestly opposed to its adoption, with whom the slavery clause is of secondary or no importance; and, sir, he ought to know, if he does not, that all over the land there are thousands of men—men who were his supporters a twelvemonth ago—who care little about slavery, but who will look upon the admission of Kansas under this constitution as an outrage unparalleled in all our past legislation. Does the President wish to put such men, holding seats here, and the thousands who sympathize with them elsewhere, in a false position?

Nor is this sentiment confined to those who were so lately of his political household. For one, I am free to say that if there were no question of negro slavery involved, I would never, by my vote, make that instrument the constitution of Kansas; because that involves a question to me equally important, whether white men shall be robbed of their rights. The free men of that Territory have cast it out as an unclean thing, and that is objection enough with me without looking at the face of the paper. As an American citizen, and as a Republican, while I do not hold that Congress is bound to approve and adopt a constitution, regardless of its provisions, because it embodies the people's will, I do hold that we should never force one upon them, for a single moment, which they have never approved, but have emphatically condemned. On this latter proposition I would not have supposed, six months ago, that there could be a difference of opinion between men or parties.

In this connection I am reminded of another singular statement of the message. It is this:

"The people of Kansas have, then, 'in their own way,' and in strict accordance with the organic act, framed a constitution and State government; have submitted the all important question of slavery to the people, and have elected a Governor, a member to represent them in Congress, members of the State Legislature, and other State officers. They now ask admission into the Union under this constitution, which is republican in its form."

A brief prefix to this statement, with one slight omission, would have added vastly to its truthfulness. Had he commenced by saying "a meager minority of the people of Kansas," and omitted the phrase "in strict accordance with the organic act," he would have made a capital hit. Then it would have read, "a meager minority of the people of Kansas have framed a constitution, and ask admission under it." Thus he would not have ignored the fact, then and now notorious in all the land, that only in the previous month, and as the latest utterance of the ballot-boxes of that Territory, the people had almost unanimously repudiated this constitution. Of that fact he must have had an unwavering conviction when he penned his message, and yet who would suspect it from what he says? I am aware of his excuse, and will give it in his own words. He says, "I have yet received no official information of the result of this election." Quite likely; and on his own theory he probably never will; for, in the same connection, just preceding this last quotation, he strongly intimates that in his judgment the whole proceeding was unofficial and unauthorized; though he says "it was peaceably conducted under his instructions." But is it so that when a man becomes President he loses his natural organs—has only official eyes and official ears, and may not, by ordinary channels of information, learn, believe, and act upon an unquestioned fact? If this is not true, then did he know and believe, when his message was written, that the people of Kansas make no such request as he attributes to them.

Passing through this maze of old-fashioned heresy and new-fashioned Democracy, it is pleasant to find a commendable sentiment. It is this: "popular sovereignty should be exercised here only through the ballot-box," and "through the instrumentality of established law"—a general proposition which none should deny. Republicans do not controvert it. On the contrary, that sovereignty having been conferred on the people of Kansas by an established law, Republicans, in that Territory and out of it, have insisted from the beginning that they should be protected in the enjoyment of the right. Its violation by the raid of March 30, 1855, when the established law was ignored, and the voice of Kansas stifled at the ballot-box, and the continued recognition, by the Executive and his agents, of the usurpation then inaugurated, have been the grand causes of the political confusions of that Territory. It is that usurpation, in all its ramifications, and not the established law, that the people there have resisted. I know the apology for that interference; I say apology—for no one can pretend that it would amount, if true, to anything like a justification. It was said, and is said, that it was to counteract the efforts of eastern aid societies and their agents who, it was alleged, had flooded and were flooding Kansas with emigrants, through whose votes they sought to shape its laws and institutions. Suppose this was done. So long as they sent there only bona fide settlers, what right, legal or moral, did they violate? Not even to this extent would legitimate evidence sustain the charge; much less would it convict them of sending to that Territory mere transient squatters, to interfere with the rights of actual residents. Why, sir, when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was pending in Congress, through all the long discussion upon it, it was a point conceded that the peculiar institution could never be established in either of those Territories. Passing over the admissions of distinguished friends of the measure in the Senate, I will rest the proof of this assertion upon the language of my colleague, [Mr. ENGLISH.] In a speech made by him in favor of the bill, on the 9th day of May, 1854, he used these words:

"I have said that in my opinion the people of these Territories will never adopt the institution of slavery; and I have yet to hear a member of Congress, of either House, express a contrary opinion."

Sir, what was such language, in substance uttered and reiterated by many from the South as well as from the North, but an invitation and a license to the whole North to go there and settle and establish their own institutions? And if they accepted the invitation, and rushed in by thousands as soon as Kansas was opened to them, what right, express or implied, was interfered with? Was there a law providing that emigrants to a new Territory should go solitary and alone, and that no more than a given number should enter it within a given time? If not, then if it were true that a million of New England emigrants stood upon the Kansas line and poured themselves into it the first moment it was open to emigration, it was no wrong to anybody.

I come back now to this charge of rebellion. Is it well founded? To settle that question correctly we must determine one preliminary, namely: what is the governing power of Kansas? Happily, so far as the President and his supporters are concerned, this question is conclusively settled by an authority which he says is the highest known to our laws, and that, too, in a decision which he and they most heartily approve. Once, there was much noise and confusion about popular sovereignty as applicable to Territories. Once, a portion of the President's friends denied or doubted the right of Congress to legislate for them. Their theory seemed to be, that the people of a Territory, like those of a State, were sovereign; and that Congress had not constitutional power to interfere with that sovereignty in either case. The Supreme Court, in the famous Dred Scott decision, set that to rest. They decided, in substance, (indeed it was no new doctrine in that court,) that Congress is the law-making power for all our common domain; that the Federal Government is the governing power of that domain. True, they said that Congress could not interfere with a certain institution there, not because it was not the legitimate law-making authority, but because that institution was above all legislation. But equally explicit were they in the doctrine that whatever laws may be enacted for a Territory, Congress may pass; whatever power a Territorial Legislature may have, is such as Congress gives it, and no more. That these points were ruled, or attempted to be ruled in that celebrated case, is past dispute. It follows that, though Congress may grant to the people of a Territory the right of self-government, only a delegated right is conferred, which may, at any time, be resumed, no matter how unconditional the grant be on its face; for Congress cannot, if it would, yield past reclamation, sovereignty vested in it by the Constitution. It follows, too, that, if Kansas has had a government, it has been the Federal Congress, or such officials—Governors, judges, marshals, and legislators—as Congress may have designated and authorized to act as its agents. We all know what the fact is: Congress provided, by an organic act, for a government through agents, prescribing for the people of that Territory, Governors, Secretaries, judges, and marshals, to be appointed by the Executive, and legislators to be chosen by themselves.

Such having been and being the legal governing power of Kansas, when, and by whom, has it been repudiated or defied? When have the people there resisted the officers of Federal appointment, or denied their authority? I do not ask for individual acts of resistance to officials. Such have doubtless occurred there, as they have everywhere else. But no lawyer will pretend that such acts amount to rebellion. I go further, and ask when have they denied the authority or resisted the enactments of any Legislature called into being by their voice? Remember, sir, they were licensed by the organic act to elect their own legislators, and were told that thus they should freely govern themselves. That license was at any time subject to congressional modification or recall; but so long as it remained, it was to them a sufficient warrant to deny the authority and resist the enactments of any pretended Legislature, not chosen by their votes; and, though I do not profess to go into details, the investigations of a prior Congress sufficiently prove that only when such a body of pretenders was thrust upon them by others did they deny its authority, repudiate its enactments, and refuse to recognize the swarms of officers by those enactments called into being. I have spoken of that first Legislature as a body of pretenders. It is a borrowed phrase, sir, borrowed from high Democratic authority—none other than the State Sentinel, the central and leading organ of that party in my own State, of the date of July 27, 1855. To avoid the charge of plagiarism, I quote the article in full:

"KANSAS.—The public were informed, a few days since, that the Kansas Legislature had changed its place of meeting from Pawnee Village to Shawnee Mission. Governor Reeder, it seems, dissents from the usurpation of power in the case in point, and refuses to meet that incendiary body at its new habitation, or to recognize its action as of legal authority."

"Were we the Governor of Kansas, backed by the Administration, we would treat that body of pretenders much as the Long Parliament was treated by Cromwell, and subject the outlaw leader to a test similar to that imposed on the weak and unfortunate Charles the First. In other words, as beheading is out of fashion, we would hang that fellow, Stringfellow, to the first tree that presented the proper convenience for a little episode of this peculiar character."

Of course I am not responsible for the personalities of this editorial, and need not make them my own; nor would I vouch for its entire truthfulness. One error is manifest. It speaks of Governor Reeder as being backed by the Administration, whereas he was simply backed out by it.

But to return: I have shown that there were but two possible legislative bodies to whom the people of Kansas owed allegiance. Congress being one, and the other a Territorial Legislature of their own free choice. Congressional enactments they have not resisted; a Legislature of their own choosing they never had, prior to the one which has but recently adjourned. Thus is the alleged key-note of the message disposed of. The authority of Federal officials has been respected, even while those same officials have joined with the oppressors of Kansas, in attempting to subjugate its people. Only the power of those pretended officials, thrust upon them in shameful violation of their pledged rights, have the people of Kansas denied. That this has been their consistent course, is more manifest in view of the fact that the first Legislature of their own choice has been respected by them, as a legitimate Legislature should be; and in view of the further fact that all the Democratic Governors, save one, who have been sent to that Territory, and who went there breathing threatenings and slaughter against those same free-State men, speedily became such ardent sympathizers with them that they were no longer fit repositories of Executive confidence. Like Saul, of olden time, they have all been suddenly and marvelously converted. Only thus far, however, does the comparison hold good. Divine Power struck down the persecuting Jew, that he might be converted; Executive power struck down these Governors because of their conversion!

It is true that acts of violence have been committed by free-State men in Kansas, for which there is no apology, save the aggravation of lawlessness, under color of law, that provoked them. And yet the President, as I have said, utterly ignores all these insults and provocations, though they constitute a catalogue of crime such as has disgraced no other civilized land in the nineteenth century. He is growing old—perhaps forgetful. I propose to jog his memory on one or two matters too significant to be overlooked; to remind him, humble as I am, and impertinent as it may seem, that if he has not read the papers, the people have; or, if he has forgotten the history of Kansas past, there are those into whose hearts the record has been burned too deep to be erased. I pass over all acts of individual violence as causes of complaint. These, on both sides, the President and his friends may make a matter of mutual set-off; though, for the balance over, there would be a heavy judgment against them. Still, it is not of the greatest moment that one man was butchered here, another hewed to pieces there, and another shot and scalped in another place. It is, perhaps, of little consequence that these bloody deeds became every-day occurrences in Kansas. Nor need we stop a moment to sympathize with friends of the butchered dead. Assassination and murders are not peculiar to Kansas. They have occurred elsewhere, and will occur again—ever attended, too, with scores of living bleeding hearts for every one that ceases to beat. Human life is, after all, far less precious than the rights we live to enjoy.

Of one or two of these transactions, viewed in another light than as simple wrongs to persons, I shall have something to say. As to all, let me add that, while such enormities are comparatively trifling, there is a fact connected with them of the deepest significance; and that is, that all the perpetrators of these atrocious deeds are still at large, and unwhipped of justice. Nor to this hour has there been an effort, which deserves the name, on the part of the officials of that Territory, to bring them to an account; except perhaps one on the part of Governor Geary, which was successfully thwarted by judicial interference. This fact, sir, constitutes one of the great wrongs of which the free-State men of Kansas justly complain, and against which (if you please to say so) they revolt. A murder, even if the victim be a helpless, unoffending cripple, (as was the case of Buffum,) or if he be scalped as by the hand of a savage, (as was the earlier case of Hoppe,) may be too small a matter to be remembered or noticed by the President or his Kansas friends; but, sir, when the officers of the law become indifferent to even such trivial wrongs; when, by the conduct of Governors, marshals, judges, and district attorneys, the community is advertised that such deeds are to go unpunished, that, sir, is a wrong which he should not overlook—a wrong to the whole community, which, in one way or another, and in some way at all hazards, that community has a right to remedy. There is another fact, deserving notice at this point. During the whole time when these wrongs were being perpetrated, all the instrumentalities and machinery of justice were in the hands and under the control of what is now the Administration party. They made the Governors, judges, marshals, and public prosecutors, who pretended to administer the laws in that Territory. With them, during all that time, rested the power of removal; and there it rests still. At their door, therefore, is piled up this mountain of unavenged crimes. I commend these facts to the consideration of the venerable President, who so piteously exclaims for the return of the good old days of "reverence for law." When he and his advisers shall have purged that Territory of all officials who overlook or wink at deeds which would disgrace savage haunts, will it be time for him and them to arraign the freemen of Kansas for doing something to protect and defend themselves.

And now, sir, for some examples of "loyalty;" for you know the message tells us that "the dividing line in Kansas has been between those who are loyal to this government, [the territorial,] and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force." Who are meant by the latter class, we have already seen. They are designated as the Republicans. Of course the loyalists of the message are those who have opposed these Republicans. From their ranks, choosing only their burning and shining lights, my examples shall be selected. You shall have, chiefly, specimens of official loyalty and respect for the laws. I begin with the judiciary, not being confined, however, exclusively to judicial acts.

Searching the history of Kansas, we find the chief justice of the supreme court of that Territory an active participant in a public meeting held at Leavenworth on the 30th of April, 1855; which meeting passed an order that "all persons who should, by the expression of abolition sentiments, produce a disturbance to the quiet of the citizens, or danger to their domestic institutions, should be notified, and made to leave the Territory." The Kansas Herald, an Administration organ, tells us that "the meeting was ably and eloquently addressed by Judge Lecompte," and that its doings were harmonious. They appointed a committee of ten to carry out their orders. How faithfully that committee endeavored to obey instructions, one William Phillips can testify. I mistake, sir; once he could have testified, but I remember now he was afterwards shot down in his own house by a band of "law and order men," under command of one who is an officeholder under the present Administration. But this is a digression. I wished to show a specimen of reverence for law on the part of a judicial functionary, and not to trace its consequences.

This was no judicial act; but here is one that was. It is the charge of Chief Justice Lecompte to the grand jury of his court, delivered on the 5th day of May, 1856. It has been cited in this body before by my worthy colleague, [Mr. Corfax,] and may be found in the National Intelligencer for June 5, 1856. The Judge says:

"Gentlemen, you are assembled to consider whatever infringements of law may come under your notice, and bring in bills as your judgment may dictate against those whom you may find guilty of such infringements." * * * "You will take into consideration the cases of men who are dubbed Governors, Lieutenant Governors, Secretaries, and Treasurers, within this Territory, and will find bills in accordance with the following instructions:

"This Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and, so far, its authority is from the United States. It has a Legislature, elected in pursuance of that organic act. This Legislature, being an instrument of Congress by which it governs the Territory, has passed laws. These laws, therefore, are of United States authority and making, and all that resist these laws resist the power and authority of the United States, and are therefore guilty of high treason.

"Now, gentlemen, if you find that any persons have resisted these laws, then you must, under your oaths, find bills against such persons for high treason. If you find that no such resistance has been made, but that combinations have been formed for the purpose of resisting them, and individuals of influence and notoriety have been aiding and abetting in such combinations, then must you still find bills for constructive treason, as the courts have decided that, to constitute treason, the blow need not be struck, but only the intention be made evident."

Sir, since the day when the infamous Jeffreys sent Algonson Sydney to the block for constructive treason, so monstrous a doctrine as this charge enunciated, has not emanated from the bench of any Christian country—a doctrine which would have made any man who resisted a tax-gatherer in Kansas, guilty of high treason! Nay, more and worse, which declared that not the act, but an intent to do the act, constituted the crime! We all know the result. Scores of free-State men were indicted, arrested, and confined in jail. Judge Lecompte for months refusing every offer of bail. Plenty of officers could be found to arrest and incarcerate such men on the shortest notice. This was done on alleged indictments, which a Democratic Senator and able lawyer, [Mr. Pugh,] pronounced defective, in both substance and form. And while this solemn mockery was going on, boasting assassins, with the blood stains yet upon their hands, went at large and undisturbed.

This calls up another judicial reminiscence. It begins with one of the chivalric deeds of the Kickapoo Rangers, on the 15th September, 1856, which I must read as it is narrated in the "History of Governor Geary's administration in Kansas," prepared by his private secretary, Dr. John H. Gihon. I read from page 167 of that work:

"Six men of this detachment, (Kickapoo Rangers,) when within a few miles of Lecompton, halted by a field, where a poor inoffensive, lame man, named David C. Buffum, was at work. They entered the field, and after robbing him of his horse, one of them shot him in the abdomen, from which wound he soon after died. The murderer also carried away a pony belonging to a young girl, the daughter of a Mr. Thom, residing in the neighborhood. Almost immediately after the commission of this wanton crime, Governor Geary, accompanied by Judge Cato, arrived upon the spot and found the wounded man weltering in his blood. Although suffering the most intense agony, he was sensible of his condition, and perfectly mindful of the circumstances that had transpired. Judge Cato, by the direction of the Governor, took an affidavit of the unfortunate man's dying declarations. Writhing in agony, the cold sweat-drops standing upon his forehead, with his expiring breath he exclaimed, 'Oh, this was a most unprovoked, horrid murder! They asked me for my horses, and I pleaded with them not to take them. I told them that I was a cripple, a poor lame man, that I had an aged father, a deaf and dumb brother, and two sisters, all depending on me for a living, and my horses were all I had with which to procure it. One of them said I was a God-d—d Abolitionist, and seizing me by the shoulder with one hand, he shot me with a pistol that he held in the other. I am dying; but my blood will cry to Heaven for vengeance, and this horrible deed will not go unpunished.' * * * "The Governor was affected to tears. He had been on many a battle field, and familiar with suffering and death, but says he 'I never witnessed a scene that filled my mind with so much horror. There was a peculiar significance in the looks and words of that dying man, that I never can forget: for they seemed to tell me, that I could not rest until I brought his murderer to justice, and I resolved that no means in my power should be spared to discover, arrest, and punish the author of that most villainous butchery.'"

The Governor went to work in earnest. He caused process to be issued, and offered a large reward on his own account, for the arrest of the murderer. The result was, the guilty man was discovered, arrested, indicted for murder in the first degree, and committed to await his trial. The proof on which he was committed, says this same work, "clearly and positively established that he left the ranks; that he was absent long enough to commit the crimes alleged; that he was seen to take Buffum by the shoulder with one hand, and to shoot him with the other, calling him, as the dying man testified, a d—d Abolitionist, and that he was in possession of the stolen horses." What subsequently became of him shall appear from a dispatch of Colonel H. T. Titus to Governor Geary, which I will read:

LECOMPTON, November 21, 1856.

SIR: I have the honor to state that during your recent absence from this place, a writ of habeas corpus, issued by Chief Justice Lecompte, was served on me, by which I was commanded to produce the body of Charles Hays before him, with the cause of his detainer. That in obedience to the writ, I caused the body of Hays to be produced before Judge Lecompte, and returned as the cause of his detention the finding by the grand jury of a true bill of indictment against him for murder in the first degree, committed upon the person of one David C. Buffum; together with your warrant commanding the rearrest of said Hays, and his detention until his discharge by a jury of his country, according to law. I have further to state that Judge Lecompte discharged the said Hays from my custody, notwithstanding my return, and that he is now at large.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

H. T. TITUS.

His Excellency JOHN W. GEARY,
Governor of Kansas Territory.

What a sublime spectacle of "reverence for law!" I would do this functionary no injustice. He had once before discharged this culprit on habeas corpus. I know his explanation. Not a witness on behalf of the prosecution was present at the examination. The judge was particular to have them "called;" but, being forty miles away, they did not happen to hear. Witnesses were examined for the prisoner to prove an alibi—the stereotyped defense of villains everywhere—and the district attorney consenting thereto, Hays was discharged on bail! But I have nothing to do with the judge. My business is with the Executive; to show him how justice is administered in Kansas by men who hold their offices at his will, and can be removed whenever he says the word. Remember, too, that I am not now complaining of the murder of Buffum; but of that greater wrong done to community, when the criminal was discharged, unpunished and untied, by the very tribunal which should have exerted itself, as a matter of justice, to send him to the gallows.

As specimen chapters from the judicial history of Kansas, these must suffice. If we look, now, to the acts of ministerial officers in that Territory, we shall find that they were sometimes marvelously thorough. I have before me two accounts of one transaction, strikingly illustrative of the zeal with which they proved their loyalty and reverence for law. These accounts I may publish, though they are too long to be read now. They are from the Lecompton Union and St. Louis Republican, both then administration organs, and gave the Democratic version of what is known among the rebels as "the sacking of Lawrence," on the 20th day of May, 1856.

You may remember, Mr. Chairman, the outlines of that patriotic demonstration. The marshal had been there to execute a writ. It is said that the person to be arrested resisted. The marshal taking this to be the act of the whole town, summoned the rest of mankind to assist him. The people of Lawrence, astonished at his proclamation, assembled en masse, and by unanimous resolves informed the officer of his mistake; that they were ready to assist him in the execution of all legal process, and that they only awaited an opportunity to testify their fidelity to the laws of the country, the Constitution, and the Union. The marshal did not believe them. The posse had been called, and to the number of eight hundred, armed with muskets, rifles, swords, and cannon, they came. He made his arrests, no one resisting him, and dismissed the posse. They were immediately resummoned to the assistance of Sheriff Jones. What they did under his chivalric lead, must be told in the words of these Democratic organs.

The editor of the Union, who was one of the posse, and writes his narrative in camp, says:

"Jones had a great many writs in his hands, but could find no one against whom he held them. He also had an order from the court to demand the surrender of their arms, field and side, and the demolition of the two presses and the free-State hotel as nuisances. The arms were immediately demanded and surrendered, but very few could be found—four pieces of cannon, one two-pound howitzer, and four small pieces, and a few Sharpe's rifles. When they agreed to surrender, our men were marched down in front of the town, and one cannon planted upon their own battlements. Over the largest piece, commanding the Emigrant Aid Hotel, was unfurled the stars and stripes, with this motto:

"You Yankees tremble,
And Abolitionists fall,
Our motto is Southern rights to all."

"The cannon were then brought out and thrown down in front of our lines. During this time appeals were made to Sheriff Jones to save the Aid Society's hotel. This news reached the company's ears, and was received with one universal cry of 'No, no, blow it up! blow it up! We will not injure private property; but our motto is, Destruction to everything belonging to the Aid Society. The court has declared it a nuisance, and we will destroy it.'

"About this time, a banner was seen fluttering in the breeze over the office of the Herald of Freedom. Its color was blood red, with a lone star in the center, and South Carolina above. This banner was placed there by the Carolinians—Messrs. Wright and a Mr. Cross. The effect was tremendous. One tremendous and long-continued shout burst from the ranks. Thus floated in triumph the banner of South Carolina—that single white star, so emblematic of her course in the early history of our sectional disturbances. When every southern State stood almost upon the verge of ceding their dearest rights to the North, South Carolina stood boldly out, the firm and unwavering advocate of southern institutions.

"Thus floated victoriously the first banner of southern rights over the abolition town of Lawrence, unfurled by the noble sons of Carolina, and every whip of its folds seemed a death stroke to Beecher propagandism and the fanatics of the East. Oh that its red folds could have been seen by every southern eye!

"Mr. Jones listened to the many entreaties, and finally replied that it was beyond his power to do anything, and gave the occupants so long to remove all private property from it. He ordered two companies into each printing office to destroy the press. Both presses were broken up and thrown into the streets—the type thrown in the river, and all the material belonging to each office destroyed. After this was accomplished, and the private property removed from the hotel by the different companies, the cannon were brought in front of the house, and directed their destructive blows upon the walls; the building caught on fire, and soon its walls came with a crash to the ground. Thus fell the abolition fortress, and we hope this will teach the Aid Society a good lesson for the future."

The account from the Republican is also so striking in some of its statements, that I must trouble the committee with one or two extracts. That paper says:

"As soon as the deputy [marshal] and posse returned with the prisoners, the troops were dismissed by Colonel Adie, acting for Major Donaldson, and were immediately summoned by him, for Sheriff Jones, to assist in carrying out an order of the United States court. The Emigrant Aid hotel and the two printing offices (the Herald of Freedom and Free State) had been indicted [not tried, convicted, or sentenced, mark you,] for being nuisances, and the sheriff ordered to remove them."

Giving a statement of the demand and surrender of the arms of the free-State men, and of the notice given by the sheriff to the host of the hotel to remove his furniture within two hours, which I pass over, the account proceeds:

"Meanwhile the sheriff proceeded to demolish the two printing presses, which was effectually done in a very short time. Most of the type was thrown into Kansas river, and the cases and presses smashed. This was done with less excitement than could have been expected. Indeed, few excesses were committed. Private property was ordered to be respected, and it was respected. There was no liquor in the ranks, and that accounts for the coolness of our citizen soldiers. It is true that Robinson's house was burned; but that was contrary to express orders."

"At the expiration of two hours, the artillery was drawn up in front of the public entrance of the hotel, and a dozen or fifteen shots fired into it, completely riddling the inside and breaking holes in the walls; and, after shaking the walls with two or three blasts, the structure was fired; and before the sun went down, all that remained of the Aid hotel was a solitary wall, holding itself up as a warning to law-breakers, and seeming to say, 'look at me and beware!'"

Mark, sir, the peculiarities of this new mode of executing process. It was not a mere mob—a gathering of professed marauders in defiance of legal restraints and legal authorities; but, sir, it was professedly the instrument of the law—summoned, organized, directed, and disbanded by officials—Federal officials, too, Mr. Chairman, the agents of the then Administration; for, as I have already shown, every territorial official is only a Federal agent. See, too, what exemplary, thorough agents the Administration had there to do their deeds of burning patriotism. They were not rowdies, not drunken either, but citizen soldiers, cool and sober, under civil orders, and strictly obeying. True, they were ordered not to burn a certain house, and did it; but that was only a trifle when we consider how completely they vindicated the authorities, leaving only one smoked and blackened wall to say to all lawbreakers, "look at me, and beware!" It was a thorough job, sir, which left only that dumb yet speaking monument of its completeness!

Sir, the President, about that time, was, I believe, in this country, and therefore his knowledge of this transaction may fairly be presumed. Does any friend of his remember that, in view of it, he wrung his hands, and cried out in the words of the beautiful apostrophe in his message: "Would that the respect for the laws of the land which so eminently distinguished the men of the past generation could be revived?" Or was he as dumb then as he is now as to all wrongs committed by his "law-and-order" men in Kansas?

Observe, again, this was no ordinary mob. If it were, I would pass it unnoticed; for mobs, disgraceful and destructive mobs, are not peculiar to Kansas. It was legalized lawlessness—a specimen of that execution of the laws to which, according to the tone of the message, the freemen of Kansas were bound to submit. Viewed in this light, it becomes an enormity of the deepest dye. I need not say, in the presence of the lawyers of this House, that property, indicted as a nuisance, is not, by any law, to be destroyed without a trial of the question of fact.

Once more, and only once, I return to the message. On the 1st day of December, 1857, acting Governor Stanton summoned the Territorial Legislature to convene on the 7th of that month. Looking into a dispatch of his, contained in the message, we learn that he deemed this course necessary to preserve the peace of the Territory. Turn now to the letter of the Secretary of State to General Denver, of the date of December 11, and, strange to say, you will find that for this very act Governor Stanton was removed from office! Will it be replied, the President did not know his motive in convening the Legislature? The answer is ready. He could have waited until he learned it. There was no necessity for such hot haste.

Sir, I have done with the sickening record. The message has gone to the country. Let it go. I shall ask my constituents to read it. I hope it will be read by every voter in the land; and when next the people in the North utter their voice at the ballot-box, my word for it, sir, they will pronounce a verdict upon its author similar to that long since pronounced by posterity on those who libeled the patriots of revolutionary times.

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman from Virginia will give way, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BOYCE. I have a few remarks to submit to the committee; and if the gentleman from Virginia will yield me the floor I will submit them this evening. I will not occupy more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I must object to any farming out of the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. If I yield the floor, the time occupied by the gentleman from South Carolina will be deducted from my hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, I consider the question of coercing the Mormons of Utah, involved in the bill to increase the Army, as one of the gravest nature. This singular people, the wonder and the opprobrium of the age, have established themselves in the heart of this continent, at a vast distance from the civilized world, and separated from it by vast deserts and mountains. Their voluntary exodus from the Christian world, their selection of the great central basin for the seat of their power, their peculiar system of religion, their domestic institutions, so opposed to the spirit of the age, their singular unanimity of action—all excite our astonishment. Whatever else we may think, there is one thing we must all perceive, that they are actuated by the fiercest fanaticism. They are, what we have not recently seen in the civilized world, an entire community of fanatics. It has been apprehended, from their first development in Utah, that we would have trouble with them, and the apprehension is now being realized. Mr. Fillmore has been a good deal censured for permitting their great leader, Brigham Young, to act as Governor of the Territory. This was not the wish of Mr. Fillmore; but the result of a supposed political necessity. Perhaps it would have been wiser to have met the question then, for it has only been postponed, and comes up for a solution now, when they are far stronger than they were then. The same considerations of political necessity acting on Mr. Fillmore acted also on Mr. Pierce, and Brigham Young was permitted to remain in office as Governor. The public mind of the United States, during the administration of Mr. Pierce, seemed to become fixed in opposition to the retention of Brigham Young in power by the Federal Government. One of the political parties of the country, in the recent presidential election, made opposition to the Mormons one of the planks in their political platform. Influenced, perhaps, in some degree, by the laudable desire of meeting the wishes of the country, and, also, I have no doubt, upon general views of public policy, the present Administration determined to supersede Brigham Young as Governor, and appointed Mr. Cumming to the position, a gentleman well fitted for the place.

During the period that Brigham Young had been allowed to act as Governor, though we had some cause of complaint, yet there was no general revolt against the authority of the United States. Having things pretty much their own way, the Mormons seemed formally to submit to our authority. Individual Gentiles complained of bad treatment; some of the Government officials in the Territory also complained; but a formal obedience was kept up. The emigrant trains to California passed through Utah, as a general rule, undisturbed. But recently matters have changed. The effort upon the part of our Government to put Governor Cumming in authority has been resisted by force, and we appear to be on the eve of a war with the Mormons. A portion of the army, with Governor Cumming, are in the mountains of Utah waiting for reinforcements with which to begin their march, and put the question to the arbitrament of the sword. This is a sad spectacle in a Republic, and demands our serious consideration.

The question is before us now, what shall we do with the Mormons? We must decide upon it; we cannot postpone it if we would. Fortunately, it is a question with which nothing of sectionalism mingles. The laws of Utah, it is true, recognize and provide for slavery, but there are no slaves there. Utah, while it is technically a slave community, is actually a free community. The President of the United States has simply undertaken to perform his duty in seeing that the laws are executed in Utah. He has no power to institute a policy, though he may suggest one; he can only enforce the laws as they exist. It is for Congress to determine the policy to be pursued in reference to these people. Whatever that policy may be, I have no doubt the President will carry it out, as far as it depends upon him, and is possible.

War, even with a foreign nation, is a grave matter; not to be gone into inconsiderately. But domestic war, war upon a portion of our own people, even if they be fanatics, madmen, fools, rebels, traitors, is a matter of far graver importance. The genius of our Government in its internal relations, is peace. It is presumed that the laws will enforce themselves; that the people will submit to the laws. Though force is not excluded from our system, yet it is considered a sad alternative, only to be resorted to in the last extremity. Such a condition of affairs as exists in Utah was, I apprehend, never considered as possible by the framers of the Constitution. That a whole people should rise in arms and defy the central Government in the exercise of its undoubted authority, without even a plausible pretext, never entered into their minds. They had no conception that an American Mohammed would rise up in the United States in the middle of the nineteenth century and promulgate a new dispensation, made up of Christianity and Oriental sensuality, which should fascinate multitudes, and establish a distinct nationality in the bosom of the Rocky Mountains. The condition of Utah, then, is one which, while it has no precedent in our history, will, I trust, for the sake of humanity, have no imitation.

Before we undertake to determine what we should do in reference to the Mormons, it is necessary that we should understand precisely what we wish to accomplish, the benefit to be attained, or the evil to be averted. Utah is settled almost exclusively by Mormons; there is scarcely a handful of Gentiles—as those are called who do not adopt their faith—there. So far as good government, order, and obedience to law is concerned in Utah among the Mormons, it is a matter of very small importance to us, except from the general desire we have that even the Mormons should prosper. But as that region of country is not now wanted for settlement by our citizens generally other than Mormons, and is not likely to be wanted for an indefinite period, we would have no special motive to exert our power to restore order, so far as the interests of the inhabitants of that region may be concerned. If, therefore, Utah, instead of being in the center of the continent, on the highway of our emigration to the Pacific, were in some other portion of our dominion not traversed by emigrants, we might feel under no necessity to concern ourselves about their proceedings, no more than we do about remote tribes of Indians. But the local position of Utah, the fact that our great emigration trains to the Pacific coast must necessarily pass through Utah, or make a considerable detour to the north or the south, invests the condition of affairs in Utah with great practical importance to us. So far as the people of Utah are concerned, we might, without loss to ourselves, abandon them to their own anarchy or madness. The only practical aspect of the case of immediate interest is the necessity we are under of preserving undisturbed our communications through the middle route to our Pacific possessions. It seems to me that this is the extent of our present practical interest in the question. If all Utah were to transform itself into Pandemonium, it would not materially affect us, provided our communications were left undisturbed. While we should, of course, desire to see order in Utah, yet no degree of disorder would at all disturb us, except in the single matter of having our communications disturbed. This is, I think, fairly stating the extent of the present practical interest we have in the Utah question; it is to continue the central route, open and undisturbed, to the Pacific.

There are two modes of solving the Mormon question—first, by peaceful means; second, by force. There can be no doubt that the first mode is infinitely the best, if it can be made efficacious. The peaceful mode is more congenial to the spirit of our institutions. Our Government is, and should be, reluctant to draw the sword against any portion of the people. It is dangerous to inaugurate the reign of the sword in our Republic. The great leading idea upon which our Government proceeds is that all government rests on the consent of the governed. Whilst on the one hand we have not been able entirely to ignore the sword in enforcing the laws, yet we should be very careful not to proceed to this fatal extremity except under the most imperative necessity. The Spanish Republics on this continent could never settle any dispute without the sword. The result is they are all dying out from the fatal effects of their own violence. For my part, I shall be sorry to see a question involving the fate of so large a portion of our population as this Utah question, incapable of any other solution than civil war. We have had two rebellions in our history; the first, Shay's rebellion in Massachusetts during the Confederation, and the Whisky Insurrection in Pennsylvania, since the formation of the existing Constitution. In both of these instances order was finally restored without the effusion of blood. Massachusetts, by a course of singular prudence and firmness, succeeded in subjugating their rebels without a battle, though hostile armies were actually in the field.

It became the duty of General Washington, the then President, to deal with the Pennsylvania insurgents. In reading the history of that period, we are struck with the forbearance with which Washington treated the insurgents. He sent commissioners to remonstrate with them; and exerted every possible means to solve the difficulty by a peaceful solution. When all peaceful means seemed to have failed, he displayed a strong military force, and advanced against the insurgents with the power of the Government, still tending peace. The result justified the wisdom of Washington. The supremacy of the law was established without bloodshed. General Washington was a man of profound wisdom; though it was an easy matter for the Government to beat down the rebellion, and extinguish it in the blood of the insurgents, yet he knew that the Government could not strike any portion of the people without wounding itself. The same grave consideration which made General Washington reluctant to shed the blood of misguided men in Pennsylvania, makes me anxious, if possible, to avoid the calamity in Utah. I am unwilling, if it can possibly be avoided, to put a whole community of our people to the sword, great as their errors or their crimes may be. It is a dangerous precedent. I would avoid it if possible. I fear its consequences.

Peaceful solution costs nothing; whereas war will entail an expenditure of the most astonishing amount. It will be the most expensive military expedition, to the force employed, ever set on foot in modern times. Utah is eleven hundred miles from the Missouri; a land passage through an uncultivated wilderness; a portion of the way through deserts and difficult mountains. Subsistence will have to be carried by wagons from the Missouri; even the animals with the army cannot be sustained at all seasons along the route by the native grasses. The expedition of Napoleon to Moscow has been looked upon as a great folly. Yet Moscow was only five hundred miles from Napoleon's supplies in Poland. It will take tons of gold to support our troops in Utah. The expense of the army there will, I believe, amount to $3,000 per man for the year. The Seminole war cost something in the neighborhood of one hundred million dollars. The Seminole war was a war with a few hundred savages, in a country easily approachable by sea, and to which supplies could be readily carried. A war with the Mormons will have to be carried on at a vast distance from our supplies, eleven hundred miles, against a people mad with fanaticism, and able to bring ten thousand fighting men into the field. It is true, the Mormons have not the swamps of Florida; but they have the mountains and boundless plains, and vast desert steppes of Utah. To prosecute successfully the war in Utah will require an expenditure absolutely astounding. I say, then, that the peaceful adjustment of this difficulty is a great economy.

The peaceful mode of solving the Mormon question is the most conformable to humanity. No one wishes to shed the blood of this misguided people. However great may be their errors or their crimes, they are still a portion of our people, entitled to our protection and good offices. To devastate their country and shed their blood cannot but be a most painful alternative. A government glorifies itself on the victories gained by its armies over a foreign foe; it regrets those gained over its own people. It erects triumphal arches to perpetuate the memory of the first; it draws a veil of oblivion over the second. When we consider the infinite miseries we shall inflict upon the people of Utah by an offensive war, we cannot but deplore the necessity, and, if possible, endeavor to avoid it. If we could punish the guilty leaders alone, it would be well enough; but we cannot reach them, except by destroying a vast number of their misguided followers. As a matter of humanity, then, we should be glad to escape from the necessity of making war upon this people.

The peaceful solution of the question, besides the advantages I have already mentioned, is also by far the most efficacious. If we can restore order in Utah without bloodshed, then we will have accomplished all we desire. Law and order will reign there; we will have avoided all the evils and sacrifices of war, and secured the object we have in view; the rebellion will have ceased to exist, and our communications will be open and undisturbed to the Pacific. It is evident, then, that the peaceful solution of the question is the best, if it be possible. The material question, then, in this regard, is, whether this peaceful solution be possible? If it be possible, we should resort to it.

Now, is it possible? This can never be known until the experiment is fairly made. I am not sanguine that it would succeed, but still I do not see why it should not; at any rate it is worth while to make the effort. One advantage of this mode is, that if you try it, and fail, then force is still open to you. Whereas, if you try force first, and fail, in vain will you resort to negotiation; force failing, you have no other resource but acquiescence in defeat.

Mankind are usually controlled by their interests. The Mormons are scarcely exempt from the operation of this universal principle. It is clearly their interest to adjust their difficulties with this Government peacefully. They cannot but realize the fact, that if we exert our power against them we must drive them before us, destroy their cities, and inflict a multitude of evils upon them. Besides even the injuries we may inflict upon them by actual war in their country, we can subject them to great inconvenience, by cutting off all trade with them, thus interrupting the supply of many articles of prime necessity. Furthermore, the corner-stone of their policy is addition to their power by foreign immigration, which we can entirely cut off from them. Besides, our annual appropriations for their territorial government is a very convenient addition to their income. From these considerations, and others which will naturally suggest themselves, it is clearly the interest of the Mormons to listen to reason, especially when that reason is backed by the great power of our Government. I think, therefore, the prospect of success is sufficiently great to induce us to resort to negotiations with this people. The wisdom of resorting to pacific measures first is sustained by another view of the case. Brigham Young has impressed the Mormons with the idea that this Government wishes to interfere with their religion, to punish them for their polygamy, and generally to crush and destroy them. I have no idea that Brigham Young believes any such thing; but it is his policy to have it believed by his people. It is our policy to disabuse the people of this false impression. This false idea is a tower of strength for Brigham Young. Let us so act as to overthrow this tower. If we can remove this impression from the popular mind in Utah, Brigham Young will be shorn of a large portion of his strength. The people of Utah may proceed to the most desperate extremities if they believe that our purpose is to destroy them, that we are naturally hostile to them, and are seizing upon pretexts to subjugate them. Let us pursue such a line of policy as will circumvent the policy of Brigham Young. Brigham Young wishes us to manifest nothing but the most settled hostility to the Mormons, in order to consolidate his power over them. Let us do exactly the thing he does not wish us to do. Let us go to the utmost verge of moderation; let us manifest our intentions of peace, of kindness, and generosity, in the most unmistakable manner to these people; let us, before a gun is fired, gain a moral victory over Brigham Young. That moral victory may supersede the necessity of resorting to force. If it does not accomplish that much, it will weaken the grasp of the Mormon hand upon the sword, and cannot but operate favorably to us in the progress of the struggle. The Mormons can only be stimulated to the resistance of desperation by having their minds poisoned as to the purposes of this Government. A resort to a peaceful policy will be the most effectual way of counteracting the diseased condition of the public mind in Utah. It has been forcibly said, that "the pen is mightier than the sword." There is infinite truth in this, as expressive of the greater power of ideas over materialism. I would try the force of ideas on the Mormons before resorting to the scourge of humanity, the sword. Let our Government present itself to them in the image of a generous, kind, paternal, and affectionate Government, anxious, if possible, to forgive even them; and if this fails, then let destiny take its course.

But let us now suppose that all efforts to settle matters peaceably in Utah shall have failed, and that the sword must be drawn—that terrible instrument of the avenging Nemesis, which even Christianity has not been able to supersede; let us suppose that the sword must be restored to its old office of sprinkling the bosom of mother earth with the blood of the children of men: what then? There are two modes of prosecuting this war:

1. By what I shall call offensive war; invasion, destruction, devastation.

2. By cutting off all communication with Utah, placing the Mormons in quarantine, letting none come out and none go in, and guarding our trains of emigrants over the northern and southern routes.

As regards the first mode, I shall say nothing of the distance of Utah from us, practically further than Europe, nor of the difficulty of carrying subsistence so far, nor of the difficult approaches through wild gorges in the mountains, nor of the army of fierce fanatics to be encountered. I shall say nothing of all these, because such is my confidence in our indomitable Army, that I believe we shall carry everything before us, and plant our victorious standards in the heart of their sacred city. I grant you that we shall beat down the Mormon chivalry upon the plains of Utah. But what I fear is, that our greatest success will be our greatest disaster. The defeat of the Mormons will, I fear, be the dispersion of the Mormons through the boundless plains and vast mountain ranges of the middle of the continent. Once they are thus dispersed, they become a fierce banditti; every mountain gorge will resound with the crack of their unerring rifles. Their very women will give forth from their envenomed wombs a race of monsters more horrible than Milton describes as pursuing Sin at the gates of hell. Confederated with the Indian tribes, a race of American Arabs, they will become enemies of the human race. In vain will your emigrant trains endeavor to cross the center of the continent. The march of every train would be a succession of battles, and you will have upon your hands, for a hundred years, a perpetual war with banditti. Study the physical geography of the globe, and nowhere else do you find a vast conformation of the earth's surface so well adapted to tribes of robbers as the great basin of the Salt Lake.

I said in the beginning, that the immediate practical interest we had in the Mormon question was securing our emigrant routes to the Pacific. This interest, I fear, will be more endangered by a successful war against the Mormons than in any other way. We wish a railroad; we wish the telegraph wires to "wreak themselves upon expression" through the center of the continent. How can you accomplish either of these great ideas, after you have driven the Mormons in desperation and fury to the mountains? My objection to offensive war is, that, even if successful, it defeats, more completely than anything else, the very purpose we have in view—securing our communications with the Pacific.

The second mode of employing force against the Mormons, shutting them up in Utah, interrupting all communication with them, seems to me the wisest kind of force to adopt towards them, at least at first. By that mode, with proper criminal legislation, we may place the Mormons in such circumstances as may make them willing to obey the laws. The only inconvenience this mode of procedure will cost us will be some addition, perhaps, to our military strength, and a more circuitous route for our emigrant trains. The question is not free from difficulty in any aspect. We should choose the least of evils. Let us try peaceful means if they be possible; then the isolating process. If all fail, then war outright will still be left to us. In the mean time something may turn up in the chapter of events. There may be a schism among the Mormons, or something else that may give us the opportunity of acting to more advantage.

There is one consideration should not be overlooked in this Mormon question. It is this: that the greatest danger to the integrity of the Mormon faith is prosperity. The greater their material, moral, intellectual development, the less hold a false faith will have upon them; the more likelihood of woman asserting her divine mission among them. In short, the more they become civilized, the less they are Mormons. This development will most certainly take place by peace. Mormonism may be eternal among nomadic tribes, Arabs, or banditti; it must perish out under the blaze of civilization. Prosperity will destroy Mormonism; slowly, it may be, but certainly. The Turks, the Mormons of Europe, are perishing from contact with civilization. They only proclaim a great philosophical principle when they recognize that they are only camping on this side of the Bosphorus, and that it is their destiny to return into Asia. Civilization is death to Mohammedanism or Mormonism. Let us not lose sight of this consideration in determining our policy towards the Mormons.

Before I close, I would cite the House to some remarks of Mr. Burke, in the British Parliament, on the subject of coercing the American colonies. Mr. Burke, in his celebrated speech on conciliation with the American colonies, says:

"First, sir, permit me to observe that the use of force alone is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment, but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered."

Suppose you defeat the Mormons in a series of battles, and they do not fly to the mountains, but remain sullen, yielding an enforced obedience under the shadow of their holy temple: how long will this last? As soon as you have withdrawn your troops they trample your authority under foot. It will be necessary to keep a large military force permanently in Utah. Do you propose to do this? It will be a very expensive operation.

Again, Mr. Burke says:

"We have no sort of experience in favor of force as an instrument in the rule of our colonies. Their growth and their utility have been owing to methods altogether different. The last cause of this disobedient spirit—the colonies is hardly less powerful than the rest, as it is not merely moral, but laid deep in the natural condition of things. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between you and them. No contrivance can prevent the effect of this distance in weakening government. Seas roll, and months pass, between the order and the execution; and the want of a speedy explanation of a single point is enough to defeat a whole system. You have, indeed, your winged ministers of vengeance who carry your bolts in their pounces to the remotest verge of the sea. But there is a power steps in, that limits the arrogance of raging passions and furious elements, and says, 'so far shalt thou go, and no further.' Who are you? that you should fret and rage and bite the chains of nature? Nothing worse happens to you than does to all nations who have extensive empire, and it happens in all the forms into which empire can be thrown. In large bodies the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Nature has said it. The Turk cannot govern Egypt and Arabia and Cardistan, as he governs Thrace; nor has he the same dominion in the Crimea and Algiers which he has at Brusa and Smyrna. Despotism itself is obliged to truck and huckster. The Sultan gets such obedience as he can. He governs with a loose rein, that he may govern at all; and the whole of the force and vigor of his authority in his center is derived from a prudent relaxation in all his borders. Spain in her provinces is perhaps not so well obeyed as you are in yours. She complies too, she submits, she watches time. This is the immutable condition, the eternal law, of extensive and detached empire."

I will not make the application of these remarks to the present condition of affairs. I only commend them to the consideration of this House and the country.

This Mormon question is a great question. It is not one of those common-place matters which you can summarily dispose of. It is not a question of partisanship, but a question of statesmanship. You may turn from it, but there is Utah; there are the Mormons; there is the cancer on your body-politic. How will you get rid of it? Will you strike at it with the sword? Those rough remedies sometimes aggravate the disease. It needs, in my opinion, to be dealt with gently, and with consummate wisdom. With these remarks I leave the question, at least for the present.

Mr. REAGAN took the floor.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. I understood that the gentleman from Virginia only yielded the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BOYCE,] and is entitled to it now to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the rules to be that when a gentleman yields the floor he yields it altogether. The gentleman from Virginia yielded the floor; and having obtained it, I now desire to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman only yielded the floor temporarily to the gentleman from South Carolina, the time occupied by him to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. I so understood it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia, then, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. How many minutes of my time have been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will yield to me for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. LETCHER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GROW. I then submit the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLORENCE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 6, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with amendments, and with a recommendation that it do pass; that the committee had also had under consideration the bill of the House No. 306, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the year ending the 30th June, 1858, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOWIE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion, to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at ten minutes before five o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State in Congress to use their efforts to prevent the removal or change in the location of the Sebastian Indian reservation, in California; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY presented a petition of several residents and property holders of Montgomery county, Maryland, praying that the plank road in the District of Columbia leading into that county may be made free of tolls; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Webster B. Steele, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to use their influence to prevent the repeal of the law allowing bounties to vessels engaged in the cod fisheries; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of operatives and citizens of Blair county, Pennsylvania, praying that a sufficient protection may be extended to American labor engaged in the manufacture of iron; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES presented the memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Mineral Point, Wisconsin, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Emma A. Wood, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish for the information of the Senate, a statement of the progress of the report of Major W. H. Emory, on the United States and Mexican boundary survey, together with the cost of engraving the maps, views, sections, &c., pertaining to this report, specifying the several classes of maps and illustrations, and the number in each class, and where those maps and illustrations are being executed, and by what authority, and who are now engaged upon the preparation of materials for the continuation of this report, how many volumes it will require to complete the work, at what time the compilation will be complete and prepared for delivery to the Public Printer, and an estimate of the approximate cost of publishing the entire work, if it be within his power, as ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 192) to provide for the general introduction of an international code of marine signals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLARK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 197) providing for the arrest and return of fugitives from justice in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 41) for the relief of Manuel Leisa, Joachim Leisa, and others, and to provide for the location of certain private land claims, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of A. S. H. White, reported a bill (S. No. 195) for the relief of Ashton S. H. White; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of A. Waterhouse and others, reported a bill (S. No. 193) authorizing the issuing of certain bounty land warrants to the legal representatives of deceased persons entitled thereto; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of James Bawden, reported a bill (S. No. 194) for the relief of James Bawden; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 196) authorizing the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States to enter a certain tract of land in the State of Wisconsin. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

JOHN HAMILTON.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back to the Senate, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton. I should like to have the bill considered, and put on its passage at once.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $200, with interest from the 1st of June, 1852, to John Hamilton, of Champaign county, Ohio, in full compensation for his time, services, &c., during his imprisonment with the Indians in the war of 1812 with Great Britain.

The bill was reported to the Senate; ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the Senate joint resolution to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

"Except as to any case pending, undetermined, before any court of inquiry under the act of the 17th of January, 1857, at the expiration thereof."

The Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate reported back the amendment of the House of Representatives, with an amendment to strike out "17th" and insert "16th," which was agreed to; and the pending question is on the following amendment, offered by Mr. FESSENDEN, to add to the House amendment:

And excepting, also, the case of any officer who was absent from the country at the time of the passage of said act, and had not returned previous to the 16th of January, 1858, and any such officer shall be entitled to all the privileges conferred by said act: Provided, He applies for the benefit thereof at any time within sixty days after his return.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi, who is now absent, [Mr. DAVIS,] gave notice of an amendment; but it has not been offered.

Mr. STUART. I would inquire if there was not also an amendment proposed to change the date from the 17th to the 16th of January?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to. But the absent Senator from Mississippi gave notice of his intention to offer an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the resolution and amendment lie on the table informally.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a motion in reference to the business of the committee of which I am chairman. We have a large accumulation of business in the Committee on Private Land Claims, but have not sufficient help to dispose of it. We have now sent to us all the private land claims from New Mexico. I have the consent of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. POLK] to move that he be added to that committee. He is familiar with that class of business, and his services would be exceedingly valuable to us. I hope there will be no objection to his being added to that committee. I make that motion.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no serious objection to the passage of the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, with an amendment. The Senator from Missouri is upon the Committee on Claims, of which I have the honor to be chairman, and that committee is probably the most laborious committee of the Senate. It has a vast number of cases to examine, some of them of a very complicated character; and I understand the Senator from Missouri is also upon another committee already. If we now put him on the Committee on Private Land Claims, which is also a very laborious committee, it will detach him from the service of the other committees of which he is a member. I have no objection to letting him go on the Committee on Private Land Claims, provided the Senate will give the Committee on Claims another member. We have now but five; and I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, so as to add another member to the Committee on Claims, to be appointed by the Chair.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would inquire if we can add to our committees without changing the fixed rule which provides the number of which each committee shall consist? Can this rule be altered on a mere motion?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that this is not a proposition for a permanent increase of the number of the members who constitute the Committee on Private Land Claims. This motion, if acceded to by the Senate, will expire by its own limitation on the termination of the present session. It does not change our rule. It merely gives a temporary additional force to a committee which is overcharged with business. I do not think we are changing the permanent rule, or affecting it. I do not propose to make any change in the rule which says the Committee on Private Land Claims shall be composed of a certain number of members; but simply that, for the time being, the Senator from Missouri, who is willing to give us his assistance, be added by the Senate to the committee. It is not a change of the rule at all, that I propose.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman is more astute, probably, in legal discriminations than I am, but I cannot understand why the addition to a committee does not change the rule. That the addition is to be but temporary, does not remove my objection. It is, for the time being, pro hac vice, a change of the rule. I take it, if we have a committee composed of five, and we make it six, and that man vote in committee, he determines the report. If, by his casting vote, he determine the report, it makes it a different committee for the time being, and, consequently, a different rule for the time being. I ask for the decision of the Chair whether this is not, in effect and practically, a change of the rule? and whether this change can be made in this manner?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, upon reference to the rules, thinks the point taken by the Senator from Vermont is well taken.

Mr. BIGGS. I suppose, however, it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLAMER. But I do not consent to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia to say his committee was composed of but five members.

Mr. IVERSON. That is under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides, then, that both of these motions are out of order, objection being made.

Mr. IVERSON. If I am in order, I should like to move to add another member to the Committee on Claims. I am satisfied, from my experience on it, that we have not enough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can give notice of a motion to change the rules in that respect.

Mr. IVERSON. I give notice, then, of my intention to move to change the rules to-morrow in that respect.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. As there seems to be nothing of pressing importance before the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. STUART. I am entirely willing that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of that bill if my colleague is ready to proceed with his remarks on it.

Mr. GREEN. He is ready. I consulted him on the subject.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it was not my intention originally to participate in the debate on the Lecompton constitution. I had intended to leave the subject to older and abler and more experienced colleagues; but the occasion seems to me to be so great, and the consequences which may result from our decision so dangerous, that I cannot permit this bill to pass without, at least, entering my protest against it. I shall oppose this bill for the following reasons: First, because the whole matter was conceived and executed in fraud; second, because this constitution does not emanate from the people of Kansas Territory, or express their will; third, because it is one of a series of aggressions on the part of the slave power, which, if permitted to be consummated, must end in the subversion of the Constitution and the Union; and, fourth, because it strikes a death blow at State sovereignty and popular rights. I shall proceed as briefly as possible to give the reasons upon which I base these objections.

It is well known, sir, that, at the close of the revolutionary war, and at the formation of this Federal Government, all the States of the Union were slave States, but all looked upon slavery as an unmitigated evil; and all looked forward hopefully to the day when it should no longer exist. No man, then, was bold enough to advocate the extension of slavery or even its long continuance, but all looked forward to an early period when it should cease to exist. These views being prevalent throughout the land, one of the early acts of the Continental Congress was the adoption of the ordinance of 1787, forever prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude in all the then Territories of these United States. This was itself a southern measure to a considerable extent, although, at that time, there was no diversity of opinion in regard to it. Some of the northern States, as was well known, intended to abolish slavery at a very early day, while some of the southern States desired that it might be deferred to a much later period. Those States which expected to be cursed, as they then termed it, with the institution for a longer period, desired the power of reclaiming their fugitives from service or labor if they should escape. Those States that proposed soon to abolish the institution yielded that power; and upon that compromise the ordinance of 1787 was adopted. Many of the members of the Constitutional Convention were likewise members of the Continental Congress, and the ordinance of 1787 was one of the compromises which led to the adoption of the Constitution itself; and, without that ordinance, it is extremely doubtful whether that instrument would ever have been adopted by the States.

This was a finality upon the slavery question. It settled that question forever. No further agitation ever could take place upon the subject of slavery; it was supposed, under that compromise. The settlement was this: slavery was a creature of municipal law; it was left to the States in which it then existed to continue it or abolish it, whenever they might see fit; and in all the Territories of the United States it was forever prohibited. This was the finality of a finality. There never could be any further agitation of the question of slavery in the Union, under it.

Under this settlement, the country remained in peace for more than thirty years. No agitation of the subject took place, and none could take place, for it was not in a position to be agitated. I say the country remained in peace for more than thirty years, and until the State of Missouri applied for admission into the Union as a slave State. During the intermediate time, the Louisiana territory had been purchased, and Louisiana had been admitted as a slave State, without objection on the part of the North. It was quietly assented to; scarcely a protest was entered against it; but when Missouri applied for admission as a slave State, the North objected to the admission of any more slave States, and declared that it was not only distinctly understood, but agreed to, that no more slave States should ever be admitted into this Union. The North claimed that that was the basis of the original compromise, the ordinance of 1787. Agitation ran high. The South then, as now, threatened a dissolution of the Union, unless all her imperious demands were assented to. The North then, as now, denied her right or her power to dissolve the Union for any such reason, or for any reason.

During this excitement the hearts of brave men quailed in view of the danger to the Constitution and the Union, and finally a proposition of compromise was brought into Congress from the South, as a southern measure. The compromise was upon this basis: you of the North consent to the admission of Missouri as a slave State, with the tacit understanding that when Arkansas applies she shall likewise be admitted as a slave State; and we will guaranty to you forever that the ordinance of 1787 shall be spread over all the territory lying north of 36° 30'. So utterly objectionable was this compromise to the North, that not a single man who voted for it was ever heard of again, politically, at the North. Each northern man who voted for that compromise voted for his own death-warrant, politically—not as has been asserted at the North, because they voted to prohibit slavery north of 36° 30', but because they voted to admit the State of Missouri as a slave State into this Union. For that they were blamed, and not for assenting to the restrictive line.

But, sir, the compromise was adopted, and peace again reigned throughout the land. The question was settled, and settled forever. Here was another finality, so far as agitation upon that subject was concerned. The South was to have the State of Missouri and the State of Arkansas by tacit consent, whenever she should apply for admission into the Union; the North, as an equivalent, was guarantied all of that territory lying north of 36° 30' forever. The South received her equivalent in the States of Missouri and Arkansas; the North waited patiently for the day when she should receive hers. The compromise was acquiesced in, and again the country had peace so far as agitation on the slavery question was concerned, and continued at peace, with some slight ripples here and there, until Texas applied for admission into the Union. Then again there was an agitation; then again the Union was threatened, and threatened from the South; then again another compromise was entered into; to wit, a renewal of the Missouri line. The country remained in peace until, in process of time, a new light broke upon the vision of the people of these United States; to wit, the light of popular sovereignty. It so happened that many of the slave States, during the fall of 1847, in solemn political conventions resolved that they would support no man for the Presidency who was not opposed to the principles of the Wilmot proviso, so called. In December, 1847, my illustrious predecessor, for reasons best known to himself—although he had time and again expressed his regret that the Hon. John Davis, of Massachusetts, should have talked against time to the end of a session, thus depriving him of the power of recording his vote for the Wilmot proviso—wrote the "Nicholson letter," in which he said:

"But certain it is that the principle of interference should not be carried beyond the necessary implication which produces it. It should be limited to the creation of proper governments for new countries, acquired or settled, and to the necessary provision for their eventual admission into the Union, leaving, in the mean time, to the people inhabiting them to regulate their internal concerns in their own way. They are just as capable of doing so as the people of the States."

Here, sir, permit me to say, you find the basis of the Democratic Cincinnati platform, which has been commented on time and again; here you find the basis of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and, in fact, you find the basis of this very Lecompton constitution in the Nicholson letter. This was the first time this doctrine was inaugurated at the North: scarcely a man at the South ever uttered the sentiment. But I will read further:

"Briefly, then, I am opposed to the exercise of any jurisdiction by Congress over this matter; and I am in favor of leaving to the people of any territory which may be hereafter acquired the right to regulate it for themselves under the general principles of the Constitution."

"Subject only to the Constitution," I believe, in the new version; but this is the original text.

"Leave to the people who will be affected by this question, to adjust it upon their own responsibility, and in their own manner, and we shall render another tribute to the principles of our Government, and furnish another guarantee for its permanence and prosperity."

There, sir, is the origin of this great fraud upon the North, yclept "popular sovereignty," and "perfect freedom for the people of a Territory to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." It is true, that when the doctrine of squatter sovereignty was first introduced, some of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber entered a faint protest, but it was so faint that it never reached the ears of northern men; and when on the stump, before the people of my State, I asserted that the doctrine which is now introduced here as the doctrine of the Constitution, was the doctrine of the Democratic party, I was told that that was not the doctrine of the Democratic party; that it was merely the opinion of some few southern fire-eaters; that the great national Democratic party was firmly planted on the principles of squatter sovereignty, the right of the people of the Territories to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, including the institution of slavery.

Sir, up to the writing of the Nicholson letter, the right of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the Territories of the United States was never called in question. No Executive of the United States ever doubted it; no Congress of the United States ever doubted their full power to legislate for the Territories as they saw fit; and up to that date the Supreme Court never doubted the power of Congress to legislate on slavery in the Territories as they saw fit. That was the inauguration of a new principle; to wit, the principle of squatter sovereignty—not popular sovereignty, as is here explained, but squatter sovereignty—the right of the people to introduce or prohibit slavery in the Territories, while they were in a territorial condition.

The South held up the glittering fantasy of a presidential nomination before the eager eyes of the northern aspirants for that honor, and at the same time exhibited the Nicholson letter, as the highest bid that was made, and asked, "who bids higher?" Mr. Fillmore followed with the fugitive slave law and the compromise measures of 1850. Mr. Webster followed again, with his 7th of March speech; and last, though not least, came the repeal of the Missouri compromise line.

I do not propose to discuss the repeal of the Missouri compromise. If I should enter upon that discussion, I should only weary the Senate, for I should not know where to leave off. I look upon it as the greatest fraud ever perpetrated before the eyes of this nation. The price had been paid, and the terms of the bargain were repudiated after one side had received the equivalent. It was a violation of a solemn compact. But I do not propose to go into the discussion of it at this time.

But, sir, how did you pay those men who were bidding and overbidding, and outbidding each other for presidential nominations? First, to the writer of the Nicholson letter you gave the empty honor of a nomination for the Presidency, and then defeated him by southern votes; to the second, you refused even the poor compliment of a nomination in a national convention, when it was well known to everybody that under no circumstances could he have been elected if he had received the nomination. The third you consigned to the grave. He received but four southern votes in the convention to which I have just referred, and it broke his heart. The fourth you are now pursuing with all the powers of this Government; with the keen scent of the blood-hound; you are after his scalp; and yet, sir, this Administration owes to him, more than to any other man, its present possession of power. There are three men in this nation to whom the present Administration owe their present position more than to any other three thousand men in the United States. Those men it is needless for me to name, although I will do so. One of them is the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] another Mr. Walker, late Governor of Kansas, and the third is John W. Forney, of Pennsylvania. But for these men, James Buchanan, President of the United States, would be rusticated at Wheatland, instead of occupying the White House. Poor pay indeed have they got for their subserviency to southern interests, and their rejection of the principles upon which they had previously acted.

Mr. President, while all these aggressions of the slave power were made their cry was, "stand by the Constitution and the Union." I have heard it from every stump in Michigan: it was the rallying cry while they were undermining the Constitution and sapping the foundation of this Union. Although I am not a lawyer, I wish to refer to two or three clauses of the Constitution of the United States; for I claim that it is so plain in language, and its intent so transparent, "that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein." I do not believe that it requires any hair-splitting of lawyers to comprehend that immortal instrument, the Constitution of the United States. It is true that the Supreme Court has endeavored to mystify two or three of its plainest provisions in its late opinion, or late speeches, delivered on a question that was not before it; but, sir, it does not require a lawyer, in my estimation, to show that that instrument is not what they are attempting to make it, and what the framers of it abhorred, a pro-slavery instrument. I claim that slaves are not recognized as property in that instrument anywhere. They lay great stress upon that clause of the Constitution which protects the slave trade for twenty years. I consider that fully, fairly, and forever answered by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] If property in slaves, he said, is based upon that clause of the Constitution allowing the slave trade for twenty years, of course, at the end of those twenty years, that property ceases to receive the protection of that clause of the Constitution; it extends protection to it only for twenty years. But I shall say no more upon that point. There is, however, one other clause upon which the court dwells yet more fully, and that is the fugitive-slave clause, so called:

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Not giving a lawyer's opinion, but the opinion of a man of common sense, if you please, I should say that if that clause proved anything at all, it proved the direct reverse of what the Supreme Court endeavored to make it prove. Is it necessary to introduce into the Constitution a clause protecting property already protected by the very instrument into which that clause is introduced? If slaves were property under the Constitution, were they not property everywhere? If they were protected as property, were they not so protected everywhere? The proposition is an absurdity; and, if there were no other clause in the Constitution upon that point, I should say that that proved conclusively that they were not recognized as property under the general clauses of the Constitution. What would have been thought of a clause like this: "that horses, sheep, cattle, mules, &c., escaping from one State into another, shall be given up on proof of ownership to the person to whom such property belongs?" and yet such a clause would be just as appropriate as that on the subject of fugitive slaves, if they were recognized as property under the Constitution. There was no such right claimed as property in man at that day; and, as was remarked by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] the other day, even the word "servitude," which was in the first draft of that clause of the Constitution, was stricken out on the motion of a distinguished Virginia gentleman, and the word "service" introduced, because servitude might be construed to mean slaves, and service could not. The whole of the debates upon the adoption of the Constitution, show that its framers never meant that it should recognize slaves as property. If they had intended it, is it not a little singular that nowhere throughout the entire instrument can the word "slave" be found, or anything that can be tortured, or ever has been tortured heretofore, into a recognition of slaves as property under the Constitution?

But again, sir, so far from recognizing slaves as property, they spread the common law over that Constitution; they adopted the common law as part and parcel of the Constitution; and it is well known, and settled in numerous cases, that the common law does not, and never was claimed to, recognize property in slaves. Here is a decision of the supreme court of Georgia, in 1851:

"I now consider the decisions of the English courts, upon the subject of slavery, and I think it will be seen that slavery has never been recognized to exist there under the common law. On the contrary, it is well settled that the moment a slave, whether African, Indian, Jew, or Gentile, sets his foot upon British soil he is a freeman, and entitled to the protection of the laws as such."—Neal vs. Farmer, 9 Georgia Reports, p. 565.

Lord Mansfield, in his opinion in the Somerset case, declared:

"So high an act of dominion must be recognized by the law of the country where it is used. The power of a master over his slave has been extremely different in different countries. The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself from whence it was created, are erased from memory."—Howell's State Trials, vol. 20, p. 62.

Innumerable cases might be cited to prove that the common law does not, and never did, recognize property in slaves; and yet the framers of the Constitution spread that law all over the Constitution, instead of saying that slaves were property.

What was the object of the Supreme Court, in traveling out of the record to show that the Constitution did, or would, if the case were brought before them, recognize property in slaves? I look upon this as one of the most dangerous aggressions which has ever been attempted upon the Constitution of the United States. Their object was covered up; it was not announced; you may hear it in private conversation, but it has never been announced publicly. The object was insidiously, first, to recognize slaves under the Constitution; secondly, to make out by construction of the property clause that the Constitution itself carried slaves everywhere. They declared in that decision that the Constitution carried slaves into a Territory. Well, sir, if the Constitution carries slaves anywhere outside of the limits of the municipal law creating slavery, it carries them everywhere. If slaves are property under the Constitution, Michigan is as much a slave State to-day as South Carolina, if any man or set of men see fit to take slaves there. They are protected under this property clause, if they are property under the Constitution; but we deny that they are. We deny the authority of the Supreme Court to insert any new provision into the Constitution making them property. Here is the clause which it is said carries slavery now into any Territory, if it is carried there; and the same clause will carry it into any State by the same rule. They dare not attempt, at this time, to break down State sovereignty; they dare not assert their whole meaning; but they take it piecemeal. The clause in which they pretend to find this power is that which declares that no citizen shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

That is the clause which they mean to render effective; under which they are endeavoring to strengthen slavery by their illegal decision, as I regard it.

That is not the last aggression. After having established the property clause, and carried slavery all over these United States, there is something left yet to be done. The intention is then—it has ceased to be problematical—to open the African slave trade. Why not give us the whole dose at once—property clause, African slave trade, and all? Why, sir, you southern men are more cruel than the heathen gods. They were satisfied with the sacrifice of hecatombs of human victims; but you take one hecatomb after another. You sacrifice one in adopting the Missouri compromise line; another in repealing it; and now you sacrifice another in passing the Lecompton constitution; and anon you will sacrifice another in spreading this property clause; and afterwards you will sacrifice another hecatomb in opening the African slave trade. Why not take all your victims at once, swallow them en masse, and let future generations live? You do not appreciate your northern tools; you are afraid to crowd them too far; you are afraid to give them the whole dose at once; but I tell you, sir, that you cannot give them a dose that they will not swallow. You need not give it to them in homeopathic portions. Give them the slave trade, the property clause, and the whole series at once; for so long as your Federal patronage holds out, so long you can rely on your northern allies. You see they will swallow Lecompton—it does not require an effort—with all its frauds. They would take the property clause, and resolve to-morrow that every State in the Union is a slave State, and it would not require an effort for them to get down that doctrine. Then you might introduce the African slave trade, and they would take that with the same facility that they take all the rest. Do not fear to crowd them, sir. They are few, and growing beautifully less, rapidly, but they are reliable just as long as you have the Government with its patronage.

I come now, sir, to the first organization of the Territory of Kansas under the bill of 1854. The first election under that act was for a Delegate to Congress. At that election there was no very great violence attempted, but there was fraud. Some nineteen hundred Missourians, I think, actually passed over into the Territory, voted in General Whitfield, and then went home. That terminated that campaign; but between the election of General Whitfield and the election of the members of the Legislative Council, there was a large influx of population from the North. It was deemed important then to strike a final blow for the institution of slavery in Kansas; then the forces were organized and drilled; they were organized in companies and regiments, with muskets and cannon, with bowie knives and revolvers, with baggage wagons, tents, and whisky. Under banners inscribed "for Kansas and slavery," they marched over and took possession of the land. They went to every voting precinct in the whole Territory of Kansas except one, and they drove from the polls the honest settlers of that Territory, and from their seats the judges of election appointed by the Governor of the Territory. By a comparison of the census returns with the poll-books of the Territory, and by the oral testimony of more than three hundred witnesses under oath, it is proven that four thousand nine hundred votes were cast in that Territory for members of the Legislature, by persons who were not residents of Kansas.

Very much has been said about a great influx of voters under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society. I have taken a little pains to ascertain just how many of the men sent out by the Emigrant Aid Society voted at that election. Four thousand nine hundred border ruffians from Missouri voted, and they left the Territory the next day; but of all the men who were ever sent to that Territory under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society, only thirty-seven voted on the 30th of March, 1855. Thirty-seven of the honest citizens sent out under the auspices of that society, who were there residents, cultivating the soil, cast their votes on that day, and no more. This is proven—proven beyond cavil or controversy; and it demonstrates that a great cry has been made over a small matter.

The members of the Legislature elected in this way applied to the Governor for certificates. Governor Reeder knew the frauds that had been perpetrated. He knew that not a man of them was entitled to a certificate; but many of the voting precincts were distant; and where there was no contestant he issued his certificates to these fraudulently elected men, most of them being Missourians. Where there was a contestant he ordered new elections; and in every such instance free-State men were elected, in place of the pro-slavery men previously said to have been elected. But, on the assembling of the Legislature, the first act was to wipe out these after elections—these honest elections—to throw out of the Legislature every man honestly elected; to organize, and proceed to enact a code of laws. In a very brief period they enacted laws that fill eight hundred and twenty-two pages. They took the whole code of Missouri, and after they got through they were afraid there might be some mistake somewhere, and they added the following addendum:

"Wherever the word 'State' occurs in any act of the present Legislative Assembly, or any law of this Territory, in such construction as to indicate the locality of the operation of such act or laws, the same shall in every instance be taken and understood to mean 'Territory,' and shall apply to the Territory of Kansas."

Their whole code would have been arrant nonsense, if they had not put in that singular addendum; for the word "State" was copied into almost every enactment. They carried most of the statutes of Missouri over there; but they were not satisfied with enacting the Missouri code; some of the Missouri laws were not sufficiently stringent for the Territory of Kansas, and they enacted a little postscript to the extent of four or five pages of laws, which met their views.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator if he really means to assert, without qualification, as I understand him to say just now, that the entire Missouri code was adopted by the Legislature of Kansas? I wish to say, if he does, that he is mistaken.

Mr. CHANDLER. I presume they had not time to put in all the resolves the Legislature of Missouri had enacted, and the amendments to their enactments. I do not mean to say that there might not have been some additions to those laws; but, in the main, these eight hundred and twenty-two pages were taken from the Missouri code, except four or five pages of infamous laws to which I shall have occasion to allude in a few moments.

Mr. POLK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to specify any one law there that is copied exactly from the Missouri code?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not the Missouri code before me, but if I had time I could point out a great number. I have examined them, and in the main they are identically the same. If it were not so, I want to know why they adopted this little addendum? If it were not so, what does this clause mean?

Mr. POLK. I will state that that takes for granted that all those who voted there were from Missouri.

Mr. CHANDLER. More than six sevenths of them were, as I can prove at the other end of the Capitol. I can prove to your satisfaction, or to that of any man on this floor, that more than six sevenths of the votes cast at that election were from Missouri. I will prove it by over three hundred witnesses. I will prove it by three men who spent weeks in comparing the census list with the poll list. I have the evidence on hand to prove what I assert.

Mr. POLK. I shall be glad to have you prove it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I can prove it at any time. I could send to the other House now, and get three men, and put them under oath, and they will swear to the truth of every word I say. It would take some time to go over the testimony.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know their names.

Mr. CHANDLER. WILLIAM A. HOWARD and JOHN SHERMAN; the other I forget. I go by the record. I shall have occasion to allude to certain of those laws that were not taken from the code of Missouri, but which were considered an improvement upon the Missouri code; but I pass them by for the present.

Under this code of laws the territorial government was organized; and the Army of the United States was sent there to enforce them. Men were hunted down by sheriffs and by posses from other States, by border-ruffianism everywhere, under the color of law. Sir, the State of Michigan has over one thousand of her people in Kansas to-day. Three of her citizens, and many other good men, have been murdered in cold blood. Two of them, Barber and Brown, I know were as good men as can be found on the face of the earth. The other—Gay—was Mr. Pierce's land agent for the Territory. He was a Nebraska pro-slavery Democrat. He was met one day, with his son, on the road, and asked whether he was for free-State or pro-slavery. He had become a little free-Statish in his views, and not dreaming of danger, he said, "I am a free-State man," and he was shot down; and his son, in attempting to defend his father, received a bullet in his hip, and is now a cripple, in Michigan. I speak with some feeling, sir. I have a right to speak with feeling. My own constituents, my own people, have been brutally murdered, and I should be recreant to my trust if I did not speak with feeling on this subject. I know the men from Michigan who are in Kansas to be as good men as can be found within these United States, and when any man says that the emigrants from Michigan to the Territory of Kansas are picked up from the purlieus of cities, I tell him he knows nothing about the subject, and that it is not true. They are as good men as the State of Michigan produces; they are honest and brave; they know their rights, and knowing, dare defend them.

I come next to the election of members of the constitutional convention. The laws to which I have referred were still in force. In the mean time the Governors had been changed three times, and Governor Walker was then in office. We are not left to assertion with regard to the frauds in the election of the constitutional convention. I refer you to Executive Document No. 8, for the present session, page 128. There I find a letter from the Hon. Robert J. Walker, Governor of Kansas, to the Hon. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State, supplied to us by the Department of State, in which Governor Walker says:

"On reference to the territorial law, under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters.

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and, therefore, they were entirely disfranchised, and could not, and did not, give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention. And here I wish to call attention to the distinction, which will appear in my inaugural address, in reference to those counties where the voters were fairly registered and did not vote. In such counties where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry, and no vote was given or could be given, however anxious the people might be to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced, for whenever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention.

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory; and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote, at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Leecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

Here the fact is shown that for the constitutional convention the people of Kansas did not and could not vote. It is not true, as has been asserted, that even in other counties, where a registry was taken, it was fairly taken. I was informed by the Mayor of Leavenworth, one of the oldest citizens there, said to be a man of wealth, certainly a man of respectability, that his own name was not placed on the registry list, nor were one half the names of the free-State settlers in that city. In every county where a registry was taken, it was taken fraudulently; free-State men were left off, and pro-slavery men, who were never known or heard of in the Territory, were placed on the list.

When more than half the counties in that Territory were disfranchised, when no fair registry was taken; when the very parties who had defrauded the people twice in previous elections, were to count the votes and make up the poll lists, it is not surprising that the free-State men of Kansas did not and would not vote at the election for delegates. They could not vote, as is asserted by Governor Walker. This, it must be remembered, is the evidence of the favorite Governor, of James Buchanan's own selection. This is no free-State Abolitionist. This is a man who went there honestly intending to make Kansas a slave State if he could; but like all other honest men who have been sent to Kansas, he was very soon converted from the opinion that the ruffianism was on the side of the free-State people, and law, order, and peace on the other side. Sir, I believe that if you or any other member of this body—I care not who it be—were sent to Kansas as Governor, and should remain there three months, you or he would stand where Governor Walker stands to-day. There is not a member of this Senate that I would not trust there; and I aver that such would be the result. But I shall allude to that matter hereafter. I now proceed to the submission of the constitution.

Illegally elected as it was—elected by only two thousand votes, when, as is asserted by Governor Walker, there were more voters in the counties where no registry was taken than cast at this election—the convention met. I assert it to be the truth that but for the pledges given by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, that convention would never have assembled in the Territory of Kansas. You had not United States bayonets enough there to have kept it in session but for the pledges given by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, that the constitution should be fairly submitted to a full vote of the people. But, sir, I come to the submission. President Buchanan, through his Secretary of State, General Lewis Cass, gave the following instructions to Mr. Walker when he went to Kansas as Governor:

"It is 'the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved; and, that being accomplished, nothing can be fairer than to leave the people of a Territory free from all foreign interference to decide their own destiny for themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.'"

Again:

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

These are the instructions under which Governor Walker acted. Mark the words: "When such a constitution shall be submitted"—not when a slavery clause, but when the "constitution shall be submitted" to the people of the Territory—"they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument."

But again, on page 111 of the same document to which I have alluded, you will find, in General Cass's letter to Mr. Stanton, the same language reiterated as late as November 30, 1857:

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

Here is iteration after iteration that the constitution should be submitted to the people, and that no fraud or violence should interfere with its fair submission. Then we come to the assurances given by Governor Walker, which satisfied the free-State people that it would be submitted, and submitted to a fair vote. He says, in his letter of July 15:

"It was, however, universally admitted that, but for the position assumed in my inaugural address, and emphatically repeated at Topeka, the people of Kansas, so far as my power extended, should be permitted, by a full vote of the actual residents of Kansas, to decide upon the great question of the adoption or rejection of the State constitution to be prepared by the constitutional convention which should assemble at Leecompton in September next, that the more violent course would have prevailed, and the Territory have been immediately involved in a general and sanguinary civil war, postponing, for the present at least, if not indefinitely, any pacific settlement of these momentous questions."

He says further, in the same letter:

"I urged that they were pursuing a course in opposition to the laws, which never could lead to any successful result, and urged them to unite in voting for or against the adoption of such a constitution as might be submitted for their consideration by the constitutional convention which would assemble in September next on the call of the Territorial Legislature. I endeavored to convince them that the so-called Republican party of Kansas, and their associates in the United States, had endeavored, and still desired, as set forth in their platform, to deprive the people of Kansas of the right to adopt their own social institutions, and had referred this question to Congress, where the people of the Territory would have no vote whatever; and continued my efforts on this ground, in connection with other topics, to separate the free-State Democrats from any alliance with the Republicans."

Here we get the meat in the cocoanut at last: "to separate free-State Democrats from any alliance with Republicans." They were going to destroy the Republican party then! These pledges were given in the broadest and most emphatic manner—given everywhere—from the stump, from the rostrum, in private conversation, and everywhere throughout that Territory. Governor Walker, under the instructions which I have read you from James Buchanan, through his Secretary of State, Lewis Cass, that it should be submitted, gave them the most positive assurances that, in any event, this constitution should be submitted to a fair vote of the people. Then, speaking of the Democratic convention in Kansas, he says:

"A resolution was offered by the pro-slavery delegate, instructing the nominee of the party for Congress to support there the adoption of the State constitution, which might be framed by the constitutional convention which should assemble in September next, whether the same had been submitted for ratification by the vote of the people or not. Very able addresses were made on this resolution, and especially by Judge Elmore, of Alabama, who earnestly advocated the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people, as the only course that was safe or proper. This is the more important, as Judge Elmore is a man of very decided ability and of great influence with the pro-slavery party. He was president of this Democratic convention, and is a delegate to the constitutional convention which assembles in September next. This resolution, which was regarded as substantially against the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people, was laid on the table as a test vote, by a vote of forty-two to one."

Forty-two to one of this Democratic convention were in favor of submitting the constitution, when it should be framed, to a vote of the people. So you see, sir, that from the beginning to the end the free-State men were led to believe, and did believe, that, in any event, this constitution must and would be submitted to the people, or that it would be rejected by Congress. It was admitted on all hands that the convention did not represent the people of Kansas. No man pretended that it represented the people of Kansas; and its members did not pretend it themselves. They only represented a very small fraction of the people of Kansas. Neither does the constitution now upon our table represent the wishes of one in ten of the people of Kansas. The people are opposed to it, and they have resolved, by an emphatic vote of more than ten thousand against it, that they will have nothing to do with it. I trust the attempt may never be made to force them to touch the unclean thing.

The next step in this programme was the election of the Legislature last fall. Again the free-State men were urged and implored by Governor Walker to go to the polls and vote under the code of laws. The more objectionable test oaths were repealed, or decided to be null and void; they were not operative. Through the influence of Governor Walker, and by the advice, I believe, of the Administration here, or of the President and Secretary of State, perhaps, it was decided that those test oaths should not be enforced, and that the people, the bona fide residents of Kansas, who had been there three months, should be entitled to vote. Under these pledges, and believing that Governor Walker was sincere and in earnest, and that they would have a fair chance to express their views through the ballot-box, they did go to the polls and vote; they elected their Legislature overwhelmingly; but the moment this was discovered, new returns began to come in, and at last up came a return from Oxford precinct, of Johnson county, with sixteen hundred fraudulent votes attached to that return list; and those sixteen hundred fraudulent votes, if allowed, secured a pro-slavery majority in the Legislature. I am informed that the Cincinnati Directory was copied alphabetically until they had taken sixteen hundred names, and returned them as having voted at that election—Governor Chase voting the pro-slavery ticket!

When Mr. Walker and Mr. Stanton learned these facts, they said, "we will go down to Johnson county and see whether this can be so." They went down to Johnson county, and brought up a report that there were some six houses in that voting precinct; that there was a small village across the street in Missouri; and they were informed by the people there that not one tenth of the number returned as having voted there were in the town during the two days the poll books were open. They ascertained that there was not one tenth of the number on the poll books in the voting precinct; and ascertained that even the Missourians had not come over in those numbers and voted. Not because of the fraud, but because these returns were not put in legal form, the Governor rejected them. He did not claim that he had a right to look into fraudulent returns; but because they were returned to him illegally, he threw them out. Even the provisions of the law under which they were acting were not complied with; and therefore, for that reason, as he informs us, he went behind the record. Up to this time Governor Walker had done everything that had been demanded of him; but for this one honest act, for redeeming this one pledge, Mr. Walker's head was dropped at the block. This alone was his unpardonable sin. He had taken the responsibility of throwing out these fraudulent returns, when they had not even the color of law to thrust them in; but for that act, and for that act alone, his head was brought to the block. After he left the Territory, Secretary Stanton saw fit to call the Legislature together, as he assures us, to prevent civil war or bloodshed, and he, too, lost his place. But before I come to that, I will touch upon the submission of this constitution to the people. Mr. Buchanan, in his special message transmitting the Lecompton constitution, says:

peace to the distracted Territory: but they again refused to exercise their right of popular sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default." * * *

"They now ask admission into the Union under this constitution, which is republican in its form. It is for Congress to decide whether they will admit or reject the State which has thus been created. For my own part, I am decidedly in favor of its admission, and thus terminating the Kansas question. This will carry out the great principle of non-intervention recognized and sanctioned by the organic act, which declares, in express language, in favor of 'non intervention by Congress with slavery in the States or Territories,' leaving 'the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.'"

Thus, you see, the President informs us that a fair submission of the slavery clause has been made to the people of Kansas. Now, sir, in the instructions of the President, and in the pledges given by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, has there been one word said about submitting the slavery question to the people of Kansas? No, sir; not a word. It was the constitution, and the whole constitution, of Kansas, that was to be submitted to a fair vote of the people. But, suppose I admit, for the sake of the argument, that the great important clause was that on the subject of slavery? I acknowledge no such thing, for it was not the only one, still it was a very important matter. But admitting, for the sake of the argument, that that was the all-important thing to be submitted: was it fairly done? Was even that clause fairly submitted to a vote of the people? Section nine of the Lecompton schedule provides:

"Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election upon said constitution, shall, if challenged, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws."

The voter was required to take an oath to support a constitution which he in his heart meant to subvert the very moment he could obtain power to do so. Would any honest man vote under such a test oath as that? No, sir; no honest man could vote, for there was not a free-State man in that Territory but what utterly abhorred, and would never support, that constitution, if it was in his power to resist it; and yet Mr. Buchanan informs us that this was a fair submission of the slavery clause to the people of Kansas! Let us see whether it was a fair submission of even the slavery clause. In case they voted out the slavery clause itself—

"Then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from this constitution by the president of this convention, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves shall in no manner be interfered with."

So if they voted out the slavery clause, still the right of property in slaves could not be affected; and there is another provision that any constitutional convention which may meet to amend this constitution shall not interfere with slavery.

There was no submission of the slavery clause; and President Buchanan, if he had read this constitution, must have known it. The right of property in slaves, it was said, shall never be interfered with in this Territory, if they vote out the slavery clause. It was a fraud from beginning to end. I have shown you how these laws were enacted; and now, for fear some of those laws might be repealed, they settle that point in this constitution itself, by declaring:

"All laws now of force in the Territory of Kansas which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall continue to be of force until altered, amended, or repealed, by a legislature assembled under the provisions of this constitution."

It must be remembered that the present Legislature of the Territory of Kansas is a free-State Legislature. The first act, of course, of that free-State Legislature would be to repeal the infamous code; but to perpetuate their power they put into the constitution a bar to any action of the Legislature on that code; and yet any man voting for that constitution swore to support that code, swore that the present free-State Legislature should not alter those laws. There was no submission of this constitution to the people. It was a fraud from the beginning to the end.

Besides, there was no punishment at that time for illegal returns. Mr. Stanton says on this subject:

"I have already expressed the grave doubts I entertain as to the power of the Legislature in any manner to interfere with the proceedings of the convention. But there can be no question as to your authority to provide, by a suitable law, for a fair expression of the will of the people upon the vital question of approving the constitution."

This is in his message to the free-State Legislature. Again he says:

"The laws now prevailing in this Territory provide for the proper punishment of illegal and fraudulent voting, but there is no provision which will reach the case of fraudulent returns. The case of the late Oxford precinct in Johnson county was an enormity so great that it has nowhere been defended or justified. Yet the evil consequences of it are seen in the fact that even the late convention has been so far imposed upon that in its apportionment for the State Legislature, under the constitution, it has assigned to Johnson county four representatives, which must necessarily be based on the notoriously false returns from that county. In order to meet the apprehensions naturally growing out of these circumstances, I recommend the adoption of a provision making it felony, with suitable punishment, for any judge or clerk of election knowingly to place on the poll books the names of persons not actually present and voting, or otherwise corruptly to make false returns, either of the election held by order of the convention, or of any other election to be held in this Territory."

Here, sir, is what was recommended by Secretary Stanton to the Legislature, to prevent frauds. The constitution was submitted to the people, to a fair vote of the people, under the authority of law, by the present Legislature of Kansas; and it was rejected by the people, by a majority of more than ten thousand votes; while it is proven that at the former submission, on the 21st of December, of the six thousand pro-slavery votes cast, not exceeding two thousand were actual voters in the Territory of Kansas. They were fraudulently made up. We have returns again from Oxford precinct as outrageous as the first. We have almost the whole vote of Johnson county a fraudulent vote; and upon that vote are based four members of the Assembly and one or two of the other branch.

I deny, then, that this constitution has been submitted to the people of Kansas in any proper form but once, and then it was rejected by an overwhelming vote of more than ten thousand. Then the returning of fraudulent votes could be punished. It was made felony. No man dared bring in a fraudulent return, for he would go to prison for so doing; but at the fraudulent election of December 21st, when fraudulent returns might be received, accepted, and counted, it was done.

Complaint was made here the other day, that some of the officers of Kansas had fled for fear of their lives. I should think they would flee for fear of their lives. They have come to the only city of refuge that can afford them any protection. They have committed crimes in Kansas against the law, and if they go there they will be punished according to law, and if they ever get their deserts it will be at the end of a halter. I should think they would dread the Territory of Kansas, and the climate there as unhealthy for their particular complaints.

Mr. President, we have upon our table a very singular document. I do not know what business it has here, but it is here. I should not consider myself entitled to quote from it, or talk about it, if it had not been laid upon our table in an official manner. In accordance with resolutions of the Senate of the 16th and 18th of December last, requiring the President to furnish certain information concerning the government of Kansas, he has transmitted to us a letter from some gentlemen in New Haven and his reply to them. I do not know what business that has here, but being laid on our table I suppose it is a fair subject for comment. In this Senate Document No. 8, at page 74, President Buchanan says:

"Slavery existed at that period and still exists in Kansas, under the Constitution of the United States. This point has at last been finally decided by the highest tribunal known to our laws. How it could ever have been seriously doubted is a mystery."

How that assertion ever could have been made is to me a mystery. We have very distinguished authority for entertaining doubts. In a letter of Mr. James Buchanan, dated Washington, August 25, 1847, directed to a Harvest Home of the Democracy of Berks county, Pennsylvania, I find this language:

"After Louisiana was acquired from France by Mr. Jefferson, and when the State of Missouri, which constituted a part of it, was about to be admitted into the Union, the Missouri question arose, and, in its progress, threatened the dissolution of the Union. This was settled by the men of the last generation, as other important and dangerous questions have been settled, in a spirit of mutual concession. Under the Missouri compromise, slavery was 'forever prohibited' north of the parallel of 36° 30'; and south of this parallel the question was left to be decided by the people. Congress, in the admission of Texas, following in the footsteps of their predecessors, adopted the same rule; and, in my opinion, the harmony of the States, and even the secu-

"The question of slavery was submitted to an election of the people of Kansas, on the 21st December last, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution. Here again a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question 'in their own way,' and thus restore erty of the Union itself, require that the line of the Missouri compromise should be extended to any new territory which we may acquire from Mexico."

The James Buchanan who wrote this letter is now astonished that any man should ever doubt that slavery existed in Kansas under the Constitution of the United States! Again, in the same letter, he says:

"Such has been my individual opinion, openly and freely expressed, ever since the commencement of the present unfortunate agitation; and of all places in the world, I prefer to put them on record before the incorruptible Democracy of old Berks. I therefore beg leave to offer you the following sentiment:

"The Missouri Compromise—its adoption in 1820 saved the Union from threatened convulsion. Its extension in 1848 to any new territory which we may acquire, will secure the like happy results."

And that compromise covered the very Territory that he is astonished anybody should ever doubt was covered with slavery! But again, from the same distinguished authority, we find this:

"Having urged the adoption of the Missouri compromise, the inference is irresistible that Congress, in my opinion, possesses the power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories."

This is the man who is astonished that any one should ever doubt that slavery exists in all the Territories under the Constitution of the United States! It is only ten short years since he wrote the letter; it is less than ten years since he uttered the sentiments I have just quoted.

But I have other distinguished authorities on this very point; among them, the honorable Secretary of State. You see we have had distinguished teachers. We have learned our lessons from high authority, and our doubts are honest. General Cass, in his speech at Romeo, in Michigan, in 1854, said:

"But you cannot put your finger on the power thereby ceded to carry slaves into our new Territories. Does the Constitution give authority to interfere? No. The word slave is not to be found in that instrument."

True.

"There is no power of interference recognized by our statute-books except in the case of fugitives. Go to the Constitution, and if authorized, interfere, but otherwise touch not the fostering evil."

And further, he says:

"Again, it has been said that the passage of this bill opens Kansas and Nebraska to the slave power. There never was a worse misrepresentation."

This is General Cass, the present Secretary of State, who utters that sentiment—"there never was a worse misrepresentation" than that the repeal of the Missouri compromise opened these Territories to slavery:

"Slavery is created by municipal law, and Judge McLean says that without law slavery cannot exist. The negroes of Kentucky and Pennsylvania would alike be free unless slavery had been legalized. How can the master hold slaves without positive law?"

This is General Cass in 1854. Now, sir, had Mr. Buchanan any reason to utter the sentiment I have read from his letter to the gentlemen from New Haven? I hold that he had not. It was under his teachings and those of his present Secretary of State that I learned the doubt. But again he goes on—I have not done with this letter to New Haven—

"If a confederation of sovereign States acquire a new territory at the expense of their common blood and treasure, surely one set of the partners can have no right to exclude the others from its enjoyment, by prohibiting them from taking into it whatsoever is recognized to be property by the common Constitution. But when the people, the bona fide residents of such Territory, proceed to frame a State constitution, then it is their right to decide the important question for themselves whether they will continue, modify, or abolish slavery. To them, and to them alone, does this question belong, free from all foreign interference."

What I have read before of Mr. Buchanan's former views answers that in full, and therefore I shall not comment on it; but here is what I am coming at:

"I have entire confidence in Governor Walker that the troops will not be employed except to resist actual aggression or in the execution of the laws, and this not until the power of the civil magistrate shall prove unavailing. Following the wise example of Mr. Madison towards the Hartford convention?"

Now I am not disposed to take this evidence in regard to the Hartford convention unquestioningly; for it is a well-established principle of law that a man who turns States' evidence must have some confirmatory testimony, or you cannot convict. I am not disposed to take this imputation unless there is some corroborative testimony, and I do not find any; therefore, I do not give any weight to this slur on the Hartford convention or the Topeka convention—

"illegal and dangerous combinations, such as that of the Topeka convention, will not be disturbed, unless they shall attempt to perform some act which will bring them into actual collision with the Constitution and the laws. In that event, they shall be resisted and put down by the whole power of the Government. In performing this duty, I shall have the approbation of my own conscience, and, as I humbly trust, of my God."

Mr. President, what laws are these that he is going to use the whole power of the Government to enforce? There was a code of laws enacted in Kansas which the present Secretary of State, General Cass, declared to be a disgrace to the age—a code of laws which the same high authority declared to be unconstitutional, and therefore void. It certainly cannot be those laws which he was going to bring the whole power of the Government to enforce. Let us see. Let us see what those laws are that he proposes to bring the whole power of the Government to enforce, and then humbly trusts he will have the approbation of his conscience and his God! In the code of Kansas, at page 605, will be found the following enactment:

"Sec. 11. If any person print, write, introduce into, publish, or circulate, or cause to be brought into, printed, written, published, or circulated, or shall knowingly aid or assist in bringing into, printing, publishing, or circulating, within this Territory, any book, paper, pamphlet, magazine, handbill, or circular, containing any statements, arguments, opinions, sentiment, doctrine, advice, or innuendo, calculated to produce a disorderly, dangerous, or rebellious disaffection among the slaves in this Territory, or to induce such slaves to escape from the service of their masters, or to resist their authority, he shall be guilty of felony, and be punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than five years."

And yet the Constitution, to which I called your attention a short time since, declares the freedom of speech and of the press shall not be interfered with. This enactment is unconstitutional and void; and yet Mr. Buchanan says, in the enforcement of this law "all the power of the Government shall be brought into requisition, and in performing this duty I shall have the approbation of my own conscience, and, I humbly trust, of my God." Sir, I do not know of what material his conscience may be made, but there are few men who would have the approbation of their own consciences in that, and there is no attribute in the Divine Being that authorizes any man to say that he humbly trusts he will have the approbation of his God in such an effort.

But again:

"Sec. 12. If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory, written, printed, published, or circulated in this Territory, any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular, containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years."

This law he is going to enforce in the same way and have the same approbation! I might go on ad libitum, but I shall detain the Senate but a moment on this point. I will read one more law:

"Sec. 4. If any person shall entice, decoy, or carry away out of this Territory, any slave belonging to another, with the intent to deprive the owner thereof of the services of such slave, or with the intent to effect or procure the freedom of such slave, he shall be adjudged guilty of grand larceny, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer death, or be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than ten years."

For the enforcement of that law all the powers of the Government are to be brought into requisition, and Mr. Buchanan, in performing this duty, will have the approbation of his own conscience, and, he humbly trusts, of his God. I have done with that New Haven letter. It would be better if it had never been laid upon our table, in my estimation.

Mr. Buchanan asserted in his message—I read from page 20 of the first volume of the Message and Documents for this year—

"The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling on a recent occasion to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never differed about its true meaning on this subject. Everywhere throughout the Union they publicly pledged their faith and their honor that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever. All were cordially united upon the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, which is the vital principle of our free institutions."

"Had it been insinuated from any quarter that it would be a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the organic law for the members of a convention, thereafter to be elected, to withhold the question of slavery from the people, and to substitute their own will for that of a legally ascertained majority of all their constituents, this would have been instantly rejected. Everywhere they remained true to the resolution adopted on a celebrated occasion, recognizing 'the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States.'"

I think that the friends of Mr. Buchanan pledged more than that. I aver that throughout the whole North the subject of slavery, in that constitution, was never alluded to as the question to be submitted to the people. I aver that pledges were given that the whole constitution should be submitted to the people, and to a fair vote of the people of Kansas. I have shown that there was no submission even of the slavery clause itself; but that was not enough. They pledged more. They pledged Mr. Buchanan as being favorable to making Kansas a free State; and, in my own State, the embattled hosts of the Democracy marched to defeat under flaunting banners of "Buchanan and free Kansas." In Pennsylvania, I am told, it was the same. Mr. Buchanan was everywhere throughout the North represented as being in favor of making Kansas a free State, and it was asserted over and over and over again that the surest way to make it a free State was by the election of James Buchanan. James Buchanan occupies the presidential chair to-day in consequence of the belief of the people of the North in these fraudulent representations. But for these false assertions he never would have been elected. He never would have carried a single northern State but for the belief in these fraudulent assertions. Now let them carry out their pledges made before the election. Let the constitution be submitted to a fair vote of the people, or else let the whole subject be sent back again to the people to manage their domestic institutions in their own way.

Sir, throughout the North, for many years past, we have had a set of men in great trouble and tribulation about this Union. From every stump in my own State the cry has gone forth, time and again, of "danger to the Union." Throughout all the northern States the same cry has gone forth; and whenever an aggression has been made by the South upon the North, these Union-savers have come before the people, and, in piteous tones, averred that they assented to it to save the Union. That set of people, who have been in labor, and suffering, and trial, for so long a time on account of the Union, have passed off the stage. In their places are men who love this glorious Union, and love it as it was made by the fathers; men who will not whine "danger to the Union;" but brave men, who will fight for this Union to the death. The race of Union-whiners, the old women of the North, who have been in the habit of crying out "the Union is in danger," have passed off the stage. They are dead; their places will never be supplied; but in their stead we have a race of men who are devoted to this Union, and devoted to it as Jefferson and the fathers made it and bequeathed it to us.

Any aggression upon the Constitution has been submitted to by the race that have gone off the stage. They were ready to compromise any principle; anything to save the Union. Sir, the men of the present day will compromise nothing. They are Union-loving men; they love all portions of the Union; and they will sacrifice anything but principle to save the Union. They will, however, make no sacrifice of principle—never, never. No more compromises will ever be submitted to to save this Union. If it is worth saving, it will be saved; but if you sap and undermine its foundations, if you place it in such a situation that it must topple, what can you expect but the legitimate results of your own action? The only way that we shall ever save the Union and render it as permanent as the everlasting hills, will be by restoring it to the original foundation upon which the fathers placed it. Those are the "mud-sills" that cannot be undermined; and there, sir, this great national Republican party proposes to place it. Sir, we are the national party of the Government, and in opposition to us is a purely sectional party that knows no issue but one, and that is the slavery issue.

But I am occupying more time than I intended, and I must hasten to a conclusion. One question

I wish to propound. I wish to know from some friend of the Lecompton constitution how he proposes to force a State into this Union against the wishes of its government and its people? I wish to know from what clause in the Constitution of the United States you derive the right to force a State into this Union? I assert that should you adopt this constitution for Kansas, you make a dead letter. The government of Kansas, which your own present Executive has admitted to be legal is opposed to this constitution. The people of Kansas are overwhelmingly opposed to it. Now, sir, will some man tell me how, with a government and a people almost unanimously opposed to a constitution, you are going to force it into this Union? The Government of the United States has not bayonets enough, nor money enough to pay for sufficient bayonets, to force a constitution on the necks of any people. It cannot be done. There is no constitutional right to attempt to do it. I respect the President of the United States so long as he obeys and stands by the Constitution of the United States; but let him step one inch beyond that Constitution; let one drop of blood flow in Kansas, or anywhere else, and James Buchanan, President of these United States, will be liable to impeachment, and to be hanged for murder also. James Buchanan, so long as he stays within the Constitution and within the laws, is to be respected by everybody; but let him step beyond the Constitution and beyond the protection of the laws, and he is no longer James Buchanan, President of the United States, but James Buchanan, the criminal. There is no power in this Government to force a constitution on the necks of an unwilling people. It cannot be done. If you adopt the Lecompton constitution to-morrow, you cannot enforce it; it will be a dead letter. Blood may flow—blood will flow if you attempt to enforce it—but it cannot be enforced.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] the other day stated that it was the purpose of the opponents of the Army bill, in civil war, to shed blood on the soil of these United States. I am sorry that Senator is not in his seat; I am sorry that he is unwell, for I intended to comment on this remark. In answer to some observations which I had the honor to submit on the Army bill, he said:

"I do not think the United States Senate can fail, under such an argument as has been offered by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, to see that the opposition springs from the purpose, in civil war, of shedding blood on the soil of the United States."

The opposition to the Army bill sprung from no such purpose. The opposition to that and to the Lecompton usurpation springs from no such purpose. It is our purpose to avoid the shedding of blood upon the soil of the United States by civil war. While I will not charge on the supporters of the Lecompton constitution the purpose, in civil war, of shedding blood upon the soil of the United States, I do charge that they, and they alone, will be responsible for every drop of blood that may be shed in consequence of the adoption of that constitution. I trust in God civil war will never come; but if it should come, upon their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility of every drop that may flow. I trust in God, sir, that this question will never be pushed to that extremity, for I should have less respect for the people of Kansas than I now have, if I supposed they would tamely submit to have a constitution thrust down their throats without authority of law, and against law, without their making resistance. I would disown them as the descendants of the men who fought our revolutionary battles if I did not think they would resist any such illegal attempt to force a constitution upon them. I believe they will resist it if the attempt be made, but I do not believe that the attempt will be made. I trust it will not.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I intended, and yet I am not quite through. I shall be as brief as I possibly can, but I desire to allude to some remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND.] That Senator said:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect, and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government: and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand. A race inferior to her own, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for our purpose, and call them slaves. We found them slaves by the 'common consent of mankind,' which, according to Cicero, 'lex nature est.' The highest proof of what is Nature's law. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by 'ears polite'; I will not characterize that class at the North with that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal.

"The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; all the Powers of the earth cannot abolish that. God only can do it when he repeals the fiat, 'the poor ye always have with you;' for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole hiring class of manual laborers and 'operatives,' as you call them, are essentially slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most painful manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns."

After reading and reperusing that speech, I proceeded to consider the state of society where such a happy population were found; and I began to examine into the condition of the people of South Carolina. I am not in the habit of saying, and I will not now say, one word to disparage any State, or the people of any State, in this Union; but I think that attack requires a reply; and I shall read from some distinguished southern authorities in elucidation of this statement. I find in an address of a late Chief Magistrate of South Carolina, Governor Hammond, before the South Carolina Institute, the following exposition:

"According to the best calculations which, in the absence of statistic facts, can be made, it is believed that, of the three hundred thousand white inhabitants of South Carolina, there are not less than fifty thousand whose industry, such as it is, is not, in the present condition of things, and does not promise, hereafter, to be, adequate to procure them, honestly, such a support as every white person in this country is, and feels himself entitled to.

"Some cannot be said to work at all. They obtain a precarious subsistence by occasional jobs, by hunting, by fishing, sometimes by plundering fields or folds; and, too often, by what is, in its effects, far worse—trading with slaves, and seducing them to plunder for their benefit."

Fifty thousand out of three hundred thousand, I am told by this authority, are in that condition in the State of South Carolina. I find other high authority upon this same question. Mr. De Bow, in his Review, says:

"It is too obvious to require extended illustration, that the slow advance of our population mainly arises from the impoverished condition of our lands. As lands become exhausted, the returns are not only small and unremunerating, but crops become uncertain, from casualities and vicissitudes of season, subsistence more precarious, and obtained at greater cost. The striking fact that those districts possessing naturally the best soils are almost stationary in population, while districts of inferior soils naturally are filling up, show not only the exhausted state of the soil in the former, but prove that the character of slave labor, and the system of cultivation adopted, are unfriendly to density of population.

"The exhaustion of our lands, above alluded to, is further evinced by the fact that, in the last thirty years, they have remained generally stationary in price; and, in many instances, have actually declined. Another fact, very significant of this truth, is the regularly increased amount of lands cultivated in different crops per hand, particularly in cotton, while the amount produced is proportionably less."

And again, the business committee of the South Carolina Agricultural Society reported, August 9, 1855:

"Our old-fields are enlarging, our homesteads have been decreasing fearfully in number." "We are not only losing some of our most energetic and useful citizens to supply the bone and sinew of other States, but we are losing our slave population, which is the true wealth of the State; our stocks of hogs, horses, mules, and cattle, are diminishing in size and decreasing in number; and our purses are strained for the last cent to supply their places from the northwestern States."

That is not so flattering an account as I hope to give of Michigan by-and-by. In the message of Governor Seabrook, of South Carolina, to the Legislature, I find:

"Education has been provided by the Legislature but for one class of the citizens of the State, which is the wealthy class. For the middle and poorer classes of society it has done nothing, since no organized system has been adopted for that purpose. You have appropriated $75,000 annually to the free schools; but, under the profusion of the profligating it, that liberality is really the profusion of the prodigal, rather than the judicious generosity which confers real benefit. The few who are educated at public expense in these excellent and truly useful institutions, the Arsenal and Citadel academies [military schools] form almost the only exception to the truth of this remark. Ten years ago, twenty thousand adults, besides children, were unable to read or write, in South Carolina. Has our free school system dispelled any of this ignorance? Are there not any reasonable fears to be entertained that the number has increased since that period?"

Again, writes a distinguished traveler of the "sand-hillers" of South Carolina:

"Not very essentially different is the condition of a class of people living in the pine-barrens nearest the coast, as described to me by a rice planter. They seldom have any meat, he said, except they steal hogs which belong to the planters or their negroes, and their chief diet is rice and milk. They are small, gaunt, and cadaverous, and their skin is just the color of the sand-hills they live on. They are quite incapable of applying themselves steadily to any labor, and their habits are very much like those of the old Indians.

"A northern gentleman, who had been spending a year in South Carolina, said to me, after speaking respectfully of the character of some of the wealthier class, 'but the poor whites, out in the country, are the meanest people I ever saw: half of them would be considered objects of charity in New York.'"

The picture is not so flattering when you come to examine it closely. It is one of those beautiful paintings where "distance lends enchantment to the view." I should not have alluded to this subject but for the attack of the honorable Senator upon my constituents, the laborers of the North. Sir, under his version, under his exposition of slavery, nine tenths of all the people of the North are, or have been at some period of their lives, slaves; for nine tenths of the people of the North have, at some time, been hiring laborers. We do not feel degraded by being hiring laborers. We believe it to be respectable. You may travel on any road in the State of Michigan you see fit to select, and you will find flourishing farms on almost every one hundred and sixty acres—nice farm houses, comfortable dwellings, fine barns, a very high state of improvement and cultivation; and you do not find the fifty-thousand class that you find in South Carolina. Sir, we deny that the laboring men of the North are, or can be, construed into slaves. They are men. These very laboring men are the foundations of society there. Go through the agricultural portion of Michigan, and you will find the farmer with four or five of the sons of his neighboring farmers employed as hirelings by the day, by the month, or by the year. A young man goes out to service—to labor, if you please to call it so—for compensation until he acquires money enough to buy a farm, and then he gets married and settles upon his farm, and anon he becomes himself the employer of labor. He never feels himself degraded by his labor. Some of those men who are at work by the month, during the summer, on farms, are in the Legislature making laws for us in the winter.

We have an eminent example of the class of which the Senator from South Carolina terms slaves. The late Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, Mr. Banks, now the Governor of Massachusetts, only fifteen years ago was working by the day, for his support, in a machine-shop. Fifteen years afterwards you find him occupying certainly the third place within the gift of the people of this nation; ten years hence, and you may see him in the executive chair. He never deemed himself degraded by the labor that he performed in that machine-shop; nor do our men admit that there is degradation in such employment.

But, sir, I have already occupied too much time. I have hurriedly passed over topics which I could have desired more time to discuss. They teem with interest and instruction. Nevertheless, with thanks to the Senate for the courteous attention with which it has heard me, I yield the floor.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President—
Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to make one remark?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.
Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to remark that I desire to prevent an adjournment over this evening until Monday. We desire a session to-morrow especially. I give notice that I shall resist any attempt to adjourn over, and shall insist on holding a session to-morrow by all means.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, the question before us is undoubtedly attended with difficulties. Some of these are inherent in the subject itself, but most of them, in my opinion, have been created in the heats and party divisions of the day and by the manner in which that subject has been treated. I believe that if the case could be fairly presented to any impartial mind, it would come to the conclusion that the President had suggested the best remedy for the difficulties by which we are envired and had hit upon the true solution of the Kansas problem. To test the correctness of this position, it will only be necessary to examine the facts as they have occurred.

It was in the year 1854 that the Congress of the United States repealed that restriction which denied to the slaveholding States of the Confederacy equal rights in certain portions of the territory of the Union. That restriction was declared by that Congress, and by the President of the United States to be unconstitutional, inoperative, null, and void. The opinion which they expressed was afterwards sustained by a solemn adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States; and I think I may say that the election of the present President of the United States, and a majority of the members of the House of Representatives upon this issue, affords probable evidences of the fact that this opinion was sustained by a majority of the people of the United States.

Soon after the passage of this act, the people of Kansas met to elect their first Territorial Legislature. I know that objections have been raised to the manner in which that election was made, and I shall presently come to the consideration of those objections; but it is indisputable that a Legislature was thus elected, and not very long after its election, it submitted to the people of Kansas to say whether they would call a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution and applying for admission into the Union. At that election, a majority of those who chose to vote, declared in favor of a convention. Upon this, the Legislature passed another act to provide for a registry of the voters, and a census of the people; and also to provide for the election of members to that convention.

Again, sir, at this election where all voted who chose to vote, a representation was elected to constitute a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution. When this convention met, it proceeded to the creation of a constitution, and when that constitution had been formed, it submitted it to the people of Kansas to say whether the provision in favor of slavery, which it contained, should remain in the constitution or whether it should be stricken out. On that question again, in my opinion, all who chose to vote were allowed to do so; because it was no restriction to say that when a constitution was once adopted they should maintain it until it was regularly and legally altered. Upon that vote it was determined by a majority of those who did vote, that the provision in favor of slavery should be retained. Afterwards, a vote was taken for the election of members to the new government which was ordained by this constitution, and upon that occasion a large vote was cast, some eleven or twelve thousand in number, who, not only by that act, gave their implied assent to this constitution, but who expressly declared when they voted, that they would support and maintain it. It is true that in the mean time a session of the Territorial Legislature had been convened, to meet after the convention to form a constitution, was in session, and that this Legislature provided for taking the sense of the people on the 4th of January, in regard to the Leecompton constitution. It is also true that upon that occasion a large vote is professed to have been cast, by which a majority of some ten thousand declared against this constitution.

These are the circumstances, as I understand them, under which Kansas presents herself here under this Leecompton constitution asking for admission into the Union, and to that admission there are two classes of objectors; the one maintain that the original Legislature, the first Legislature which was elected, was not clothed with legal authority, because, as they assert, an armed invasion of Missourians took possession of the ballot-box, and interfered with a fair expression of popular opinion. Assuming that the action of such a body was invalid, they say there was no law in the proper sense of the term for taking the sense of the people as to a convention; there was no law in the proper sense of the term providing for a registry, and for enabling them to vote for members of a convention; and that the convention itself when it assembled was, therefore, without authority and invalid. They have also maintained, I believe, that some of the counties were not allowed to vote, and that, therefore, the representation in the convention was incomplete.

At this point there comes in another class of objectors, who deny the validity of this convention, because they say that it was not authorized to act by means of what is called an enabling act on the part of Congress. They also insist that that constitution is not the act of the people, because it was not submitted as a whole by the convention to the people for their ratification; and as evidence of the fact that the constitution does not only not express the sentiments of the people, but that it is repugnant to their wishes, they refer to the fact that a majority of ten thousand was cast against it, under the law passed by the Territorial Legislature requiring the sense of the people to be taken on the 4th of January.

I propose to take up these objections in their order; and, first, as to the authority of the Legislature. I know that, on one side, the statement has been made that an armed invasion of Missourians took possession of the ballot-box and disturbed the fair expression of opinion; but, on the other hand, it has been asserted that these Missourians consisted of persons who had "staked out their claims," as it was called, for settlement and preemption in the preceding autumn, and had returned to Missouri, where they could winter, with the intention of coming back again in the spring, when the growth of the grass would enable them to sustain their stock and take possession of their new homes. It has been said that most of those persons did return to Kansas, and did settle upon these claims. That is the statement of the subject on the other side; and I find that, in the report of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] made two years ago, upon this subject, he took that view of the question. He said:

"For the successful prosecution of such a scheme, the Missourians who lived in the immediate vicinity possessed peculiar advantages over their rivals from the more remote portions of the Union. Each family could send one of its members across the line to mark out his claim, erect a cabin, and put in a small crop, sufficient to give him as valid a right to be deemed an actual settler and qualified voter as those who were being imported by the emigrant aid societies."

In the same report he states the fact, which is worthy of observation, that enough members were elected to each House of the Territorial Legislature to constitute a quorum, in the opinion of the Governor, who, as some thought, was the only judge of the elections and returns; and enough were elected to constitute a quorum of each House in the opinion of the Legislative Assembly itself. In referring to the two reports which were made on that subject, he says that according to either report, there was a quorum of each House elected without and beyond dispute.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the gentleman say both reports show that to be so? It is directly the other way. They were elected; but they were elected, as my report shows, by that violent invasion.

Mr. HUNTER. I will quote:

"So far as the question involves the legality of the Kansas Legislature, and the validity of its acts, it is entirely immaterial whether we adopt the reasoning and conclusions of the minority or majority reports, for each proves that the Legislature was legally and duly constituted. The minority report establishes the fact, by the position that the Governor's certificate was conclusive, and that he granted certificates to ten out of the thirteen councilmen, and to seventeen out of the twenty-six representatives who finally held their seats, which was largely more than a quorum of each branch of the Legislature. The majority report establishes the same fact, by the position that after going behind the Governor's certificate, and carefully examining the facts, they confirmed these same ten councilmen and seventeen representatives in their seats, and then awarded the seats of the other three councilmen and nine representatives to the candidates whom they believed to have been legally elected at the general election on the 30th of March."

Mr. COLLAMER. That is not the election I was speaking of. The special election was only in those districts which the Governor set aside. I speak of the election of the body of the Legislature itself, the first election of the 30th of March. You say that both reports then made show that there was a majority legally elected.

Mr. HUNTER. I said the reports of the majority and minority of the committee of the Legislature of Kansas showed it. I did not refer to our committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he alluded to the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HUNTER. I said the reports of both parties in the Legislature of Kansas proved this fact. The gentleman will find it so stated in this report. But, Mr. President, this much is certain: that the laws passed for the protection of life and property by that Legislature, were administered by the courts of the land; that the legal existence of that Legislature was acknowledged by Congress, and by the President of the United States; that it has received the assent of the people of Kansas because they have lived under its laws, and they have been the only ones which have been administered for the protection of their lives and of their property. The validity of the Legislature is sustained by as many sanctions, if we look to the forms of law for evidence, as the Legislatures of Virginia or of Massachusetts.

But suppose that these gentlemen were right; suppose there were some irregularities in the election of this Legislature; still there is one great fact which is indisputable, and that is, that it was the only government in Kansas, and that it had all the authority of a government de facto. Now, sir, we know that all civilized nations and all publicists recognize the authority of a government de facto. They recognize that authority because, as was well said by President Polk when he declared that the military government in California was the only government in existence, unless you acknowledge such a government you permit anarchy; and civil societies not only presume against it, but they defend themselves against anarchy as animated beings protect themselves against death. It is the very necessity of their existence. The law of their being requires them to do so. I say, then, that if it were not a government de jure, it was indisputably a government de facto; and according to all the prescriptions of society, according to all the maxims of law, its action is obliged to be recognized as valid, for there was no government in that Territory to dispute its authority.

Then, sir, if its action was valid, it was by law that it ordered the sense of the people to be taken in regard to a convention; it was by law that it ordered members to be elected to that convention; and it is nothing to say that a majority of the people of Kansas, although allowed to do so, refused to vote at that election. There is nothing in this objection, because it is everywhere admitted that those who do not vote in a free representative government are bound by the action of those who do. What is the right of a majority according to those who claim most for it? The right of a majority is to determine a question which is submitted to the vote of a people for decision; it is their right, too, to elect the members when they are to be elected by popular vote; but that is the full extent of all they can claim. A majority have no right to say that they will refuse to vote, and thereby create anarchy, chaos, and confusion. No such right could be acknowledged consistently with the existence of representative government itself; and yet it is precisely this which is claimed in this case. The very existence of free representative government itself requires that you should insist that the majority, who could control if they would, must be governed by the minority who do vote, if they themselves refused to act. This is necessary because the Government must go on; and you must presume against anarchy, and save civil society from its evils.

It is nothing, then, that these persons refuse to vote at a time when they might have done so. I know that it is said, in relation to the question whether there should be a convention, that there were some tests required; but the same cannot be said in regard to that election in which members of the convention were chosen. The majority, if it existed, could have controlled things as they desired. The right thus to control has never been disputed; that right has never been taken away from them; but when they come here and claim more, and affirm the right by refusing to act, and refusing to discharge their legal duties, to create a state of anarchy in a community, they claim what never can be, and never ought to be, accorded to them.

In regard to the other objection, that some of the counties were unrepresented, it has been so fully and completely answered that I think I need not take up your time by further adverting to it; for it has been shown that it was a minority, at best, who lived within them; that, if the census was not taken there, it was because the free-State party would not permit it to be taken; and that, in any point of view, there were not persons enough in these counties to have affected scriously the representative character of the convention.

I come now to the other class of objectors; to those who object to the authority of this convention because it wanted the support of an enabling act on the part of Congress. What, let me ask, are the functions of an enabling act? An enabling act is, in the first place, a declaration on the part of Congress, that within certain boundaries there is a people who are sufficiently numerous and matured as a society to claim admission into the Union, if they present a constitution republican in its form. It is also an invitation to those people thus to meet and present their constitution for admission. When they do that, Congress is bound in good faith to pass whatever further acts may be necessary, in order to admit them into the Union. But, Mr. President, all that is necessary in order to justify the admission, is that there should be the application of a people who, within proper boundaries, are sufficiently numerous and sufficiently matured as a society to qualify them for entrance into the Union, and that their constitution should be republican in its form. Whenever that case is presented, there is the justification for Congress to enter into the compact with the State which is necessary in order to admit it; a compact to which there are two parties—the people of the State applying for admission on the one hand, and the Congress of the United States agreeing to admit it on the other. The difference between the two cases is, that in the one Congress is morally bound by its previous pledge, and in the other it acts merely upon the propriety of the application, judging it by the circumstances under which it is made. As a proof that it is so, we have been referred, over and over again, to the numerous instances in which States have been admitted without any enabling act.

Let us proceed now to the other objection, that the constitution is not to be considered as the act of the people, because it was not submitted as a whole to that people for their ratification. This idea proceeds on the supposition that it is not competent to the people of a State to express their sense of their interests and their wishes on the subject of a constitution through the means of representatives in a convention; that it is not competent to a people to meet and declare that they wish to confide their whole power in this convention, and that their act, whatever it might be, should be final. To assert this, is to declare that there is no capacity in representatives to represent the views and interests of the people; because, if there be a capacity in representatives thus to express their wishes and interests, surely the people have the right to express themselves in whatever practicable mode they may themselves prefer. If the capacity be admitted, no man can doubt the right of the people to say that the acts of their representatives shall be final and conclusive. If, then, we say there is not a capacity in a representative assembly to express the opinions and wishes of the people in regard to matters of constitution, is it not obvious that that capacity does not exist in relation to matters of law? And the result would be that a popular form of government is only possible in those communities where there is a small number of people, and where they can meet and deliberate together.

But, sir, I think it will not be difficult to show that this principle is impracticable, and could not possibly be executed. If you must have the sense of the people in regard to a constitution, in order to make it their will and make it valid, then you must not submit it as a whole, but must submit it in parts; you must submit it proposition by proposition to gather their will precisely; because, although they might prefer the instrument, when submitted as a whole, to the old form of government, it does not follow that they are in favor of all the provisions which it contains. If, then, you should submit it to them proposition by proposition, this result might follow: that after the majority had struck out such parts as they disliked, the constitution, as a whole, would turn out to be a very different thing from what anybody had expected or desired. Then you would be forced to resubmit it again, or call another convention to change the form in which it is to be presented a second time; it would then be found that, in a large community, it would be impossible to take the sense of the people on the different parts of the constitution. I say, therefore, that it would be impossible to carry out this doctrine in order to ascertain the popular will on the subject of their constitutions.

But, sir, Congress is to send it back, and require its submission as a whole. Let me ask you what right has Congress to send this constitution back, and require its submission to the people, if the people, through their representatives, say they do not desire it to be thus submitted? The right to require this ratifying vote must rest with those people, or it must rest with the Congress of the United States. It cannot be in both; and if the Congress of the United States can say it shall be submitted, it must also declare to whom it is to be submitted; it must prescribe the right of suffrage; it must say who shall constitute the body-politic. It may provide that it must be submitted, not merely to whites, but to negroes, to Indians, and to aliens; and in thus prescribing who shall be the body-politic, and who are the voters to decide upon it, they may determine that no constitution shall be brought here that does not permit an absolute equality among those races. That is a matter not within the jurisdiction of Congress, but within that of the people of this inchoate State, who are acting in the capacity of the people of a State. To deny them such a right would be to deny their equality with the other States of the Union. It may be said that the people of a Territory have no such sovereignty. True; but the people of a State do possess it, and if Congress agrees to their application, its act of admission relates back, and recognizes their action as that of the people of a State.

Not only, then, is this doctrine, in the latitude in which it is laid down, impracticable, but I affirm that the submission which was made was the very fairest that could possibly have been offered. The great question of division among them was in regard to slavery. Who can doubt that? This was the only question submitted. If the constitution had been submitted as a whole, you could have ascertained their sense accurately in relation to the great matter of dispute. An anti-slavery man might, perhaps, have voted for the constitution because there were other provisions which he liked; and a pro-slavery man might have voted against it because there were other provisions which he disliked; but when you presented it to him to determine that question, and that question only, you took the precise expression of the popular voice in regard to that subject.

I know, sir, it has been said that the question was not submitted because the people were required to vote for the constitution before they could express an opinion on the subject of slavery. That, I say, with all deference to the respectable gentlemen who have maintained the proposition, seems to me to be a mere verbal quibble. Why, sir, what was it for which the voter was responsible when he voted under this submission? He was responsible only for expressing an opinion in regard to that matter which his vote could affect, and not for any declaration of sentiment as to other provisions in the constitution which his vote could not affect; and what was there in that instrument which his vote could affect? Surely it was only the subject of slavery itself.

Well, Mr. President, to confirm this action of the Lecompton convention, we have the fact that some eleven or twelve thousand persons—I will not be precise as to numbers—voted for the officers who were to compose the new government under this constitution, and that they did so not merely with a simple assent to the constitution, but with the express declaration that they would support it, for they were not allowed to vote until they agreed to sustain the constitution—that is to say, to sustain it if adopted, until it should be legally changed or abolished. Such, in my opinion, was the pledge when fairly construed.

Against all this, we are referred to the vote which was taken on the 4th of January under the law of the Territorial Legislature, as evidence that the people of Kansas are opposed to this constitution. Mr. President, I deny that this vote is an element in the argument. If the convention at Lecompton was valid, if its acts were authorized, then this Legislature had no authority to pass a law, to take the sense of the people; they had no authority to do that which belonged to the convention itself to do; for it was for that body to take the sense of the people in regard to its action, and not for a Legislature which came into being afterwards. If we admit the State under that constitution, and thus acknowledge that it was a State, the act relates back to the time of the adoption of the constitution; and nothing that was inconsistent with that provision is legal and valid. If, on the other hand, this convention was not an authorized body, that settles the question itself; and it is useless to look further to the votes in relation to it. If it were an unauthorized body, there is no validity in its acts, and it is idle to count the votes that were cast against it.

But, sir, we are told that whatever may be the evidence which has been taken, according to the forms of law, whatever may be the legal presumptions in this case, we ought not to regard them when there is such palpable evidence that a majority of the people of Kansas are against the adoption of this constitution. Here lies, in my view, the most plausible of all the arguments which have been urged against it. We must remember that the very existence of popular government itself requires that we should take no evidence in regard to the popular will, save that which is presented according to the proper forms of law. That principle is necessary to protect the right of self-government in a representative system; and I think I have shown you, sir, that according to that evidence which has been taken in conformity with the forms of law, this constitution is to be considered as the valid act of the people of Kansas. But I put aside that for the present; and I come to this other argument, that whatever may be the legal presumption, here is positive evidence that a majority of the people are against this constitution.

Mr. President, I pass over the circumstances that this vote on the 4th of January was an ex parte proceeding; that it has not been exposed to the wholesome test of an adversary scrutiny; that circumstantial evidence has been adduced to show that more votes were cast in certain places than could possibly have been fairly given there. I pass over all these considerations, and I ask whether this fact itself does present conclusive evidence that the people of Kansas are against this constitution? What is it that is expressed by this vote in which the ten thousand majority was given? We are not to infer from it that this majority were not allowed to carry out their will in regard to the constitution, and that therefore we are to afford them some redress for that grievance; we are not to infer that, because it is plain they could have carried out their will had they chosen to do so. If this majority did exist, they could have prevented any convention. If it did exist after a convention was called, they could have elected their own members, and made the constitution what they pleased. If, after the constitution was formed and submitted, they had chosen to do so, they could have stricken out that feature of slavery which presented to their minds the only real objection to it. They come here, therefore, not to complain that their will was defeated; for, in that event, they would have been entitled to the respectful consideration of Congress; they make no such complaint, because such was not the fact; but they come here to complain because we will not agree to say that a majority of the people, under a representative government, shall, by refusing to vote, and by refusing to discharge their duties under the law, create a state of anarchy and confusion, and put an end to all government in the country to which they belong. Is such a demand as that entitled to respect? Can there be any equity which should induce us to regard such a claim? If they came here to say that a majority had not been allowed to vote on the question of the convention—if they came here to say that a majority had not been allowed to elect the members to this convention—there might be something in the complaint; indeed, there would be good cause of remonstrance; but that is not their objection, as I understand it. Their complaint, I repeat, is that we will not agree that they, by refusing to act at all, shall produce a state of anarchy, of chaos, and confusion, in that Territory.

But, sir, suppose that we were to lay aside all law, all the presumptions as to legal evidence, and endeavor to ascertain the natural equity of the case, in order that we might conform to it—I do not say it would be safe, or proper, or right to do that; but I will suppose we were endeavoring so to act: what would be the equity which we should consult? The equity is, that the will of a majority of those who are bona fide inhabitants of Kansas, who intend to make a common fortune with that Territory, and who are guided in reference to its constitution by a view to its interests, should be respected. But suppose it were proved—I will make the case a suppositive one—that most of those composing this majority consisted of persons who did not cast their votes in reference to the interests of Kansas, but in reference to undue outside influences in Massachusetts or Missouri; suppose it were proved that this number was not composed of bona fide residents, who intended to live permanently in Kansas, but that many of them were persons who would leave the moment affairs were regularly settled; suppose it were proved, too, that many of them were maintained by money furnished from without the Territory of Kansas, for the purpose of keeping up a state of disorder and confusion; would any man say that, in equity, the votes of such persons, were entitled to any more respect here, because they happened to be cast in Kansas, than if they had been given by assemblages in Massachusetts or in Missouri? Surely not. Is there not strong, circumstantial evidence to prove that such must have been the case with many of those voters? If it was their desire to settle the matter in reference to the interests of Kansas, and they did constitute a majority, why did they not vote for members of the convention? Why did they not make the constitution conform to their wishes? They had the power to do so under the laws. Why did they fail? How are we to account for it, unless we suppose that they desired to keep this question open with all its agitations, no matter what might be the expense or the injury to the people of Kansas, or the destruction of the interests of that Territory? If we can suppose that, I ask, as I did before, are they entitled to our respect upon any consideration of equity which may be alleged?

But, Mr. President, I take another view of it. Suppose that this wrong was about to be perpetrated; suppose that in the admission of Kansas we were going to bring into the Union a people, the majority of whom did not desire the constitution under which it is admitted, it is a wrong which carries its own remedy with it. It will carry its own remedy immediately and swiftly, because the main subject of grievance, as we all know, is that of slavery, and the Lecompton constitution itself allows a majority of the Legislature to emancipate the slaves, provided they will pay for them; and is there any civilized Government in the world which would emancipate slaves without paying for them? Did not the English and French Governments compensate the owners? Would the Legislature of any State emancipate the negroes without paying for them? What would be the burden on that Territory of paying for some one hundred, or two hundred, or perhaps three hundred negroes? Is it a matter to be considered when they could thus accomplish their wishes and give peace to the country at so small an expense? and shall we say that we will keep up all the complications and agitations of this question because they are unwilling to make even that small exertion in order to carry out their wishes? This matter, it seems to me, cannot be considered by gentlemen who have been complaining that the will of the people of Kansas has been disappointed. In the second section of the seventh article the Lecompton constitution provides that "the Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners, or without paying the owners, previous to their emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated." Is not the power to emancipate upon compensation expressly given by these words?

It has been said, however, that the question of slavery was not the only one in regard to which there was controversy; and that the people might desire to change the constitution itself. I believe there is a large majority in Congress, a large majority everywhere, who think that the people of Kansas will have the right to change this constitution even before 1864—not for the reason given by the President of the United States, for I am not one of those who believe it is not in the power of a convention to limit the right of its successors as to a change, (that is for a limited period of time,) or to prescribe the mode in which it shall be done; but I incline to think there is no provision for the case before 1864. If there be no provision, it stands like all other States in consimili casu; and then, with the assent of the existing government to the call of a convention, such a body could change the constitution.

Whether this be so or not it will depend on the people of Kansas themselves to say; because if there be a majority who believe they have the right, and who desire to change it, that majority will get possession of the Legislature, and there will then be harmony between the existing government and the new one called into being under the second constitution. The same majority would control them both, and if there were harmony between both, there is no one that could apply to the General Government for its interference. The case in which a Legislature would apply for Federal interference, under such circumstances, is when there is an old government which is contesting with the new for authority and jurisdiction; but no such case could arise here because the same majority would rule them both.

If this be so, if this people would have the power to change their constitution, I ask if they could not remedy the evil much more readily and completely after they were brought in as a State, than if they were remanded and sent back to their territorial condition? If they came to act on this subject as a State, they would act on it in reference to the interests and feelings of Kansas alone. They would not be disturbed by the fear that unless their constitution should suit the views of a majority of Congress, they would not be admitted; but being in the Union, they would have nothing to consider except the interest of Kansas itself. They would therefore come to a conclusion much more readily, and under much sounder and safer influences than if they were to attempt it after they were remanded to a territorial condition.

I say, then, sir, that if it be the great object of their wishes to be enabled to govern Kansas according to the wishes of a majority, and they do constitute such a majority, that the readiest and easiest mode of gratifying that desire is to admit Kansas as a State in the Union. We do the majority no wrong, therefore, by such an admission; but, on the contrary, we afford them the most certain and easiest mode of securing their rights.

The argument, then, as it seems to me, stands thus: We are bound to take the evidence of the popular will, according to the forms of law as prescribed in such cases. But if we are bound to take this evidence in conformity with law, then Kansas is entitled to admission under the Lecompton constitution. If it be said on the other hand, that to do that would be to inflict a wrong on the majority of the people of Kansas who do not desire such a constitution, the answer is, that if it does inflict a wrong it will afford them the means of righting themselves more speedily and easily than any other mode which can be devised. All they could claim would be the right to mold their institutions according to the wishes of the majority. A majority could mold those institutions much more readily and safely, and under much sounder influences, after they were admitted as a State, than if they were sent back to their territorial condition.

Why, then, sir, should any party resist the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution? Not because they desire to make it a free State, for if this majority exists it is manifest they would make it a free State if they desired. They could make it so through their Legislature alone. They could make it so in the opinion of most persons by a change of the constitution. They could make it so readily and expeditiously. The opposition cannot be much for that reason. It must either be because those who oppose it desire to keep the question open for political purposes, or else because they are unwilling to admit, even for a moment, any State which tolerates slavery by its constitution.

Now, Mr. President, I will not suppose, I will not argue upon the supposition that any numerous party in this country would desire to keep open such a question, in order to continue the agitation and the differences which it might occasion. And is there any party which would be willing to declare to this country that they would not admit another slaveholding State into this Union again, no matter what might be its claims to admission in other respects? To assert the right to look into the constitution to see whether it contains slavery or not, is to assert the right to look into it for every other purpose. If you can look into it and refuse admission to a State because its constitution tolerates slavery, you can refuse it admission because it contains other things which may not be agreeable to you. You must either claim that general power, which is contrary to the equality of the States and to all our notions of their rights, or else you must insist that slavery comes under the ban of a law higher than the Constitution, and that all the constitutional guarantees are worthless and good for nothing, so far as that institution is concerned. Sir, I will not comment upon the consequences of such a declaration, at this time, to the American people. In the name of this mighty Union, and of the hopes and aspirations of thirty millions of people, I protest against any such expression of opinion on the part of this Government; and yet it does seem to me that the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] rests his objection upon grounds very like this. He says, speaking of this controversy:

"I would have it ended now, and would have the wounds of society bound up and healed. But this can be done only in one way." * * * "It can be done only by the simple and direct admission of the three new States as free States, without qualification, condition, reservation, or compromise, and by the abandonment of all further attempts to extend slavery under the Federal Constitution."

To sustain this extreme, and I think I may say, extraordinary conclusion, the Senator has resorted to a novel course of argument—argument I can hardly call it, for he has thrown up his brief and abandoned the bar, and taken his post in the witness stand to give what he calls a statement of the case, a history of the affair; and such a history I think I never read before. It must have been with histories of this kind that Sir Robert Walpole was familiar when he declared against any such reading as being unsuitable to the last hours of life. Here, sir, I would say that I do not impute to the Senator from New York any design willfully to misrepresent facts, but I must say that this statement is so colored by his party views as to make it, in my opinion, utterly unreliable. Let us see how it runs:

"The people of Kansas, thus deprived, not merely of self-government, but even of peace, tranquility, and security, fell back on the inalienable revolutionary right of voluntary reorganization. They determined, however, with admirable temper, judgment, and loyalty, to conduct their proceedings for this purpose in deference and subordination to the authority of the Federal Union, and according to the line of safe precedents."

And of whom do you suppose that is predicated? Of the Topekaites, among whom are to be included General Jim Lane and his band of marauders. Those are the persons whom he thus characterizes in his history. But, pauca majora canamus, he has given us a chapter on the Supreme Court, and, although it is not my purpose to trench upon the province of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who made, on yesterday, a defense of that august body so complete and eloquent, that any attempt on my part to add to it might mar, but certainly could not improve it, and yet, sir, by way of testing the character of this history, it may not be amiss to read a few extracts from that chapter:

"The new President, under a show of moderation, masked a more effectual intervention than that of his predecessor, in favor of slave labor and a slave State. Before coming into office, he approached, or was approached by, the Supreme Court of the United States."

Again:

"The day of inauguration came—the first one among all the celebrations of that great national pageant that was to be desecrated by a coalition between the executive and judicial departments, to undermine the national Legislature and the liberties of the people."

And yet again:

"The pageant ended. On the 5th of March the judges, without even exchanging their silken robes for courtiers' gowns, paid their salutations to the President, in the executive palace. Doubtless the President received them as graciously as Charles I. did the judges who had, at his instance, subverted the statutes of English liberty."

Such are the choice excerpts from that chapter of his history which is not only unsupported by authorities, but, as the Senator from Louisiana has shown, contrary to the facts of the case.

And what is it that he proposes to do with this court as a punishment for all these things? He says:

"Sir, the Supreme Court of the United States attempts to command the people of the United States to accept the principles that one man can own other men, and that they must guaranty the inviolability of that false and pernicious property. The people of the United States never can, and they never will, accept principles so unconstitutional and so abhorrent. Never, never. Let the court recede. Whether it recede or not, we shall reorganize the court, and thus reform its political sentiments and practices, and bring them into harmony with the Constitution and with the laws of nature. In doing so, we shall not only reassume our own just authority, but we shall restore that high tribunal itself to the position it ought to maintain, since so many invaluable rights of citizens, and even of States themselves, depend upon its impartiality and its wisdom."

That is to say, the court is to be so reorganized as that it shall deny the right of property in slaves; it shall be so reorganized as to put the institutions of nearly one half the States of this Confederacy beyond the pale of the Constitution; it is to be so reorganized as to reform its "political sentiments and practices," and to conform to what he calls the Constitution and the laws of nature. Mr. President, I think the Senator has endeavored to teach us before that our Government ought to administer a higher law than the Constitution itself; a law which resides in the breast of the Governor, and which is to be interpreted by himself. Now, sir, he invites us to destroy the judiciary system, and to reorganize it upon principles which are directly inimical, not only to the Constitution, but to the peace and the harmony of the Union. But that is not all. He tells us, for the future we are to have a perpetual internecine war. He says, speaking of free labor:

"It will henceforth meet you boldly and resolutely here; it will meet you everywhere, in the Territories or out of them, wherever you may go to extend slavery. It has driven you back in California and in Kansas; it will invade you soon in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Missouri, and Texas. It will meet you in Arizona, in Central America, and even in Cuba. The invasion will be not merely harmless, but beneficent, if you yield seasonably to its just and moderated demands." "The interest of the white races demands the ultimate emancipation of all men. Whether that consummation shall be allowed to take effect, with needful and wise precautions against sudden change and disaster, or be hurried on by violence, is all that remains for you to decide."

Thus, sir, it seems that we are to have perpetual war—an internecine strife, which is to last until slavery is abolished everywhere; a war which, if it be not perpetual, must, as every man sees, last at least for centuries. Such are the vaticinations of his prophetic inspirations; such is the prospect which he holds out for our future—a government, as I said, to be guided by a law higher than the Constitution which it abandons; a court to be reorganized, I suppose, to minister to the passions and the feelings of the mob, and a state of things which is to entail upon us a perpetual civil strife here at home.

Mr. President, is this what that gentleman calls progress? Is this the future which he predicts for us? The great Italian poet, when he punishes the prophets in his hell, turns their faces behind instead of before, and compels them to walk backward for the residue of time. It seems to me that our prophet must have received the sentence before his time. The Oceanas and the Utopias, which figure in political fiction, were organized for peace; but this Senator condemns his imaginary Republic to eternal war.

But with your permission, Mr. President, I will follow his history a little further. He tells us that "all other nations have already abolished, or are about abolishing, slavery." This is to reconcile us to that catastrophe which, with so little emotion, he predicts for us. This, too, is said in the face of the fact that the French Government has really revived the African slave trade itself. Such, at least, is the opinion of the English people and the English Government. If you compare their present mode of supplying their colonies with African labor with that older one which was called the slave trade, I think it will be found that the comparison will be in favor of what is denominated slavery, for that does at least afford the slave the protection of interest which is given to him by the master who owns him.

This, too, is said in the face of the fact that the British Government, ever since its emancipation of slavery by name, has, under its system of apprenticeship and of Cooly labor, been subjecting the inferior to the superior race, so as to enable the latter to command a servitude scarcely more voluntary than the older form, and probably not as advantageous to the laborer himself. But, sir, John Bull has seen a vision lately which may well cause him to pause in his path, and to ponder over his prospects for the future. He has seen the mighty shades of Akbar and of Aurengzebe coming like Necuba, "from the gates of darkness and the recesses of the dead," to haunt the marble halls of the palaces of the Great Mogul, for the purpose of rekindling, if possible, some latent spark of manhood in the hearts of their degenerate successors; and to challenge the stranger for the cause of his presence in what were once the high seats of Oriental power. He feels that it was an avenging Nemesis which, on the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Plassy, that gave him India, proclaimed that saturnalia of blood and of crime which spared neither the strength of man, nor the purity of woman, nor the innocence of childhood. He now knows that in the settlement of nations, they may reckon in a day for the accumulated wrongs of a century. He feels that these doctrines of the abstract equality of all men, whatever may be their condition or color, are absolutely incompatible with that subordination of the inferior to the superior race, upon which depend his power and his empire. He must see how useless was the sacrifice of the West India colonies, amongst the noblest jewels of the British Crown. He must feel, too, that the course of sentimental legislation, in which he has been engaged of late, is fast sapping the foundation of the fabric of power which he raised in the lusty strength of his manhood. He may be too proud to own his error; but depend upon it he will apply the proper remedy. He will resume his empire in India, but it will be on the imperial maxim, parcere subjectis, et debellare superbis. He will crush out the last spark of resistance under the armed heel of the conqueror; and when more than a hundred millions of people are placed under his absolute rule and control, when they will hold their lives, their property, and all that is dear and sacred in the rights of man under his arbitrary will, he will hardly have the face to stand before the world again to preach against African slavery.

Sir, of the two, I prefer to see him as he used to be, surly, domineering, if you will, but truthful, honest, and brave, rather than in that more modern part of philanthropic professions and puritanic pretenses which he enacts so poorly. I know that his buffets are hard to stand; but if I am to have his opposition, let me meet him rather in open and manly encounter than receive him as the priest who wears the gown and the robes merely to conceal the coat of mail that lies within. But he will have to strip him of his robes; the Philistines are upon him, and the day is coming, I fear, which will try his strength to the utmost. Although we of the South have much to complain of at his hands, yet, sir, I wish him well through with that day; for I cannot but feel that with him would fall the last hope of regulated liberty in the Old World.

Nor, Mr. President, do I read the signs of the times in regard to sentiment at home, as they are read by the Senator from New York. I believe that even here, a reaction is going on. It is said that our population, by a natural law, is to gravitate to the equator. It is believed that a manifest destiny will draw our people to the tropics, those evergreen regions of a "never wintering sun." I will not say how well-founded is this prediction, in my opinion; but I will say, that if we play for these prizes of empire, it can only be upon the condition of preserving the proper subordination of the inferior to the superior races, when they are thrown together on the same soil to struggle for a subsistence. Unless that condition is observed, such acquisitions would prove to be nothing but a continual curse and a perpetual plague. If made, it will be found that this institution of slavery, so far from being a cause of dissension, and of difference, will prove a common bond of union and strength, because it will be by such means that each white man, no matter what the section in which he may live, will enjoy the largest share of power, of influence, and of wealth.

The Senator from New York says the white man will have this continent. I say so too; and when he does possess it, he will take it, not as the Senator from New York would place him, as the equal of the Indian and the negro; but he will hold it as the master, and by right of dominion. There are some regions of the world which he can only hold in such a way. As yet I do not know whether the Senator from New York, in his scheme of society, contemplated the continual existence of these inferior races. I do not know whether he designs for them a fate which he did not care to describe, because it is to be one of utter and entire extermination; or may be that he did not consider himself as their keeper, or choose to be so considered, when he was thus consigning his brethren to this wholesale destruction; but I will tell him that they hold to existence by a tenure as firm in certain regions of this world as that by which the white man holds his in other portions of the globe. There are certain parts of the world which are peculiarly adapted to each of these races; and I do not know that it is in the decrees of Providence to consign any of them to utter extinction. If it be true, as I believe it to be true, that there are certain regions in which the labor of the inferior races is the only labor that can develop their resources, it follows as a consequence that the white man cannot enjoy those regions unless he goes there as the master, to govern and direct. I say then, sir, that this is the only condition—that of preserving the proper subordination of the inferior to the superior races—upon which the white man can rule this continent. Are we to suppose that when the American people shall perceive this necessity, they will be blind to it, especially if urged by those views of ambition, of progress, and of absorption which the Senator from New York would seem to attribute to them?

Mr. President, the mind of Young America is, perhaps, this day pondering upon things of which neither the Senator from New York nor myself can be said to be properly conscious. It may be engaged in tracing out the shadows of those coming events which as yet are but vaguely defined, and in nursing aspirations for other and newer forms of development. To give a proper direction to this emotional excitement, and to open up just and legitimate avenues for the movement of the power of this pent-up energy, should be the highest objects of the care and the provision of American statesmen.

The other great nations of the earth are now exploring the land and the sea to open up new avenues to power and to wealth; but to us, if the waifs of commerce come, they must be brought to us as flotsam and jetsam—by the impulse of the wind and the wave. The three chief nations of Europe are playing for the mighty stakes of fortune and the prizes of empire; but we are engaged in an earnest scrutiny into the ballot-box at the Delaware Crossing or at Shawneetown, or busily employed in studying the campaigns of General Jim Lane, whose spolia optima consist, I believe, in the capture, perhaps, of women and children. If empires were to go to pieces, we should be incapable of extending an arm to catch but a fragment of the wreck that might be floating on the stream of time beside or before us.

In the Eastern world spoils of empire that have been accumulating since the earliest records of time, begin now to attract the regards and the cupidity of the great Powers of Europe. Their fleets are already coasting along that slender barrier which separates them from the mighty prize, but which they are deterred from grasping more from the fear of each other than from the dread of any opposition which they are to encounter there.

The eagles have indeed gathered to the banquet. But one alone is absent from the feast, and she is the youngest mother of them all. She is at home, guarding her nest, because she is afraid that if she leaves them her young will not dwell together in peace. Sir, such a state of things cannot long endure. The instincts of power and of empire must of themselves prevent it. This Kansas question has been reduced to proportions quite too small further to impede our progress, or to mar our march. If the Senator from New York will allow me to use his tripod for a moment, and to venture a prediction for the future, I would say that the American people will preserve their Constitution, and the Union which is founded upon it; they will maintain their courts; they will continue to cherish respect for the judicial crime and for the majesty of the law; and they will cultivate hereafter, as I trust, a spirit of peace and of friendship at home. For one, I hope for the day when, in the beautiful language of Mr. Jefferson, "we may unite with one heart and with one mind to restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty, and even life itself, are but dreary things." Yes, sir, I will venture still to hope—

"For I have seen
The thorn frown rudely all the winter long,
And after beat the rose upon its top."

But, sir, if the American people would secure these blessings, they must cast far from them the counsels of the Senator from New York; they must beware of the asp which lies concealed under those flowers of rhetoric with which he sought so carefully to cover it. One drop of that venom may corrupt the blood which has flown through royal veins for centuries, and distemper the brain, on whose proper balance the power and the peace of an empire may depend.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President—

Mr. COLLAMER. The usual time of adjournment has arrived.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from Maryland prefers to go on.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have but little to say, Mr. President, and that I should prefer saying upon some other occasion, after the very eloquent and the very able remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Virginia. The time, however, has come for me, occupying the peculiar position that I do here, to define the ground that I mean to take in the controversy now before the country. I do not intend, in any manner whatever, to go into an elaborate discussion of the questions connected with the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, or to examine whether the doctrine of popular sovereignty has been fully maintained or not. I stand here representing a party almost without a voice in this Congress. I am here to give utterance to sentiments and principles upon which I believe the permanency and durability of this Government depend. I am not a party in any manner to the contest which is waged here as to the meaning of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I believe, if I believe anything in the world, that it is simply a construction of a party principle with which I have not had anything to do.

Mr. President, I have repudiated, and at the very outset let that be understood, the whole principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I have opposed it, because it repealed the Missouri compromise line. I have opposed it, because in the repeal of that line it worked injustice to the southern States of this Union. I have opposed it as a Union man—not as a "Union-saver," as an honorable Senator said this morning—but because I believe this Union can only be maintained and preserved by a just regard to the rights of all the States, and by observing the rights of that minority now to be found in the southern States. Therefore, I do not mean to be held responsible in any manner for any results that may have ensued from the disturbance of that compromise. If my own views had been carried out, I should have preferred to see the country rest on the Missouri compromise line. It had served its purpose for more than thirty years. It had been a measure of peace throughout this country. And when, either for sectional or selfish purposes on one side or the other—I speak with all deference to the motives and the action of gentlemen here—that line was disturbed, and the bone of contention dug up and thrown recklessly before the American people, without regard to the sectional strife it would engender, I, for one, deprecated that movement, because it brought into unequal contest, upon the principle of popular sovereignty, or upon the faith of the people, a contest between six or seven millions of whites on one side, and twenty millions on the other.

That was the reason why I opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise line; that was the ground on which I opposed the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and I am sorry to be compelled to say, perhaps in violence to the sentiment or to the feelings of other gentlemen on this floor, that the principle in that bill contained is nothing more nor less, as it has been carried out, than squatter sovereignty and alien suffrage. If both measures should become in the ascendant in this country, they must subvert every principle on which this Government was formed and based.

In the position that I assume, I do not conceive that I am called upon to investigate allegations of fraud, or to go further into the merits of this question than simply to ask myself whether this constitution is here by the authority of law, and whether it is republican in its form. After the very elaborate and the very able argument of the distinguished Senator from Virginia, I can add little to the views he has presented on those points. I am happy to have an opportunity to say now that though I have differed with the Democratic party of this country, and though I am in no manner under obligations to that party for any favors whatever, yet the present Administration has presented a measure to me that so accords entirely with my own view in the settlement of this question, that as an American Senator, having a just regard to my duty and to the obligations of the oath I have taken, I cannot for an instant hesitate as to the course I shall adopt.

If I had been bound by any of the principles contained in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, or by any of the obligations of faith promulgated by the Cincinnati platform, perhaps my action on this question might be different; but repudiating that whole bill, because it disturbed the great principle of equality between the northern and southern States; because it disturbed the equilibrium that had been preserved for thirty years; and because it gave to a reckless majority the power to crush out the rights of the South, I find myself here to-day pleading for that principle of equality, and maintaining it in accordance with the oath I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States.

It is said that every resident inhabitant of Kansas has not exercised the right to vote in accordance with the principles proclaimed by the distinguished Senator from Illinois. Whether they have or not is not a question of the slightest importance to me. I do not recognize the right; I do not admit that principle as being a prerequisite to the admission of any State whose application is presented to us for our consideration. I do not believe that the principle of popular sovereignty can be properly applied to a Territory. I believe that true popular sovereignty begins with the organized government of a State. I do not think popular sovereignty can be carried out and maintained in a Territory when the representatives on this floor of thirty-two States have the right to prescribe the terms upon which that popular sovereignty shall be enforced or exercised. I believe that so long as a territorial government exists, and so long as the people of Maine or Georgia, through their representatives, have a right to interfere with it, the people of the Territory cannot exercise popular sovereignty in the strict meaning of the term. To me it is a paradox to suppose that the people of a Territory, coming from every section of the globe, influenced and controlled by the action of this body and the other House, relying upon Congress for enabling acts for a dispensation of power on their part, can exercise popular sovereignty according to what I have been taught to believe true popular sovereignty to be.

Mr. President, this so-called popular sovereignty in the Territories is nothing in the world but squatter sovereignty. It is the exercise of the power of a mob who may choose to get together upon factious or other grounds, and who may, by possibility, fall into a form of government which might be in conformity with the recognized laws of the land, or might be otherwise. That is not, in my comprehension, true popular sovereignty. Being called upon to vote on the question now at issue, I am free to declare that I am not the advocate of the right of every resident inhabitant of a Territory to vote on the constitution to be presented to Congress for its adoption. I do not feel myself bound to consider that point. I belong to a party which, small as it may be regarded by gentlemen on this floor, and, in the language of the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] "ephemeral," gave in the last presidential contest nearly a million of votes against this doctrine. That party holds sentiments and principles which I will compare with his own. On this point I will, however, allude to the Senator's remarks hereafter.

But there is one other consideration that is weighing heavily upon me. It is the conscientious desire to discharge my duty here as an American Senator, uninfluenced by the future, perhaps for myself having no political future. God knows I aspire to none. Ay, and elevated as this position is, I did not seek the place I now hold; and while I stand here to-day, taken upon trust by the people of my own State; while I am here to represent the principles, as I conscientiously believe, of my own people, I mean to discharge that duty in accordance with the principles of honor and my own conception of right under the Constitution of this country.

I have nothing to look forward to politically, perhaps. It has been my misfortune to have always been in the minority in this country. I was a member, an humble member, of the old Whig party, which received its death blow at the hands of the distinguished Senator from New York, in 1852. When the old Whig party was disorganized and broken up, and when the great and conservative principles of that party were lost and gone, I had to seek some plank to save myself from the wreck. In doing so, I put myself upon the Constitution of the country, and not above it. In standing with the party that I am now representing here, in the small minority that it is, I conscientiously believe that its principles are so deeply ingrafted in the American heart that, however much trodden upon, misrepresented, and perverted, as they have been, when they are rightly understood they will come to be regarded as the principles of the early fathers of this Government.

Sir, I am proud to have an opportunity to stand here in the face of the world, upon the floor of the American Senate, and to say that I am not ashamed to proclaim that an American nationality must be preserved; that American interests must be promoted; that the decisions of the Supreme Court must be maintained; that alien suffrage and squatter sovereignty must be repudiated; that the rights of conscience must be respected. I am not here to vindicate myself from the mere paltry charges that may be made in misrepresentation of what have been vulgarly denominated Know Nothings in this country. The first and highest and the holiest principle to me is the maintenance of the Constitution of this country, the enforcement of its guarantees, the preservation of the rights of the States under the Constitution, without which you can have no Government, you can have no law.

These, Mr. President, are some of the leading measures of that contemned and despised party that I have the honor to represent. Is there a principle here, let me ask, that is not in conformity with our great charter of law and of liberty? Is there one thing I have uttered that is not taught by that paper? The distinguished Senator from New York the other day paid his respects to my party by alluding to it as an "ephemeral organization, based upon frivolous and foreign ideas." It is not so ephemeral as he imagines. I should be happy if I could say that the principles of the gentleman's party were only frivolous. They might possibly be characterized by a harsher term. The principles which I have the honor to advocate here to-day are to be found in the Constitution of the United States, not outside of it, not above it. I say this with emphasis, but with all respect to the distinguished gentleman, and for this reason: I cannot, in the decision of the present question, hold the slightest political affiliation with the tenets or doctrines of that Senator.

While I have all the feeling that I am uttering now for southern interests, and for the South, born, reared, and educated, as I have been, in the South, yet let me say that no Senator on this floor has a heart more expanded and more thoroughly in consonance with all the principles of the Union than I have. No man will stand here longer than I will vindicating the Union. The principles of the party to which I belong are based on one great idea—the preservation of this Union, by preserving the rights of the States in the Union. All other questions that came into its party platform were collateral questions, connected intimately and directly with, and pointing to, this one particular purpose and object. I might go further, and say more perhaps than would be justifiable upon the floor of the Senate of the United States, in vindication of a party, the members of which, whom I find in this body, I am happy to say, however few they may be, are gentlemen who command the respect of those who are associated with them here, and of the country.

But, Mr. President, to come back to the bill before us, this question is presented to me in an isolated form. I have to vote with the one party or the other on this floor. I am brought to the naked proposition whether I will vote to admit the State of Kansas with a constitution made under the authority of law, and professedly republican in form. These are the only points that I regard of vital importance in the consideration of the question. I have heard from no quarter any suggestion of a doubt that the Lecompton constitution is not here in accordance with law. All the steps leading to its formation were regular and lawful. I regard that point as settled.

The next consideration is, is this constitution republican in its form? I have read it carefully, and I can see nothing to force upon me the conclusion that it is not republican in its form and character. Then, sir, being under no obligation whatever to put a construction upon the Cincinnati platform or the Kansas-Nebraska bill as between the Administration and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I shall vote to admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. In doing so, I believe before God, that, as an impartial and independent Senator, I am acting in accordance with the requirements of duty, and which I consider every honorable gentleman placed in similar circumstances would be compelled to adopt. There may be party obligations upon some gentlemen influencing them to take a different view of this question from myself; but I have no embarrassment of that sort. If the Administration comes upon the same great highway of right that I am following to maintain and to preserve the guarantees of the Constitution, it is no reason for me to turn from it, and to be factious in my opposition to the Administration. I must vote on the one side or the other. I cannot upon national questions vote with the party upon the other side of the Chamber. I cannot vote with them because they are sectional, and not national; because I am the representative of a Union State, one not allying itself to sectional questions or sectional issues in any manner; and because every principle advocated by that party, in my humble judgment, is against the preservation of the Union, and in direct conflict with the guarantees and the requirements of the Constitution of the United States. I am aware, sir, that I may bring down upon me the accumulated wrath and denunciation of that whole phalanx; but I have a duty to discharge, and I will discharge it in the utterance of this sentiment, fearlessly and regardless of all consequences.

Sir, it has been announced by the distinguished Senator from New York, that the slavery question is settled. I believe it is settled, because the agitation of that question was only originally raised for the purpose of creating sectional strife, and uniting and banding together twenty millions of white people in the North against the ten or twelve millions to be found in the southern States, for nothing more nor less than to obtain the balance of power in this country. The question is settled upon the principle the gentleman himself has stated; and, on this floor there will, in the course of a very short time, be a majority of eight Senators from the non-slaveholding States. It was, in its incipency, a question merely of sectional agitation, and not one of national politics; and I do not believe that the question of politics has anything to do with it, further than to wrest from the hands of those who have heretofore held it, the control of the Government, in order that they may exercise it in their own way and for their own purposes.

Mr. President, this agitation of slavery, upon which so much has been said; this harp of a thousand strings, which has vibrated from one extreme of the country to the other, has no practical political bearing on the institution of slavery in the South to-day. It is a matter of political economy simply; and if gentlemen will turn to the tables with which your Departments are filled, they will find that, with your three million two hundred thousand slaves, taking the very strongest view you can possibly admit, you cannot get more than half that number—some one million six hundred thousand slaves—as laborers and producers in this country. Gentlemen of the South talk to me with much excitement as to whether Kansas shall be a free State; but permit me to say that I regard it as useless agitation. Slavery will be controlled by the immutable laws of political economy alone. If this body should declare to-day that no more immigrants should go into the Territories north of 35° without slaves, I do not believe that you could retain it there five years.

My reasons for making this broad statement are based upon the demand for slave labor in the southern fields in the production of those staples which form three fifths of the whole exports of the United States. It is shown by the book before me—one of the best compiled authorities I have yet found—Andrews's colonial report, published by order of the Senate in 1852, that the production of the cotton crop is some five or six hundred thousand bales short of the absolute requirement. Of the three million two hundred thousand slaves which we have in the whole United States, there are only two million two hundred and twenty-four thousand in the cotton-growing States. I deduct from this number two for every slaveholder for domestic purpose. There being two hundred and twenty-seven thousand slaveholders in those States, there would be over four hundred thousand slaves abstracted by household duties from the production of cotton and other southern products. I find that in the production of sugar, seventy-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-four are employed; in the rice crop, sixty-six thousand six hundred and fifty-three; and the urban slaves in the towns are upwards of three hundred thousand. Then you have in the nine cotton-growing States only one million three hundred thousand slaves adapted to field labor. When you subtract still further, in accordance with the census, all the slaves below ten and over sixty years of age, you have, in fact, but eight hundred thousand to produce the cotton of the whole United States.

Now, I ask gentlemen here who are engaged in the cultivation of this crop, if four bales of cotton to the hand is not an excessive average in the production of the southern States? According to the census, the average production is three and one fifth bales; but I will say four bales. I judge from the census tables, and from the document to which I have already alluded, that this is a reasonable estimate; though perhaps it may be too large. This gives three million two hundred thousand bales of cotton as the maximum crop that you can cultivate with the slave labor that you have now in the southern States. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] told me the other day that there were perhaps one hundred thousand other hands, white laborers, in Texas and other States, small holders who are engaged also in the production of cotton. That will account for the excess of production over three million two hundred thousand bales, which would be the production at four bales to the hand of the present slave labor.

The crop of cotton last year fell short some five or six hundred thousand bales of the absolute and imperative demand. What was the consequence? It rose to eighteen and nineteen cents a pound; and but for the financial crisis that overtook this country, breaking up all the avenues of trade and of commerce, we should have this day been compelled to pay twenty or twenty-one cents a pound for cotton. Last year the exports of cotton, according to Mr. Guthrie's report, amounted to $130,000,000; the year before to $88,000,000.

In 1852, according to Mr. Andrews's report, the total consumption of raw cotton in the United States amounted to $46,340,000; and in this the late Secretary of the Treasury fully and entirely accords. That added to the $130,000,000 of exports, makes the cotton crop of this country in 1855, when these tables were made, $180,000,000; and allowing for the increased production, the crop of that staple now is worth not less than $220,000,000—all or the greater part of which you must grow with slave labor, for the simple reason that the greater part of the lands adapted to the cultivation of cotton are in an insalubrious climate. They are exclusively adapted to slave or black labor; so situated that the white immigration to this country will not and could not readily mix with it.

Without depopulating the whole of the five non-cotton-growing States of the South, the production of cotton in this country is limited for the want of labor. According to the returns to which I have alluded, and to Mr. Guthrie's report of 1855-56, six hundred and fifty thousand bales of cotton were that year consumed at home, while our exports amounted to two million nine hundred thousand bales. I do not mean to say that the six hundred and fifty thousand bales added to the two million nine hundred thousand bales was the production of that year; for there was an accumulation of a portion of the crop of the year before, which had been held back by low water and from other causes, and which had been prevented from getting to market. Hence it was, that last year we found cotton rising to eighteen, nineteen, and twenty cents a pound without a corresponding rise in the price of the manufactured article; and we found half of the manufacturers of this land suspending and turning off their laborers because they could not afford to buy it.

What was the picture presented last year in Manchester? Meetings of the people were held to form Cotton Leagues to grow cotton elsewhere. I might read, for the edification of the Senate, if they had not turned their attention to it before, statements showing that, up to 1852, all the cotton that was produced in the world was 1,809,800,000 pounds, of which the United States produced 1,350,000,000—seven tenths almost of the whole production of the world, notwithstanding all the fostering care that the English and French Governments have given to the cultivation of cotton, in order to render themselves independent of us and of the productions of slave labor. The time was when the English Government, in endeavoring to crush out a rising and successful competitor, was willing to make large sacrifices, in order to have the monopoly; but that day is passed. With every exertion she has made—with all the fostering care she has given to the cultivation of cotton in every part of the world—in Egypt, the East Indies, the West Indies, Demarara, Pernambuco, Brazil, China, and all other places, I have given you the sum total of the cotton crop of the world, the United States producing seven tenths of the whole.

Well may England look to it when the peace, the happiness, and the prosperity of her people; when the strength, power, and glory of her own country is dependent upon it; because without her manufactures she is nothing. The two million bales that she takes from us form a bond of peace, a guarantee, a surety, not stronger, however, than that bond we have upon our northern brethren, who consume now as the basis of the whole manufacturing system of this country, seven hundred thousand bales of this same southern staple, upon which all the manufacturing system of the northern States is ramified and expanded. The manufactures of cotton, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the year 1855, are estimated at $70,964,712; and the value of all manufactured articles was $1,391,031,293. The whole value of agricultural products was $1,211,322,000, making in the aggregate the sum of $2,600,000,000 of productions in this land. Allowing $1,000,000,000 of these productions to be consumed at the points of production, where they were made by the planters and by the manufacturers themselves, we should have left for our internal and external trade $1,600,000,000. Deducting $310,000,000 of exports, we should have $1,300,000,000 of products sent from one section to another in this country upon the basis of a legitimate free trade—the mere exchange of equivalents.

Sir, is this not a question for my northern friends to consider? Out of that $1,300,000,000, of manufactured articles, I concede to the northern States two thirds. My own little State of Maryland, with six hundred thousand people only, not so many as the great city of New York, after deducting ninety-two thousand slaves and seventy-three thousand free colored people, produced $45,000,000 of manufactures, and $20,000,000 of agricultural produce. After giving to the northern States two thirds of the whole manufacture, I shall claim, then, two thirds of all the agricultural products of this country for the southern States, with ten millions of people altogether. But I shall be told, perhaps, that slave-labor is profitable in other pursuits than the cultivation of cotton. So it may be; so I grant you it is; but no other crop in this country stands upon the same footing as that crop—which is a monopoly, and controls, not only the destiny of this country, but, I may say, the destinies of the world. It is the great bond of peace between us and the strongest Government on the face of the earth. It is a bond of peace which ought to be shared between the northern States and ourselves.

I merely throw out these views, not in any reproach to the northern people, but simply as a consideration for them to regard the great interests of this country, to look to the permanency of this Union, to the working of this system that imparts to them greater benefits than they can derive under any other system of government. You may talk, sir, about this Union being in danger. I, as a conservative, middle man in this country, tell you that I believe in my heart of hearts that this Union is in danger; and I believe that it is endangered because certain principles have been promulgated in that section of the country holding the large majority—principles of higher-lawism; principles which set the Constitution at naught; principles which abrogate the opinion and the decisions of the Supreme Court; principles which have been introduced into this country at variance and in direct conflict with all the received opinions of a popular, free, representative form of government.

Mr. President, I am representing here in part a State as truly devoted to her southern associations and southern glory as any other State. I am representing a city, two thirds of whose commercial capital is southern. I am representing a people whose hearts are as nearly allied to the South as those of the people of any other southern State; but, sir, at the same time, I am representing a State and a city whose whole future is based upon this Union, who have signalized their devotion to the Union, who have contributed as fully and as freely to the formation of this Government as any other State in the Confederacy; and I should be recreant to the trust that has been confided to my hands if I did not protest against the agitation of this question, which has no practical bearing upon the subject of slavery. It has been said on the other side of the Chamber, that the majority of the people of Kansas have the right to amend their constitution in their own way, and for their own purposes, in their own time; and, sir, I admit it. I believe the people of Kansas, in their sovereign capacity as a State, have that right, and not before. I believe that by the agitation of that question here on this floor, you are keeping up, giving pabulum to that sectional strife which, unless it ceases, must deal the death-blow to this Union, and finally tear in pieces the wide charter of our American citizenship. I believe it in my heart and in my soul. I am conservative in all my feelings and views. I am as much opposed to ultraism or higher-lawism, whether it comes from the far South or the far North, as any Senator here. I believe that our destiny is in this Union, under the Constitution, and it is only under it; for when the Constitution ceases to be respected, when the decisions of the Supreme Court fail to be regarded—that umpire, that referee in the very construction of this Government, to whom all litigated cases are referred—there is an end to free representative Government here.

Gentlemen talk of dividing this Union. You may, by a convulsion, break up the Union; but you cannot divide it. You cannot, in my judgment, bring upon this continent two separate and distinct Powers. They cannot exist with the sources of their mighty rivers in one section and their mouths in the other. They cannot exist together in peace. Free government will then have failed; its soaring spirit will have departed; and then you will come to a stronger and more consolidated Government than that under which we now live. I trust in God that I may be spared that day; I trust in God that time may never come; but if the spirit of sectional strife is allowed to maintain in this country; if this question is allowed to be longer presented to the masses of the people—appealing directly to their sectional prejudices and passions; if the elements of discord be not removed from here; then, sir, I have but little hope for the settlement of the question without blood.

Mr. President, in voting, as I mean to do, for this measure, I greatly regret that the dominant party on this floor have seen fit to connect it with another; for, to my taste and to my sense, a more odious principle has never been promulgated in this country than is contained in the Minnesota constitution. I am not aware whether Senators have looked into that clause of the Minnesota constitution to which I refer. I admit, frankly and freely, that it is not my province or my right to amend, to alter, or to consider the provisions of the constitution of a State for whose admission I am about to vote, further than to enter my protest against them. The provision to which I allude is odious; it is dangerous. It is part and parcel of the doctrines of the distinguished Senator from New York; not "frivolous," but it is foreign to the principles of the founders of this Government. The Minnesota constitution provides—

"SECTION 1. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in this State for four months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time have been for ten days a resident, for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people:

"1st. White citizens of the United States.

"2d. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.

"3d. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization.

"4th. Persons of Indian blood residing in this State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilization, after an examination before any district court of the State, in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been pronounced by said court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State." * * * *

"Sec. 7. Every person who, by the provisions of this article, shall be entitled to vote at any election, shall be eligible to any office which now is, or hereafter shall be, elective by the people in the district wherein he shall have resided thirty days previous to such election, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, or in the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Mr. President, here is a principle to which I will never subscribe. It is in direct contravention of every notion of mine in regard to the doctrines of our Government. It is a principle which, if carried out, will aggregate in the masses of the twenty millions of the North all power, and deny to the seven or eight millions of white people at the South any equality in this Government. Squatter sovereignty and alien suffrage are principles that I abhor and repudiate. If carried out they will subvert every doctrine of our free Government that we have cherished and regarded. But, sir, I have to vote upon the Minnesota constitution upon the same basis as the Lecompton constitution, because it is here by the authority of law, because it is republican in its form. I vote for its admission, but I do say that the Minnesota constitution is in direct conflict with both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States in this respect. I have no remedy in my hands to right it. A wiser and a greater man than myself so proclaimed on this floor in 1836 against this doctrine in the constitution of Michigan. I protest against that doctrine which, if carried out, must break up that equality which exists in this Government, must destroy the rights of the southern States, and must eventually change the form and character of the Government under which we live.

I alluded, a little while ago, to a remark made by my distinguished friend from New York. I speak of him as my friend, because, really, I have no motive for addressing him otherwise than as a friend.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope not.

Mr. KENNEDY. I may speak with earnestness, but I feel kindly towards all my associates here, and I trust I shall never violate the rules of courtesy or gentlemanly decorum on this floor. I say at the same time that the gentleman thought proper to allude to that party, which I represent here, as "ephemeral and as frivolous" in its views. The head and front of the offending of Millard Fillmore prior to 1852 was that, under the solemn obligations of his oath, he enforced and maintained the fugitive slave law as one of the laws under the Constitution of this country, for which act the gentleman and his party repudiated him; on account of which they broke up every conservative principle that had been advocated by the old Whig organization in this country. I do not mean here to say one word against the distinguished nominee of the Whig convention in 1852, though his nomination was very much the work of the Senator's hands; but I say that convention dug the grave of the Whig party. That convention forced and led to the formation of the American party; and, in the incipency of that party, many of the distinguished gentlemen of the North, not perhaps the Senator himself, but some of his present followers, joined it until the question of slavery was brought into it.

Mr. SEWARD. The Senator will excuse me for asking him not to put any "perhaps" before my name in that category. There is no doubt about it at all.

Mr. KENNEDY. I did not mean to say that the gentleman himself had ever been a member of the American party.

Mr. SEWARD. Or had connection or sympathy with it.

Mr. KENNEDY. I said perhaps some of your friends had.

Mr. SEWARD. That is fair.

Mr. KENNEDY. I was perfectly aware where the Senator himself stood, and where his present party stands; and it is upon that knowledge that I have to take my position now. I have to choose between them and their opponents here. Upon national questions there is no affiliation between the party of the Senator from New York and myself. Upon mere questions of policy I make no pledges. So long as that great gulf has been made between us on sectional issues in contravention to the guarantees of the Constitution of this country, in violation of compacts and compromises, while we shall be very good friends we cannot work on the same side. I am free to admit (I say it in order to set myself right here) that I mean to vote for the Lecompton constitution because it takes the slavery question out of this Chamber, because it gives you no pretext, no legitimate right upon this floor to agitate further the question of slavery except upon that responsibility which all agitators and persons and parties found in rebellion against the organized authorities of the Government, choose to take.

Sir, the responsibility of agitation will rest upon the gentlemen here who initiate it when once the mantle of sovereignty has been thrown upon the people of Kansas, and outside pressure has been removed. I am happy to say, frankly, I am perfectly free to admit that the message of the President upon this question, however much he may have been wrong in his policy before, in my judgment is the only measure of peace that can now be adopted. Assuch I accept it. Upon that ground I take it. I believe, before God, he is right; but whatever result may come, I am not to be held accountable for it. The authors, and beginners, and originators, of this question must take the responsibility to themselves. I do not mean to vote to keep up agitation in Kansas by letting the people of Maine or Georgia, Maryland or Vermont, claim the right to frame a constitution there. A constitution has been presented to me in conformity with law, legal in all its bearings. The question of fraud I ignore. There has been fraud on all sides. There has been chateury of every kind. I do not mean to consider it. If representatives come here under a fraudulent vote it is competent for this body to purge itself of them, and to investigate frauds affecting the election of its members.

I have stated my views, Mr. President; I have protested against the principle of the Minnesota constitution. I speak for a State that I believe to be as truly, I know to be as thoroughly, sensitive upon all questions affecting the rights of the South as any; yet, at the same time, with every pulsation of her heart beating for the preservation of this Union; with every commercial tie and connection that she has with the South and Southwest, she is endeavoring to act as a mediator in all this war of strife upon an impractical issue—one, really in my humble judgment, of not the slightest moment or the slightest importance, for the reasons I have stated; because slave labor will be controlled by the principle of political economy, the immutable law of supply and demand. I vote, then, to take the question of slavery away from these Halls by the only means that is in my power. I vote in accordance with the principle of the party that I have the honor to represent, which has for one of its cardinal doctrines that alien suffrage and squatter sovereignty must be repudiated. Believing that the proper authority has decided it not to be necessary to submit the Lecompton constitution to every resident inhabitant of Kansas for a vote of approval or rejection, I shall vote for the acceptance of that constitution.

One other point of view I will allude to before I conclude; and that is the inalienable right of the people of a State, in the exercise of popular sovereignty, in conformity to law, to amend their constitution in their own way and for their own purposes. The Legislature of my own State of Maryland has, within the last three days, passed a bill on precisely that ground, all parties concurring in it. Americans and Democrats have just passed a bill to take the sense of the people on amending the constitution of Maryland, which now has in it a clause prohibiting the change or amendment of that constitution until 1862. It has been done in accordance with the forms of law. It is to be submitted to the people. If there be any question of difference as regards this particular constitution of Kansas, how can you so readily, in what manner can you so soon and so easily, remedy the evil as by admitting the State? If there be a majority of ten thousand against it, that majority can control it. Take it away from here, and let us get to the real business of the country. Let us take away the exciting subject of dispute and quarrel, for which this Congress has been agitated now for three months, and give it to the people of Kansas to settle.

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. WADE obtained the floor.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator give way? I suppose he does not desire to speak to-night; and therefore I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. Say one o'clock.

Mr. GREEN. To-morrow will be Saturday, and we shall wish to get through before it is very late. Half an hour devoted to morning business to-morrow will suffice.

The motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. EXCUSED FROM SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. RUFFIN. I have sought the floor for the purpose of asking to be excused from service on the Committee of Accounts. I have already stated my reasons for making this request. I will state, in addition, that the regular number of members of that committee is five. There is a good deal of work to be done by that committee; and it is but just to the members of the committee who are still acting that the full number should report at the committee-room. I do not expect to go there again. I have not been there since the action of the House upon the bill reported from that committee; and I think it is but just and right that I should be excused. I am already a member of one of the most important committees of the House—the Committee on Public Lands; and I prefer to devote my attention to that committee.

The question was put; and Mr. RUFFIN was excused.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. HARLAN objected.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The bill of the House No. 6, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1859, yesterday reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with amendments, was taken up, and the amendments reported by the committee concurred in.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communications, which were disposed of as indicated below:

A message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Attorney General, and accompanying papers, dated March 1, 1858, detailing proceedings under the act approved March 3, 1855, entitled "An act to improve the laws of the District of Columbia, and to codify the same." The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and the message ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a list of clerks and others employed in the Navy Department during the year 1857; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, containing a statement showing the number of clerks employed in the Treasury Department during the year 1857, per the eleventh section of the act of 20th of August, 1842; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the application of the Postmaster General for additional appropriations for temporary clerk hire; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Navy Department, transmitting copies of the Official Navy Register, for the use of members of the House of Representatives; which was laid on the table.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to resolutions of the House of Representatives of February 9, calling for the amounts appropriated and expended in each of the different Territories of the United States, for roads, bridges, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount paid from the Treasury, during the last fiscal year, for the legislative expenses of the Territory of Kansas—in answer to resolutions of the House of Representatives of March 1, 1858; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting orders of the Postmaster General for fines, deductions, &c., on contracts from July 5, 1856, to June 30, 1857; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill granting a pension to Christine Barnard, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for. Reports are in order from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to report a private bill from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, that all the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on Friday last, be now taken from the Speaker's table and reported to the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I prefer the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House reports are first to be called for from the Committee of Claims, for such reports as refer to business from the Court of Claims. Reports are therefore in order from the Committee of Claims.

No reports were made from that committee, and the Chair then proceeded in order with the call of committees.

R. L. B. CLARK.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, from the Committee of Elections, reported a bill for the relief of R. L. B. Clark; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

E. B. TALLCOT.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the payment of extra compensation to E. B. Tallcot, for his services and expenses in recovering Government funds, embezzled by Jacob Richardson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

A. A. MILLARD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report on the petition of A. A. Millard; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MORRILL. I would inquire if the order to print, made in reference to the President's message, laid before the House this morning, in regard to the improvement of the laws of the District of Columbia, carried with it the printing of the code of laws recently rejected by the citizens of the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Chair propounded the proposition that the message itself be printed, and not the accompanying documents.

THOMAS YOUNG AND NAHUM WARD.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims; made adverse reports on the petitions of Thomas Young and Nahum Ward, respectively; which reports were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Ely W. Goff; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, House bill (No. 59) in relation to courts, and the holding of the terms thereof, in the Territory of Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF CAPTAIN MILLER.

Mr. CLAWSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Captain Samuel Miller; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM EDMUNDSON.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William Edmundson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROSWELL MINARD.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Roswell Minard, father of Theodore Minard, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABEL M. BUTLER.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Abel M. Butler; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HANNAH LITTEL.

Mr. FENTON also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Hannah Littell, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NORWEGIAN BARK ELLEN.

Mr. CLINGMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Duncan Robertson.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the House will pass that bill now. It is a bill to refund to the Norwegian consul the sum of $749 92, which he paid for the repairs of the bark Ellen. It will be recollected, that when the Central America was lost, this vessel brought a number of the passengers to Norfolk. She was found to be in a very bad condition, and had deviated from her course. The commodore commanding at the navy-yard had no authority to pay the money for the necessary repairs, and it was advanced by the Norwegian consul. The letter of the Secretary of State, and the accompanying accounts, show how the money was paid. I think it ought to be refunded at once. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill. It will be remembered that the captain of the bark was presented by the President with a handsome watch on that occasion. I presume every gentleman is aware of the circumstances. I hope that the bill and report will be read, and that the House will then pass the bill.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if this vessel was a national one, or private property?

Mr. CLINGMAN. It was private property, I think. The bark rescued the American passengers from the Central America; it was repaired at our own navy-yard, and the consul, who happened to be there, advanced the money to pay for those repairs. It appears from the letter of General Cass, that the commodore would have willingly advanced the money if he had had authority to do so. I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

Mr. CLAY, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN P. BROWN.

Mr. CLAY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John P. Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM RICH.

Mr. GROESBECK, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Rich; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the respective reports, ordered to be printed.

A bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Anne Henry;

A bill giving an invalid pension to Henry Miller;

A bill giving a pension to Mary A. M. Jones;

A bill for the relief of Mary B. Dusenbery;

A bill giving a pension to Jeremiah Wright; and

A bill for the relief of John Duncan.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the case of John McGinnis, and that he have leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the latter part of the proposition.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I will qualify it by a condition that he leave copies.

Mr. LETCHER. Let him take copies.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I ask that the committee be discharged, and that the petitioner be allowed to take copies of his papers.

It was so ordered.

On motion of Mr. FLORENCE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the case of Anne W. Angus, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am likewise directed to report a bill to equalize the Army, Navy, and marine pensions.

The SPEAKER. That is not a private bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, it struck me that it was not exactly a private bill, although it is a bill of a private nature. I had not concluded in my own mind whether it was a private bill or not, and I thought I would test the sense of the House on the subject.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to make a general report, embracing an amendment of the patent laws. It is a matter of general interest, and I hope there will be no objection to its being presented, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEITER. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. That is a general law. I want no special privileges here. Let it take its place with other general laws.

DEPREDACTIONS OF CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. WOODSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope the House will now proceed to the consideration of bills upon the Speaker's table.

RHODE ISLAND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. DUFFEE, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, relative to the appropriation of public lands by the Government of the United States for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKER, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 136) for the relief of the heirs of John B. Hand; and

An act (No. 107) for the relief of Ephraim Hunt.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill of the House (No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton.

Also, that the President of the United States had notified the Senate that he had, on the 10th instant, approved and signed a joint resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President, under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired officers."

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table of a private nature.

The motion was agreed to; and the following Senate bills on the Speaker's table were severally taken up, read a first and second time, and disposed of as indicated below:

An act (No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter. Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

An act (No. 57) for the relief of James Beatty's personal representative. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 59) for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Babbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A resolution (No. 5) to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose that joint resolution will pass some time, and perhaps it may as well be passed at this time. I ask that it may be read.

The joint resolution was read in extenso.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

An act (No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kinny, late a private in company I, eighth regiment United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

An act (No. 61) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A resolution (No. 9) for the compensation of R. R. Richards, late chaplain to the United States penitentiary, for his salary to June 30, 1857.

Mr. FENTON. I ask that that joint resolution may be read; and I presume there will be no objection to its being put on its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that resolution had better go to the Committee of the Whole House. I think, if I am not misinformed in reference to it, it is based upon no principle of justice which should be recognized by this Government.

The resolution was read at length.

Mr. GOODE. I would state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee for the District of Columbia now have that subject under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I will move that the resolution be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 76, and put it on its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object, until the bills on the Speaker's table shall have been disposed of.

An act (No. 60) for the relief of Tench Tilghman. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 67) for the relief of Jonas P. Kcller. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 68) for the relief of Elias Hall, of Rutland, Vermont. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

RESOLUTIONS OF A LEGISLATURE.

Mr. GILMAN, by unanimous consent, presented to the House the joint resolutions of the State of Maine in reference to bounty on cod fisheries, and in relation to the distribution of a portion of the public lands belonging to the United States; which were referred, the resolution relating to fisheries to the Committee on Commerce, and the resolution referring to the distribution of lands to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILLS PASSED.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, the House then proceeded to the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on Friday last, when the following bills, reported without amendment, were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed.

A bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers;

A bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson;

A bill (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence;

A bill (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki;

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Dr. Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon of the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia in the war of 1812; and

A bill (H. R. No. 225) for the relief of John Richmond.

RESOLUTIONS OF MAINE.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, relative to the bounties on the cod fisheries; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARREN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGS and HAWKINS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 20, nays 134.

So (one fifth not voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE's motion was then agreed to—yeas 151, nays 49.

Mr. SICKLES. I ask leave to make a report of a private bill that it may be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] from the decision of the Chair. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the appeal, and to the ground on which the decision of the Chair was made.

The gentleman from Illinois rose in his place, and stated, in behalf of himself and Messrs. ADRAIN, MORRILL, WADE, BENNETT, WALBRIDGE, and BEFFINTON, of the select committee appointed under the order of the House of the 8th of February last, to whom was referred the President's message concerning the Lecompton constitution, with instructions, that, in their opinion, said committee had failed and refused to execute the order of the House contained in the resolution of their appointment, and had adjourned; and, as a proof thereof, he proposes, as a question of privilege, to read the journal and minutes of said committee, and a written statement relating thereto.

The Speaker decided that the opinion merely of a minority of a committee could not present a case involving the privileges of the House; and that inasmuch as it is not competent, except by the courtesy of the House, for a minority of a committee to submit a report, the facts upon which such opinion is based could not be ascertained in the manner proposed. In the opinion of the Chair, the instructions in the present case having reference neither to the time nor the manner of making the report, the House could not know whether there had been a failure or refusal to execute its order until the report of the committee had been submitted. He therefore decided that no question of privilege was presented by the gentleman from Illinois.

The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois was to read the journal, and to submit a written statement. The Chair decided that it was not in order, and that it would not be in order even if the committee had been called, if there was objection. The Chair refers to a precedent, exactly in point, in the first session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, on page 562 of the Journal:

"Mr. HALL, of Vermont, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the session as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, and everything connected therewith, offered to submit to the House a paper in the form of a report, which, he stated, contained the views of the minority of the committee on that part of the said message which suggests 'the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation, in the southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection.'"

"The SPEAKER decided that when reports from committees are called for, a report cannot be made from a minority of a committee, as a minority is not a committee; that the paper offered was not a report authorized to be made to the House by authority of the committee, and could not be received as a report from the minority; and that, consequently, it was not in order to offer the same."

"Mr. HALL then asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit the paper containing the views of the minority upon the subject aforesaid; which was objected to," &c.

Not only do the precedents show that a report from the minority of a committee is not in order, but they go so far as to show that it is not competent to refer, in debate in the House, to what transpires before a committee, much less bring the matter in the form in which it is proposed to be brought here by a minority, before the majority has reported. The Chair asks to refer to the Journal of the first session of the Twenty-Sixth Congress, page 418:

"Mr. PETRIKEN submitted the following as a question of order:

"That neither the chairman of a committee, nor any other member of the committee, or of the House, can be permitted to allude on the floor to anything which has taken place in committee, or in any way relate in debate what was done by said committee, or by the individual members of that committee, except it is done by a written report made to the House by authority of a majority of the committee."

"The Chair decided, generally, in favor of the question of order raised by Mr. PETRIKEN."

"Mr. FILLMORE, in debating the question before the House, made allusions to the proceedings in the Committee of Elections, and while reading a resolution which had been adopted in that committee, was called to order by the Speaker, on the ground that a member had no right to read papers containing the proceedings of the committee, (not reported by the committee,) although the amendment under consideration proposed to print their proceedings."

A question of order was made, and, after two or three days' debate, the decision of the Speaker, in ruling the remarks of the gentleman out of order—although it was a proposition to print that which had transpired in debate—was sustained by a vote of 98 to 84.

In the Thirty-First Congress, in a similar case, there was pending a proposition to authorize the taking of testimony in a contested-election case from Iowa:

"During the debate, Mr. ASHMUN and Mr. ASHE were proceeding to discuss and refer to certain matters which had transpired before the Committee of Elections, but which had not been reported upon to the House."

"Mr. FREDERICK P. STANTON raised the point of order that it was not in order, in the House, to refer to matters that had transpired before the committee, and not reported upon to the House."

"The SPEAKER sustained the point of order; and decided that such reference was not in order."

"From this decision of the Chair, Mr. SCHENCK appealed."

"The question was stated, 'Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?'"

"And, being put, it was decided in the affirmative."

So that, in the opinion of the Chair, the question of privilege does not arise in the case presented. If the majority of the committee had submitted the report, and it was proposed by the minority to submit a report, it, as the Chair decided yesterday, would be received as a matter of courtesy—universally granted, I concede, because it was with difficulty that I found the precedent which I have already read. It is generally received, and it is in this point of view that the Chair decided that the House could not know whether the committee had or had not discharged its duty, until the committee reported, and there was no time fixed in the instructions, requiring the committee to report at a particular time, or in a particular way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is not my purpose to enter into a lengthy debate of the question presented to the House in the appeal that I have taken from the decision of the Chair. The question which I raised yesterday, connected with the proceedings of the committee, was one which I thought it my duty to present as a member of this committee, and as a member of the House. Nothing but the most imperative sense of duty would have caused me to come before the House, and to make the statement which I have made, and the proposition which I designed to connect with that statement. Neither was it made rashly. It was made with a firm belief that, as a question of privilege, I had a right to make it. I believe still, as I believed then, that, as a question of privilege, I had a right to make it, and that, as a question of privilege, it ought to be entertained and sustained by the House.

The cases which the Chair has read in support of the decision which it made yesterday, are, in my judgment, not analogous to the one presented. In the one case, there was a proposition made to report, by a single member of a committee, a bill for the action of the House. If I understand it, the case cited was, that Mr. Hall, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, proposed to report from that committee a bill for the action of the House. Such being the case, it was a proposition to report something for the legislative action of the House; it did not relate to any conduct in the committee, or anything which had transpired in the committee room. It was a proposition to report, under the authority of the committee, that which could only come from a majority of its members.

"Mr. HALL, of Vermont, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the session as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, and everything connected therewith, offered to submit to the House a paper, in the form of a report, which he stated contained the views of a minority of the committee on that part of said message, which suggests the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications, intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection."

He proposed to make a formal report of a bill upon which the House should legislate for the country. That has no analogy to the case presented here. We do not propose to present a case for legislation at all. We, as individual members of the House, rise in our places, and call the attention of the House to the fact that we have every reason to believe and assert that certain other members charged with a particular duty have disobeyed the order of the House; that certain members, charged with the performance of certain duties, have failed to perform those duties. We report no bill. We report nothing calling for legislative action. Suppose six of us should rise in our places and charge that the other seven, a majority of the committee, were in a state of mutiny in committee; that they would allow no question to be put, and no business to be done; that they would assemble when they were called, but absolutely refused to do any business whatever—I put it as an extreme case: could we not have the right to rise in our places and present that fact for the consideration of the House, that it might either discharge the committee, or reconstruct the committee, or compel them to obey the order of the House and proceed to the investigation with which the committee was charged? Would gentlemen rise in their places and say, "wait, and see what the committee will report; let us see whether the committee will report that this state of disorder exists in committee or not, and then we can tell whether we will hear you or not?" I venture to say, an instance cannot be found where a case like this has been presented, which has not been considered a proper and legitimate subject for the consideration of the House. The House, whenever a question is raised as a question of privilege; whether it relates to the action of one member or more; whether it relates to their action as an organized committee, or to their individual action; whether they are disorderly, or not, if their conduct is not in accordance with the order of the House, it is a question of privilege for any member of the House to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the error or disobedience may be corrected.

In the other cases cited, where it is alleged that so far does the rule go that a member has no right to allude in debate to what has transpired in committee, with all deference to the opinion of the Chair, it strikes me that they have no relevancy to this case at all. They are dragged in, incidentally. They have no relation to the question before the House. Here the whole question before the House is the very thing itself. There is no other question, but whether the proceedings of the committee, when presented to the House, as I ask they shall be, will show the facts which I rise in my place and inform the House exists. As to the authority on this point, it is true that the proceeding in committee cannot, as a general rule, be alluded to in debate:

"1731. Where, however, a motion is made, relative to the committee itself, or its proceedings, the rule admits of an exception. Thus, where a committee on a private bill had brought its proceedings and its existence to a close, before making a report, by an adjournment without day, and a motion was made that the committee be revived and proceed with the business referred to it, a discussion ensued as to the extent to which the proceedings of the committee could regularly be stated or introduced as a ground for the motion, in which the Speaker (Mr. Manners Sutton) said, 'it was difficult to lay down a strict rule as to the statements which might be made of transactions in a committee,' but that if it was necessary to read from or introduce the minutes of their proceedings, 'the regular course was first to move the House that the minutes be produced'; and it was agreed that every member who had attended an open committee might state in his place what had occurred there, and that what had occurred in the committee might be stated, to lay a ground for the production of the minutes, though the minutes themselves could not be read until regularly before the House."—Cushing's Law and Practice, p. 169.

Well, now, sir, what is the motion here? I move for leave to present the minutes of the committee. I make a statement to the House, that the committee has not discharged the duties devolved on it by the order of the House, and I ask to present the minutes of the committee to show the correctness of the position I take. The proposition which I make is in substance the proposition quoted in Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, from which I have just read, that, when the subject presented relates to the action of the committee, I have the right to refer to the action of that committee; but that is the very subject itself. It further states that the mode of reaching the minutes is by motion that the minutes be produced. The form and phraseology of the motion is not material. The substantive proposition is here, that the privileges of the House have been infringed, and that the minutes of the committee show that fact. I ask to present the minutes of the committee, and the whole question is contained in the proposition that I make. Therefore, the proposition I make is abundantly sustained by the cases I have cited. A case in point is referred to us in the tenth volume of Hansard, second series, pages 10 and 11. On reference to the book I do not find the case, and there is probably some mistake in the reference. But the case is here referred to as one directly sustaining the point I have made: that, where a question is raised before the House as to the action of the committee itself, the minutes are in order to be read and referred to.

Keeping in view the broad distinction I make between the case, as cited by the Chair, which purported to be a report to the House from a committee, and the case now before the House, which is simply that members of the committee rise in their place, and state to the House that the order of the House directing a certain thing to be done, has not been done, the cases are entirely different. There is no proposition to report from the minority of a committee. It has nothing in the character of a report; is not intended to be a report; is not characterized as a report; nor has it emanated from the committee by its authority. It is simply this: members of the House, charged, in part, to execute certain duties, bring to the knowledge of the House certain facts which they state.

There is another rule, which I think is pertinent to the case directly before the House. It is this, as laid down in Cushing's "Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies":

"A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference, a principle which is essential to the regular dispatch of business, for if it were admitted that what the House entertained in one instance, and referred to a committee, was so far controllable by that committee that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end; and, as often as circumstances should afford a pretense, the proceedings of the House would be involved in endless confusion and contests with itself."

There is a necessity that the committee shall strictly adhere to the order of the House; and, if it is alleged that there has been a departure from that order, it presents a case which the House may entertain at any moment as a general question of privilege.

In the same volume, page 748, it is further laid down:

"When a committee is remiss in proceeding or making its report; or when a committee has adjourned without day, or to a day beyond the session, without reporting; or when it becomes necessary to fill vacancies in the committee, or to enlarge it by the appointment of additional members—in all these cases there is ground for further proceedings in the House."

There the doctrine is laid down, that, when a committee is remiss in its proceedings, there is ground for the further proceedings of the House. How is it ever to be brought to the knowledge of the House that a committee is remiss before a report is made? The committee are a majority of its members; and a majority will not report that the majority itself are remiss. How is the fact ever to get before the House, if, as is said here, that nothing can be heard from a committee unless it comes from a majority? A majority of a committee are remiss, and refuse to obey the order of the House; and yet, according to the rule I have read, when they do refuse, and when they are remiss, there are grounds for further proceedings in the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that point can be got over I would like to see it done. How is it ever to be brought to the knowledge of the House that a committee are remiss in their proceeding, before making a report? You may say that we may order a committee to report, and then we may know that fact. But you are not necessarily required to issue that order, as the law is laid down. They may be ordered to report upon a given day, and knowledge may come to the House of remissness prior to that day; because the parliamentary law says that, when there is remissness upon the part of the committee in their proceeding, or in their report, then, &c. The two branches of remissness are presented in the same view. Now, how are you to know whether they are remiss, unless you get it through the proper channel of a member of the committee laying it before the House for its action?

I do not propose to enter into any lengthy discussion of the question. I think, myself, that the plain rule, which would suggest itself at once, would be that the course I have pointed out is the only course which could be taken. Gentlemen say that no direct precedent can be found for reports of this kind. There is great difficulty in finding precedents growing out of the construction of committees in the British Parliament. Those committees are generally named by the person calling for the committee, and they are always constituted, if that course is pursued in harmony with the objects in view. There is scarcely a possibility, therefore, that such a state of things should arise there as is presented in this case. Hence there is not the same room for a difficulty such as exists here. But instances have occurred under which the law, which I have just cited from Hansard, has grown up.

Now, sir, it is not necessary, in order to make a principle good, that you should be able to find a precedent for it. Go back to the first precedent, and what is it? It is but the action of the body, based upon its good sense in judging of what the law ought to be, that makes the law. It is not necessary to hunt up precedents; and in nine cases out of ten, where they are sought for, they are not analogous; there is some shade of difference; and it is a most dangerous thing to attempt to force analogies for the sake of saying that you rest upon precedent, when it is a great deal easier to rest upon good sense and sound judgment. I shall not occupy the attention of the House any longer.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish either, Mr. Speaker, to prolong this debate; but I wish, before the question is taken, to reply briefly to the gentleman from Illinois. I stated yesterday, sir, that, in my judgment, no precedent, sustaining this motion, could be found in the British Parliament, or in our own Parliament, or in the history of any legislative body in the world. I have listened patiently to-day to the gentleman, to see if he could produce a single authority to sustain his position. He has not done it. He cannot do it. The strength of his argument, everything in it that has any force at all, is in the last clause of the authority which he read. I will read, sir, what precedes that:

"But besides instructions to committees, there are frequent occasions on which proceedings take place in the House with reference to committees, after the order of reference, and before a final report."

Section one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine, that follows that, gives instances in which it may be done—as when a committee is remiss in proceeding or making a report. That authority goes to this extent, and to this extent only; that a committee, before making a final report, are subject to the order of the House. How? By a question of privilege? No, sir; when you can make, in order, and according to order and rule, a motion requiring a report to be made, or giving further instructions, you can thus control the committee. That is parliamentary law. To that extent, this authority sustains the gentleman, and to that extent only. That I do not deny. The question which we now have before us is not that. The question is, is the remissness of a minority or majority of a committee a question of privilege? That is a question well known in parliamentary law. There are questions of privilege higher than privileged questions. The question we have to-day before us is, is the remissness of a committee a question of privilege? I say, sir, it is not; and the precedent and the authority cannot be found in Hansard, or in any writer in the books on parliamentary law. I defy its production, sir. What would be the effect of the establishment of such a precedent? You might have fifty questions of privilege here every morning, or at least thirty-eight. I think we have thirty-eight standing committees, and the minorities in each one might suppose that the majorities were not discharging their duty under the rules; for, mark you, there is no difference between a select committee and a regular committee—none. Under the resolution under which a select committee is raised, their duties are there pointed out, just as the duties of all other committees are pointed out in the rules. If it is a question of privilege in the case of a select committee, it is equally a question of privilege in regard to a regular committee. And the doctrine of the gentleman is, that a minority of any one committee can come in here on any day, override the business of the House, raise a question of privilege, and take possession of the attention of the House to bring the action of the majority of the committee before the consideration of the House. That is the gentleman's doctrine; that, sir, is his position.

Now, sir, what would be our condition in this House? How could we legislate? The minority of the Committee on Pensions might come forward and say that the majority were not acting in accordance with the rules of the House, that require them to examine and report upon all matters before them, because they did not look into a particular piece of evidence upon which the merits of a particular claim for pension rested, and raise a question of privilege. And then, while that committee was going on with its question of privilege, the minority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads might come in with a question of privilege, because the majority of that committee would not examine a certain piece of evidence in relation to a claim, and ask the judgment of the House in reference to it. We should have nothing but questions of privilege of this sort.

Mr. Speaker, questions of privilege are well understood in parliamentary law. We have privileged questions, as I have said, such as to adjourn, to lay upon the table, and the previous question. These are privileged questions; but there are questions of privilege above and higher than them. They relate to the conduct of members, the rights—the personal rights and comforts, if you please—of members.

Mr. STANTON. And their duties.
Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Their duties, if you please. Their duty to behave themselves in the House and in committee. I call for the production of a precedent for anything more than

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 16, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 70.

that, either in the British Parliament or in the American Parliament. The only authority the gentleman has cited on the subject relates to disorderly conduct; and it is right. If the members of the minority or of the majority behave in a disorderly manner in committee, then it is a question of privilege; it affects the rights, the comfort, the decorum of members; then it becomes emphatically a question of privilege; and if any such thing had been done in this committee, the gentleman would have had a right to bring it before the House for its consideration; but not as to what may be their judgment, not whether they shall think that this fact or another fact ought to be inquired into. No, sir; that is not a question of privilege. It is a question for the judgment of the member as much as his votes upon this floor. When you constitute a committee in the regular way, and intrust matters to them, it is the high prerogative of every member of it to be governed, until he reports to the House, according to the dictates of his own intellect and judgment. This House has no control over him. If he is disorderly, that is a question of privilege to be brought to the attention of the House.

Then, as I said before, the gentleman has utterly failed to produce a precedent for the course which he now pursues. He says that it is difficult to get precedents. Why, sir, there is hardly a subject connected with privilege, from the arrest of a debtor, the arrest of a member's servant, insult to him on the street, a challenge to fight—there is hardly a single conceivable case of privilege which there are not precedents for in the British Parliament.

Now, sir, I ask if the bare absence of a precedent is not conclusive that I am right in saying that such an idea never before entered the brain of any man in the British Parliament, or in this country, as that, because the minority of a committee think that the majority have not taken the view of a question which they ought to take, they have, therefore, a right to bring the matter before the House as a question of privilege.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that it is not a question of privilege. The fact that no such precedent is to be found in the British Parliament is conclusive to my mind that it never entered into the brain of a British statesman or Commoner that such a thing was a question of privilege.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, I do not wish to prolong this debate, and I do not intend to. I look upon this as one of the most important movements that has ever been made in this House since the foundation of the Government. I have endeavored to show what would be the effect of it. Any member of a committee in the minority might rise any day to a question of privilege; no matter whether it was a special or a regular committee. The movement is revolutionary. It strikes at the foundation of the rules of order of this House. If the House establish it, its operation would be to prevent the House from doing any business whatever, for it would be perfectly competent for any member of a committee that does not act in accordance with his views to raise a question of privilege and have the matter decided by the House.

Now, sir, on turning over the authority from which the gentleman [Mr. HARRIS] read, I find, on page 750, what I conceive to be the entire doctrine on this subject. And I wish gentlemen to hear it:

"When a committee has gone through with the business referred to it, and has agreed upon a report to be made to the House, the duty of preparing the report is devolved upon some one of the members, usually the chairman, by whom it is prepared accordingly, and submitted to the committee for their consideration. When the report is agreed to by the committee, the chairman, or some other member, is directed to present it to the House; and the committee, having thus performed its functions, adjourns without day, and is dissolved. But the committee can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent, nothing being the report but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled. The report of a committee, both in its form and as to its substance, ought to correspond with the authority of the committee. If it does not, it will either be recommended, disagreed to, or directed to be withdrawn."

There is the parliamentary law. The majority of the committee, in this case, has agreed to its report, and I have repeatedly offered to present it. It has been prepared conformably to law; and, if it be not in conformity with the order of the House, then the House has got control over the matter. When it is presented, that will be the time for action. The House can disagree to it, can recommend it, or can discharge the committee. The House has complete control over it. But the committee is first to report, and to report by the mouth of the majority.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman whether, if the refusal complained of be a refusal on the part of the majority of the committee to discharge their duties or make a report, there is, on his principle, any mode by which the question can be brought before the House, except by a suspension of the rules by a vote of two thirds?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Under our rules there are two different ways, I tell the gentleman, that occur to me on the instant. One is by a suspension of the rules. Another is, that on resolution day, any member has got a right to offer any resolution he sees fit to present; and it may be done by unanimous consent. Still, it is no question of privilege. The rules provide the remedy. The rules are ample. I have never yet known an instance of wrong complained of that could not be remedied under the rules. Why should time-honored rules be overridden in such a case as this? If you complain of the non-execution of the order of the House by the committee, why not hear the committee? I, as the organ of that committee, am prepared to meet the complaint before the House. I am prepared here to say and to show that the order of this House has been fully executed. If it has not been, it is for the House to recommit the subject, discharge the committee, or turn the subject over to another committee. I am ready to meet the issue. The majority are ready to meet the issue. But do not come in this sidelong way, overturning the rules and orders of the House, and upsetting parliamentary law, which would be just as unfortunate for one side of the House as for the other. I am for abiding by the rules and by the laws of the House, and for accomplishing nothing in an indirect way. Hence, as I said the other day, I am perfectly willing to let the report come before the House. Let it be printed; let members read it; and let a day be fixed for its consideration. And if the gentleman can show, by the printed reports, that the order of the House has not been executed, let them do it. I am prepared to meet them. Hence, I ask that, by general consent, the proposition may be agreed to; because, under the rules of the House, it is well known that the committee may not be called for three months. The Congress before last, the regular committees were not called after this period of the year: The Committee on Public Lands was the last called after this period; and all the regular committees have to be called before the special committees. That is why I was anxious to bring the report before the House, and to let the House consider it. I repeat the same now. I will not detain the House longer at this time.

Mr. GROW. I presume that there is no difference of opinion in this body as to the fact that the orders of any legislative body are to be obeyed by its committees. And if they be not obeyed, the subject is a question of privilege for the legislative body. The Chair so decided the other day in answer to a question propounded by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.] The only question that arises in this case is, how is this question of privilege to be got at? In order to ascertain whether a question of privilege arises, it is necessary to know what the orders of the House were. I will therefore ask the Clerk to read the resolution passed by the House under which this committee was raised.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Leecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates therein, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker; that said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution, and the laws under which the same was originated, and with all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution, having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

That is the order of the House made to this committee. It was, that they should inquire into all the facts in reference to the formation of this constitution. That was the subject-matter referred to this committee. The resolution did not direct them to report any bill, or anything to the House for its legislative action. It was simply a committee of inquiry. Now, have that committee obeyed the order of the House? If they have not, then they have violated the privileges of the House, and are subject to its action.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The merits of that report are not before the House; and I rise to a question of order, that the gentleman shall confine himself strictly to the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, it comes with an ill grace from the gentleman from Georgia, who, in his remarks, went over the whole question in all its bearings, to make a point of order on me. The gentleman spoke freely, without objection from this side of the House. No point of order was raised on him.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I confined myself strictly to the merits of the question before the House. If the gentleman wants to go into a discussion of the resolution, and what the committee has done, it is what I want, but it is what this proceeding will not let us do.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman rises to a question of order, let him state it. He cannot take the floor from me to debate the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I raise the question of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the question before the House.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Georgia did not declare to this House that the committee had executed its order fully; and yet the gentleman says that he did not go into the merits of the question as to what the committee had done at all.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I stated that I was prepared, at the right time, to show it; but I did not go into any argument to show it.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman declared that the committee had executed its order fully.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman from New York to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and he will confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. GROW. The question before the House is, whether the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] is a question of privilege? Then, to show whether it is a question of privilege or not, I propose to ask the House, whether the committee have obeyed the orders of the House? If they have not, I take it the Chair will decide that it is a question of privilege. Then I come to the point, how is the House to have their orders obeyed? and to show that, I have read the language of the order. You have raised a committee, which has been appointed by the Speaker, to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with the formation of a constitution for Kansas at Leecompton last fall, and presented to the House by the President of the United States, accompanied by a message. That was the subject referred to them. Now, it may be difficult to find in the books an exact precedent which shall apply to this case precisely, for the reason that the parliamentary law requires that when a legislative body orders a thing to be done through the medium of a committee, the presiding officer shall appoint a majority of that committee from those who are in favor of carrying out that order. And when the presiding officer appoints a committee, a majority of whom have declared themselves against the proposition, it is a violation of parliamentary law, and we should be at a loss to find a precedent to apply to such a case. I presume, under the circumstances, the raising of this committee has no precedent. The parliamentary law is clear. There is no question on either side of the Chamber in reference to it; that when a special committee is raised, the friends of the subject on which it is raised, are to compose the majority of the committee. I need not read the old phraseology of the rule in which it is prescribed; as it is said by Grey, "that a child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it."

Mr. WINSLOW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order. His remarks are foreign to the point before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels some delicacy in ruling upon the question, inasmuch as the gentleman is commenting upon the action of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. I am commenting on the subject in this view of it, that if a majority of a committee are opposed to the order of the House, and were known to be so opposed to it before they were appointed, how are you to compel them to obey the order of the House, except it be upon the report of the minority?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon the Chair for correcting him, he is mistaken in the fact which he assumes. The matter referred to the committee was the President's message.

Mr. GROW. That is a difference of opinion between the Chair and myself; and the difference arises out of the construction of the resolution. My construction is, that the only subject-matter referred to the committee is an inquiry into all the facts.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order. I am very reluctant to interfere with the gentleman's remarks, but the constitution of this committee has nothing to do with the question before the House.

Mr. GROW. I have no further remarks to make upon that point. If the majority of the committee, then, choose to violate the order of the House, and the minority of the committee have not the right to bring the facts to the attention of the House, how is the House to take action on it at all, and compel the committee to obey the order of the House? For instance, if you refer a bill to a committee, a majority of whom are against it, and opposed to any legislation on the subject, with instructions to make certain inquiries in relation to it, and report it back to the House, the majority of the committee being opposed to the bill refuse to report it back at all; I ask you if it would not be a question of privilege for any member to rise in his place and state that the order of the House had not been obeyed; that the committee had refused to carry out the instructions of the House in order to prevent legislation on the subject; I take it, that would be a clear case. We need no precedent for it. Common sense is precedent enough. This committee, a majority of it, are opposed to making any investigation. A member rises in his place and states that the committee have refused to make the investigation which the House has ordered, yet the gentleman from Georgia says we must wait until the majority of the committee have reported before we can raise the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to correct the gentleman. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the majority of this committee are opposed to investigation. Now, sir, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of investigating every material fact bearing upon the subject. I think the committee has done it, and at the proper time I shall be ready to show it. I did not wish the remark should go into the gentleman's speech that the majority of the committee are opposed to investigation, without reply. The committee have investigated every material fact having any bearing upon the propriety of admitting Kansas as a State into the Union.

Mr. GROW. The resolution instructs the committee to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of that constitution, whether they are material or not.

question of order. The gentleman is speaking upon the report of the committee. When that report is before the House will be the time to discuss that subject; and I shall then be prepared to show that it does cover every fact.

Mr. GROW. I was just speaking upon the point made by the gentleman from Georgia, that the report had not come in, when the gentleman from Georgia interrupts me; and now when I commence to answer the point of the gentleman's interruption, I am interrupted by a question of order. So it seems that there is great trouble upon that side of the House. When no objection was made to the gentleman's proceeding in his own way, I hoped I should not be broken up in my argument.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rose to interrupt the gentleman after he had made a statement of fact in regard to the committee. I corrected that statement of fact. Then the gentleman went on to make another statement which involves a fact as to the report.

Mr. GROW. I made no such statement; but I read from the Journals of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is getting beyond the line of legitimate debate.

Mr. GROW. I have no disposition to get out of the line of debate; but I do not like to be interrupted by the gentleman, after he has been allowed to proceed in his own way.

The resolution provides:

"That said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws under which the same was originated, and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution, having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas."

That was the order of the House. No discretion was left to the committee whether they were to investigate as to what they conceived material facts. They were to investigate all the facts relating and pertaining to the formation of the constitution. Such being the order, how can it be violated? By the committee refusing to investigate the facts. And when they do that it is a question of privilege, and the House have the right to have their orders obeyed. How can they have them obeyed? The gentleman from Georgia says, only by waiting until the majority make a report, when the minority can come in and raise the question that they have not obeyed the order of the House.

Mr. Speaker, you read the law, and I need not state to the House that the minority has no right to make a report except by unanimous consent. Then the majority can trample down the order of the House; and will they come in and say that they have violated it? Of course not. They are wrong-doers, and they will not report that they are in the wrong. If a single member objects to the minority stating the facts, it can be ruled out, and thus you can prevent the House from ever arriving at that point of privilege of compelling its committee to obey the orders of the House. It is only by courtesy, then, that it is to come in! Are the privileges of the House to rest upon the courtesy of members? They are rights higher and above the rules of the House. They rest upon no courtesy. The gentleman from Georgia said you could compel your committee to obey the order by offering a resolution on resolution day. When is resolution day? When you can get two thirds to suspend the rules of the House, you can offer your resolution, and in no other case, unless the States be called; and when the States are called a member can offer a resolution. But you may go through a whole session without ever reaching a call of the States. A large minority of the House could prevent it for a whole session, and thus again the privileges of this House are made to rest upon courtesy.

After its rules and orders are violated, and the majority refuse to obey them, it is the right of any member upon this floor to present that fact to the House, and they may determine what shall be their action; and in this case, supposing it is entertained as a question of privilege, the House may determine the proceedings of the committee when they are presented, whether they have complied with the order. Then we shall know whether the rights of the House have been invaded, and what wrong has been done. In that way the House has the means of knowing whether its order has been obeyed. If they determine that it has not been obeyed, they can issue new instructions, or they can discharge the committee and raise another, or they can lay aside the whole subject, as they please.

In the mode pointed out by the gentleman from Georgia, the privileges of the House, so far as compelling its committee to obey its order, rests upon courtesy, and courtesy alone; for there is no way of compelling them to obey, so long as there is one single man to object.

The gentleman from Georgia read from parliamentary law to show how the remissness of the committee could be obviated. I agree with him that it is to be obviated in the way pointed out. But this is no case of remissness. It is where there is a total disregard of the order of the House, which is a contempt of the House. How are we to reach such a case as that? We may read the parliamentary books, and I presume we will find no such case as this. We have an order of the House upon a certain subject, and the committee is formed with a majority against that subject. They voted against it when it was on its passage. That was the subject referred to them. No subject or measure of legislation can be reported under the order. They can only report these facts. The majority of them voted against any investigation.

Mr. WINSLOW. I call the gentleman to order. He is discussing matters not before the House. The gentleman cannot know what the committee did, until they report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. GROW. I mean to say this; a majority was placed upon that committee who voted against the resolution. It was a violation of parliamentary law, then, in the beginning, in appointing that committee; and the committee then violated the order of the House in their conduct if they refused to investigate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a point of order. It is out of order to state that parliamentary law was violated by the action of the Speaker. He has no right to arraign the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair intimated as much to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and hoped that he would not repeat it again.

Mr. GROW. I take it that the acts of the officers of this House, and the acts of members, are proper subjects for consideration.

The SPEAKER. At the proper time it would be so. In the discussion of this subject, the Chair is of opinion that the action of the Speaker, in constituting the committee, is not the proper subject of debate.

Mr. GROW. Then the Chair rules that that is not pertinent, and the subject of legitimate argument on the point before the House.

The SPEAKER. The opinion of the Chair is that it is not pertinent.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the appointment of the committee was a violation of parliamentary law?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a response to that question, as the Chair has ruled that discussion in that connection is not in order pending this question.

Mr. GROW. All I purpose to do in this discussion is to comment upon the acts of men. With their motives I have nothing to do. I disagree with men upon this floor in regard to matters of legislation. I believe that some matters of legislation now pending are as great outrages as were ever attempted to be perpetrated by a legislative body; but I charge no want of sincerity to those who advocate them, because the human intellect is so constituted that men hold all shades of opinion on the same subject, owing to diversity of education, or the stand point from which they view the same subject.

But I pass that by. But before taking my seat I wish to say one word upon a point to which I should before have adverted had I not been interrupted—that is, where a committee of this House is raised, and a subject-matter of legislation is referred to it, under an order of the House, and that committee comes in and reports to the House through its majority, and the minority of the committee are allowed to report only by the courtesy of the House. There is no question about that.

But if a committee is charged with an express duty, separate from the general duties of the committee, by resolution of the House, and the committee refuses to carry out that instruction, then, sir, I hold that it is a question of privilege that can be raised by any member of this House. And then the facts are presented to the House; the journal of the committee, showing its action, is laid before the House; and the House determines whether the committee has complied with its order or not. If it has, then, of course, the committee is free from censure; if it has not, then it is subject to the censure of the House, and the House can either give the committee new instructions, or discharge it entirely and raise a new one.

The question now presented by the gentleman from Illinois is: Has this committee obeyed the orders of the House? He proposes to lay before the House the journal and proceedings of the committee, all that they have to say in their defense, as well as what is charged upon them. That presents the question of privilege in the only shape in which it can be presented as a right. In any other mode it can only be presented as a matter of courtesy, and I hold that the privileges of the House can rest upon no such basis. In my judgment, this is a clear case of privilege which any member has a right to raise, and it becomes the duty of the House to act upon it, and to take such a course as they may think proper.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that parliamentary law and practice required that this committee should have been so constituted as that a majority of it should have reflected the opinions of the majority of this House; but whether so constituted or not, I hold that it is the duty of the committee to carry out the order of the House; and if they fail in so doing, that they would be in contempt of the House, and ought to be discharged, and another committee appointed that would carry out the order of the House, or such additions made to the committee as would attain that end. But, Mr. Speaker, how are we to know whether this committee has carried out the order of the House in the present aspect of the case? Here we have, on the one hand, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] who states that the committee have not carried out the order of the House; and here is the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] on the other, who comes forward and takes precisely the opposite ground, and alleges that the committee have executed the order of the House. Well, they are both highly honorable gentlemen, gentlemen of undoubted veracity. How can the House tell, in this state of the case, what the facts are, and whether the committee has discharged its duty or not? Sir, it cannot be done by allowing individual members to come forward and make statements of what has transpired in the committee. The proper way to get at it, in my humble judgment, is to submit here the official record of the proceedings of the committee. I understand that such a record was kept. I understand that that record includes the entire action of the committee, includes the report of the gentleman from Georgia, includes everything connected with the whole investigation, from beginning to end.

Now, sir, in my judgment, the proper way is not to take verbal statement of any member of the committee, or to allow it to be made; but let the gentleman from Illinois submit his statement—call it a report, or record, or what you will—and let the gentleman from Georgia do the same with his. We shall then have all the facts before us.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am sorry to be obliged to call the gentleman from Indiana to order, but I feel bound to do so. My point of order is, that the question before the House is whether the decision of the Chair, that this is not a question of privilege, shall be sustained? That is the whole question.

Mr. ENGLISH. That is the very point I am speaking to.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am not prepared at this moment, before a report has come in, to go into the question, whether the committee has discharged its duty? We shall be able, I think, to show, at the proper time, that we have not failed to perform our duty, as gentlemen charge.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is, whether this is, or is not, a privileged question?

Mr. ENGLISH. I am alluding to these facts for the purpose of giving my views in reference to that point.

Now, I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if the House should allow the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia to submit their statements, reports, or whatever you may call them, so that all the facts may be brought before the House, it will not then be in order to move to print those statements or reports, and to postpone their consideration to some future day, in order that gentlemen may examine the records, to see whether the committee has executed the order of the House? for this is the point in dispute. I submit that question to the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is exactly what I have been desiring all the time, that the House should allow our report to be presented, and also the statement, or report, or record, or what not, of the minority, and order them to be printed.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have the floor.

Mr. GROW. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Georgia cannot interrupt the gentleman from Indiana except for personal explanation. The gentleman was so kind to me when I was speaking that I want to return it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana propounded the question to the Chair, whether or not, if the report and journal and the views of the minority of the committee should be presented, it would be in order to move to print them, and postpone their consideration to a day certain?

Mr. ENGLISH. Yes, sir; that is my question.

The SPEAKER. The report can be received by unanimous consent; and when the report shall have been received by the House, and also the views of the minority, it will then be competent for the House to take such order as it chooses in regard to them; and a motion to print and postpone would be in order.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to ask further, whether, in the event that this matter shall be postponed to a day certain, after receiving the statements of these gentlemen, and adopting an order to print, it will not be in order, when that day arrives, to discharge this committee, to recommit with instructions, or to add to the committee?

The SPEAKER. The papers will be within the control of the House; and it is the impression of the Chair—the Chair throws it out as an intimation—that the House can make whatever disposition of them it chooses, either by discharging the committee, recommitting, re-instructing, or in any other way.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then, I appeal to parties on all sides to allow that course to be adopted, to receive the papers from both these gentlemen, and fix a day when the matter shall be considered; and then let the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his appeal. [Cries of "No! no!"] I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to submit their reports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object now, and at all times.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a suggestion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would like to state to the gentleman from Indiana the reasons why I object.

[Loud cries of "Object!"]

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to permit me to have read a resolution which, if he do not see fit to adopt it as his own, I will offer after he has taken his seat, if I am fortunate enough to get the floor. I think it will meet fairly the difficulties of this case.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the whole matter now before the House be made the order of the day for Tuesday, the 16th instant, at one o'clock, when the majority report of the special committee on Kansas affairs, together with the report of the minority of said committee, shall be submitted to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. I take it that my proposition is a better one than that. I want these reports to be printed, so that we may have an opportunity of considering them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the leave of the gentleman from Indiana, I desire to present a proposition which I think will exactly meet his views, and meet the exigencies in which the House finds itself placed. Hoping that this controversy and difficulty may pass away as a summer cloud, leaving no trace behind it, and enabling the country to come directly to a proper understanding of all this matter, and to arrive at a just and patriotic conclusion, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That both branches of the special committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to Kansas, &c., be permitted, each, as fully as it pleases, to submit to this House all proceedings of said committee, or failures to proceed, and all facts which either branch may regard as material or proper; that such reports, when made, be printed, and be made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. WINSLOW. I object.

Mr. STANTON. If the report of the majority of the committee recommends no action by the House, so that there can be no danger from its presentation, I certainly can see no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH.]

Mr. ENGLISH. I understand this to be the state of the case. Even if the gentleman from Georgia should, in the statement which he submits, recommend the adoption of a resolution by the House, it does not follow that the House is bound to adopt that resolution, or to concur in the statement of the gentleman from Georgia. Not at all. The whole subject will be open for the action of the House when the day arrives. Therefore, the objection of the gentleman from Ohio amounts to nothing. We are not going to be entrapped in this thing. When the day arrives to which this matter will be postponed, it will be then open to the action of the House. We may then discharge this committee, and provide for the appointment of another committee that will execute the order of the House; or we may get at it in some other way, by recommitting it with instructions, or adding to the number of the committee. There are various ways in which the House can secure that which it desires to be done.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: suppose that after we have got the reports in the House the previous question should be called, and that it should be seconded: what would then become of the question?

Mr. ENGLISH. If they have a majority, I say let the will of the majority prevail, no matter what that may be. That is my answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I apprehend, however, that the majority will be the other way, and that the order of the House will be carried out, as it ought to be carried out.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY,] that I have repeatedly stated that I wish to give ample time for debate on this report. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear me. I wish the House to understand that I will allow ample time for debate. I will allow three days; and I think that is enough.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The honorable gentleman from Georgia is but one member of the House. There are a great many others. If the previous question should be called and seconded, that would be an end of this controversy.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I generally speak for my friends.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do not know that the gentleman is authorized to speak for them.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have this much further to say on the subject. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia proposes, in his contemplated report, simply to submit a resolution, expressing an opinion. That resolution will not be final at all. He does not propose, as I understand him, to submit a bill, or joint resolution, providing for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he designs anything of the sort?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not.

Mr. ENGLISH. Very well; then there is no way in which the anti-Lecompton men in the House can be entrapped, because the gentleman simply proposes to submit a resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the subject be brought legitimately before the House, it would be, in my opinion, the right of a member to move to amend by inserting a bill, and the House might be brought speedily to a vote, without debate; and I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from Indiana, that he affix a proviso to his resolution, excluding any right on the part of any member, when that report is made, to introduce a bill to admit Kansas under the Leecompton constitution, and to have it put to a vote, so long as five members of the committee may desire further time to present the facts before the House and the country. With a proviso of that kind, I will support it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask this question: whether it would be in order to move to strike out a resolution and to insert a bill; whether any such proposition was ever made or entertained by the House of Representatives?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be in order. The Chair never knew such a proposition to be made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I recollect that a foreign State was once admitted into the Union by a joint resolution. Why not admit another State in the same way?

The SPEAKER. Did not that joint resolution originate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. COLFAX. I desire the ear of my colleague for a suggestion to be made to him. He must see that the objections on this side of the House, to allowing unanimous consent for the introduction of these reports out of their order, are insuperable. But I have no doubt that if he would modify his proposition so as to call for the official journal of this committee, it would be heartily acceded to on this side. With the arguments of the majority and minority of the committee before us, we can judge by the official record whether they have carried out the instructions of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment: it is not in order, but I must do it in reply to the gentleman in the latitude of debate he has taken. There was no official journal kept by this committee. If there was any record kept of the proceedings of the committee, (and I think there was,) it was unofficial. The committee had no clerk, and no journal was ever read to the committee.

Mr. COLFAX. I am perfectly willing, then, that the committee shall get together and agree upon what shall be their official record. Those fifteen gentlemen can certainly remember every material proposition that was presented to them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to say a word.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say a word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. COLFAX,] and then I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois. There is no necessity for the course suggested by my colleague. A journal was kept by the gentleman from Illinois, who is chairman of the committee, and he now presents what purports to be a record of the proceedings of the committee, in which is embodied the identical paper which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] desires to report; and I take it that if the gentleman from Georgia reports a portion of the same facts embraced in the statement which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to submit, it makes no material difference.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to reply to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that there was no journal kept of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No official journal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not know what the gentleman calls an official journal. I do know that it has been the uniform practice of the committees of this House to keep a journal of their proceedings, and that the chairman is charged with that duty, unless the committee is allowed a clerk by order of the House. As chairman of that committee, I kept a careful record of every proceeding of the committee, which was signed by me, and is as regular and correct as if it had been made out by forty clerks, and is the official journal of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. All I can say is, that as far as I know, if there was an official journal kept, the majority of that committee never heard it read. It could not be an official journal of proceedings unless it was read and approved by the committee, as the Journals of this House are read and approved by the House. It could not be an official journal, unless it received the sanction of the committee itself.

Mr. GROW. I desire to understand the proposition which is made, for there seems to be a diversity of opinion in reference to it on this side of the House. It is, as I understand it, that the journals of this committee, with the reports of the majority and minority of the committee, are to be submitted to the House, and postponed until some day when the question of privilege will again come before the House. Is that to be the record upon which we are to act when the question of privilege comes up? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. ENGLISH. What I propose is simply this: that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] shall have leave to present their statements or reports, or whatever you please to call them, that they shall be printed; and that all further action on the subject be postponed until some subsequent day—say until this day week. Then, if I understand it, the question before the House will stand precisely as it does now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand the proposition to be this: the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his appeal from the decision of the Chair. By unanimous consent, then, the reports of the majority and minority of the committee shall be received, and that they shall then be postponed until this day week. I will agree to that.

Mr. ENGLISH. I hope nobody will object. Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, Mr. DEAN, and others, objected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the rules will be administered strictly and let us go on and vote.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States by J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed the printing deficiency bill.]

Mr. QUITMAN. I call the previous question.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. ENGLISH. I prefer to say what I have to say, and then yield the floor altogether.

Mr. MORRILL. Being a member of that committee I desire to make a single suggestion.

Mr. ENGLISH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORRILL. The suggestion I have to make is, that the gentleman from Illinois shall submit his proposition, and that the report of the committee shall be received informally and printed, and then the whole subject shall be postponed for one week.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to submit to the Chair whether, if these majority and minority reports are submitted now and ordered to be printed, the matter will not then come up in precisely the shape in which it now stands?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the papers would be before the House for debate and consideration.

Mr. ENGLISH. In the same condition in which we have them to-day?

The SPEAKER. The papers would be before the House, and the question pending would be on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ENGLISH. I understand, then, that the questions will come up in the same order in which we leave them to-day?

The SPEAKER. In the same.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I object to this discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to give an explanation of my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana. It is that when the report of the committee comes before the House, by unanimous consent or otherwise, it is in the possession and under the control of the House. Then, if a majority be opposed to the recommitment of the report and these papers, they can vote down that proposition. Then, if there is a majority in favor of sustaining the previous question, they can sustain the previous question, and it will bring the House directly to a vote upon the resolution reported by the committee; and it will also be in order for the gentleman from Georgia to move a joint resolution for the admission of Kansas, as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee; and then the majority of the House will have it in their power to pass that resolution. And I go one step further, and say that even if there were no resolution appended to the report, if the House accept that report, and nothing more, there is no gentleman here at all conversant with the views of gentlemen on the other side of the House, and recently expressed in the other branch of the Legislature, but would hold that the adoption of a report like that of the majority of the committee would be equivalent to a vote on the part of the House to admit Kansas as a State, and the adoption of such a report by each of the two Houses of Congress would amount to a sufficient legislative admission of Kansas, or recognition of it as a State. For these reasons, and unless this report comes in merely upon a question of privilege, and as ancillary and subordinate to that, and not as the foundation of any substantive legislative action, and in no contingency to be construed to admit Kansas into the Union, I object to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would state to the gentleman from Maine, and to that side of the House—not, however, by way of concession at all, but simply because I want them to know it—that it is not my object, nor is it the object of this side of the House to introduce anything, or any joint resolution, or to take any action further than the resolution itself, in reference to the admission of Kansas.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then the gentleman will accomplish his object by allowing his report to be introduced as a part of the record by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No sir; I stand by the rights of that committee.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have been requested to yield the floor a moment to the gentleman from New Jersey. I will do so, and then I will yield no further.

Mr. ADRAIN. I am a member of the investigating committee, and that is the only reason that I have risen to say a word. I see we are approaching a definite point in this matter. At that we ought to be rejoiced. It appeared here, this morning, as if we should be involved in a great excitement; but it is passing away, and I hope it will pass away with good feeling. The proposition now made by the gentleman from Indiana is a correct proposition, and one which ought to be adopted by this House, on this side and on that. It was said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that he hoped there was nothing unfair in this matter. I say to him that there is nothing unfair, so far as my action is concerned. I think it is fair to the House, and fair to the country, that the reports should be received by this House, and that they should be printed, so that the House may know what they are, and what the definite question is to be decided when this matter comes up next week.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether it is in order to discuss anything except the merits of the question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is not strictly in order; but other gentlemen have been allowed considerable latitude of debate.

Mr. ADRAIN. I know it is not in order; but a great deal has been said out of order; but we are on a sort of compromise this morning.

Mr. CLAY. I object to these compromises.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have listened to all the objections which have been urged against my proposition, and it does not seem to me that any of them have sufficient weight; and I hope, upon further consideration of the subject, that they will be withdrawn. In order to accommodate the views of some gentlemen who have interposed those objections I will modify my proposition still further so that it shall be in this shape: that the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Georgia, be allowed by unanimous consent to submit their reports; that an order be made to print them; but that their reports shall not be accompanied by any bill or joint resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to that for the same reasons that I objected to the other proposition.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the gentleman from Indiana will add to his proposition, that no bill or resolution shall be offered by way of amendment, or adopted by the House, and that no action of the House shall be construed as an admission of Kansas, I will not object to it.

Mr. HUGHES. I rose to a question of order; and I wish the Chair and the members to understand that I insist upon my rights. I have the right to be heard, and I intend to have it. My question of order is this: that the question before the House is upon the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS.] I recognize no form of submitting a proposition for the action of a legislative body, except in the form of a motion or resolution. I conceive that the line of argument my colleague has pursued has no reference to the question before the House. It has been objected to by other gentlemen; and I insist upon the objection.

Mr. ADRIN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Indiana is continually rising to questions of order, and he is not in order in doing so. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have no disposition to participate further in the debate, and I appeal to the House for the last time, whether the proposition I have submitted will receive the unanimous sanction of the House. Let each of the gentlemen submit their reports now, but without bill or joint resolution; let an order be made to print them, and that the whole subject be postponed until this day week; and I would here remark, that neither of the gentlemen propose to submit either bill or joint resolution; and it is well known, and has been so stated by the Speaker, that a simple resolution cannot be amended so as to make it a bill or joint resolution, and consequently no advantage could be taken. Is there any objection?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until this day week, and call for the previous question upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope it will not be postponed, but that we will have a vote directly upon the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Was not that question taken yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it in order to make that motion again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is, under the ruling the Chair made the other day upon a question raised by the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair is of opinion that it would not be in order to repeat a motion to lay on the table while the matter is in the same legislative condition; but in this instance debate has ensued, and the House is entitled to the privilege of a motion to lay upon the table after that debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to inquire of the Speaker whether, if the previous question should be sustained, it would not cut off the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Has the previous question been demanded on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES?]

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Tennessee has moved to lay the appeal upon the table. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that, if the previous question should be sustained, it would cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. ENGLISH. Very well; then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON (at three o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. JONES's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 109, nays 111, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cushing, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis, of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Haich, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—111.

So the House refused to lay the appeal upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. FENTON stated that Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE had paired off with Mr. KEITT.

Mr. PURVIANCE stated that Mr. EDIE had paired off with Mr. MOORE.

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that Mr. HICKMAN was detained from the House by indisposition, and had paired off with Mr. SICKLES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, stated that Mr. HILL had paired off with Mr. McKIBBIN.

Mr. KEITT stated that he had paired off with Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE upon all questions relating to this subject.

Mr. SHORTER stated that Mr. MOORE was confined to his room by indisposition, and had paired off with Mr. HICKMAN.

Mr. SPINNER stated that Mr. MORSE, of New York, had paired off with Mr. GARNETT.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. CLARKE, of New York, was confined to his bed by indisposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE said: I have voted "ay;" but with the understanding I have had that the appeal will be withdrawn, I change my vote, and vote "no." I believe the decision of the Chair is correct.

Mr. ENGLISH said: Without intending to commit myself against the decision of the Chair, I shall, upon this question, vote "no."

Mr. GROESBECK said: With the same understanding as my colleague that the appeal shall be withdrawn, I vote "no."

Mr. HALL said: Before I vote I desire to say that some two weeks since, upon an understanding with Mr. WINSLOW, I paired off with Mr. BRANCH. My understanding of the terms of that pair is that it expired on Monday last. I wish to inquire of the gentlemen from North Carolina [Mr. WINSLOW] if that was his understanding also?

The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from North Carolina was not in the Hall.

Mr. HALL. Well, sir, I learn from members around me that my understanding is correct, and I desire to vote. Without committing myself against the decision of the Chair, I vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced, as recorded above.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, obtained the floor. Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield me the floor?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to this farming out of the floor. I insist upon proceeding regularly. Let the gentleman from Illinois make his speech; and, then, if my colleague can get the floor—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Well, I yield the floor unconditionally.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, (at twenty-five minutes past three o'clock, p. m.,) moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GREENWOOD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, withdrew the motion to adjourn.

The question recurred on the appeal: "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, after the long discussion that we have had this morning upon the question pending before the House, I do not feel disposed to occupy much of its time, particularly in view of the action that I propose to take. It was my purpose to have replied fully to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] Both the arguments adduced and the positions taken by him I think I could meet and most successfully rebut. In that opinion all that has since been said more fully confirms me. But in view of the influence of friends who desire that the question should come up in a more simple form, I propose to adopt a different line of action.

When I proposed to submit the journal and minutes of the committee, I proposed to embody in them the report made by the gentleman from Georgia as I find it in the papers, as I supposed, published, as he announced it would be, by his authority. In that manner I should have presented the whole question to the House, embodying everything connected with the action of the committee, so far as the record of the committee is concerned, and so far as the action and views of the majority of the committee are concerned. The proposition, then, that I had in view, was one that, in my judgment, presented the whole case fully and fairly before the House; so that it could act understandingly and express its opinion upon the full case as presented. I am still satisfied that this can be done in a different way, and done as effectually.

Among the various propositions that have been presented, however, there has been none that fully meets my approbation. The gentleman from Georgia proposed that by unanimous consent he should be allowed to present his report; that the views of the minority respecting the action of the committee, which, in the opinion of the minority, embraced a question of privilege, should also be submitted; that both should be printed, and that their consideration should be postponed to some day next week. I would not consent to that arrangement in the form in which it was presented. Something further is requisite. The House will observe the position in which I and those who entertain opinions like those which I have expressed, stand. To attempt to report upon the merits of the propositions embraced in the resolution under which we were appointed, entertaining the views we now do, would be, to a great extent, to stultify ourselves, by attempting to report upon that which we allege has not been duly and properly investigated by the committee. Therefore, in discussing the proposition that I have made in connection with this question, which I hold to be a question of privilege, I have not discussed the merits or demerits of the proposed admission of Kansas. I have not alluded to that subject directly or indirectly, except as bearing upon the question that now arises. But I intend to reserve to myself and those who act with me, whatever the action of the House may be upon this special report, the right to present hereafter such views and opinions as we entertain upon the questions embraced in that resolution. The document embodying the views of the minority upon the action of the committee, amounts to little more than a demurrer to the action of the majority. If that demurrer should be overruled—of which I entertain no apprehension or fear whatever—then we of the minority will ask to present our views upon the question, so far as those views can be properly deducible from matters in the possession of the committee and in the possession of the House. And I here ask the gentleman from Georgia, whether, in case anything should occur hereafter, there would be any objection to the minority of the committee presenting their views on the question, which they have not done in this point of submission that I have made? I want to know from him now, whether there will be any objection on the part of him or his friends, as far as he is authorized to speak for them, to the adopting of such a course?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I say to the gentleman, none whatever. That is why I delayed a week in presenting the report of the committee.

I have no doubt that the House would be willing to allow a week or ten days for the minority to present their report. I have no sort of objection; and I think I may speak with confidence for this side of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to understand this matter exactly. I do not know that I do understand it; but, if I do, I shall object. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to claim the right now to file before the House a demurrer to the action of the majority, as presented in the report of the committee. He asks that, on that demurrer to the action of the majority, he shall have the benefit of a trial before the House; and that, if he be defeated on that trial, he may come up again with a second report, and try the question over again.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I, and those with whom I act, claim nothing as a matter of benefit or privilege at the hands of those who oppose us in this thing; and if they want to object to the minority making a report, let them do so when this thing comes up.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection at all to the gentleman making his report in the regular way; but what I object to is this: that a minority of the committee should take one chance with their report, or their demurrer as the gentleman calls it, which is in fact a report, and then, having failed in that, be allowed to take another chance. I do not want any person to bind my action here, I have only risen in order to place myself in my proper position hereafter, that my own action may be controlled fairly and with a distinct understanding on the part of members.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am very glad that the gentleman from Virginia has expressed himself so fairly as he has done. He only misapprehended—very greatly, however—the object which I had in view. It was not to claim anything at the hands of those who oppose those who have acted with me in this matter. But, as gentlemen have been anxious for a proposition on which all parties could agree, I proposed to submit that as a question of the purest fairness in the world; and one which I really supposed would not be objected to. I did not propose it from any particular desire that the House should assent to it; but because I apprehended that if I did not, some member might, when the question came up, do as the gentleman from Virginia declares he will do. I therefore thought proper to call the attention of the House to it. If that be the course which the gentleman is determined to take, then my course is determined.

Mr. CLAY. May I be allowed to ask what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The appeal from the decision of the Chair, taken by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLAY. Has the gentleman withdrawn that appeal?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have not.

Mr. CLAY. Then how came up these questions of compromise?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. These questions have been before the House for the last two hours, by universal consent. That is how they came up.

Mr. CLAY. They have been objected to time and again.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. They have been objected to and acquiesced in.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the gentleman whether he now withdraws his appeal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have not withdrawn it.

Mr. CLAY. Then I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will confine himself to the subject-matter of the appeal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If these propositions have been made with a view of coming to a common understanding in relation to the question presented to the House, the anxiety did not originate with me. I was anxious, however, to meet the views of friends with whom I have been acting upon this question. When I took the appeal from the decision of the Chair, I did it with a consciousness that the decision of the Chair was wrong, and ought to be reversed by the House.

Still, however, reserving to myself the same right which I claim, to make this report of mine whenever the report of the gentleman from Georgia shall be presented, I can withdraw the appeal which I have taken from the decision of the Chair, and shall do so without assenting to the presentation of the report of the gentleman from Georgia. I am compelled to that course by the declaration made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

Had there been an understanding that this arrangement should be carried out as it was originally proposed to be carried out by gentlemen, in the spirit in which they professed to act, I would have been willing, for one, to withdraw any objection to the presentation of their report. After the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, objecting to that arrangement, I shall withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair, and let the gentleman from Georgia take his chances to make his report.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD (at fifteen minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. C. H. HALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HENDERSON to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which was created by the retirement of Mr. Thomson, of New Jersey.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 6) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson—to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

A bill (No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A bill (No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (No. 225) to increase the pension of John Richmond—to the Committee on Pensions.

The message by which the above-named bills were communicated to the Senate, also transmitted a bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Doctor Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy. It was not referred, the Senate having heretofore passed a bill of the same character.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOUSTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to use their best exertions to procure the enactment of a law for the payment to that State of the balance remaining in the Treasury of the United States of the appropriation for the payment of a certain portion of the public debt of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of D. Meriwether, praying that an appropriation be made for the payment of his salary as superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory of New Mexico, from July 27, 1854, to April 30, 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Cynthia Cony, widow of Samuel Cony, a seaman in the Navy in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension, to date from the time of her husband's death; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BIGLER presented three petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the proposals by Thomas Rainey for carrying the mails by steamers between that city and Brazil, via Sarannah and certain places in the West Indies, may be accepted; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of George Chorpennig, praying remuneration for losses sustained by himself and Absalom Woodward, by Indian depredations, while carrying the mails from California to Salt Lake City, under contracts with the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Charles Knap, praying payment for iron furnished, under the contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, for the new custom-house at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Arnold Harris and S. F. Butterworth, sureties of William G. Kendall, late postmaster at New Orleans, praying to be released from the payment of a judgment against them; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the Penny Post Company of California, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

ABIGAIL NASON.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senate to take up a little bill which once passed this body without objection, and has been twice unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims. It is the bill (S. No. 137) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of the late Abigail Nason, sister and devisee of John Lord, deceased.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs that there be paid to the heirs-at-law of the late Abigail Nason, sister and devisee of John Lord, deceased, late of South Berwick, in the State of Maine, the sum of $322, in full for the amount due to John Lord for services performed by him as a seaman on board the United States ship Ranger, during the revolutionary war.

This claim is founded upon the allegation that John Lord served his country, during the war of the Revolution, as a seaman on board the United States ship-of-war Ranger, from April or May, 1779, to May, 1780, when she was taken at the surrender of Charleston, and that he was detained on board a guard-ship some time afterwards, and finally liberated about the last of July—making in all fifteen months.

In the original petition of Mr. Lord for the payment of this claim, which was presented to the Twentieth Congress, he assigns as the reasons why his claim was not sooner urged, that at the time of his discharge he did not know that any provision had been made by Government for paying off the seamen; nor until 1798, when, on his return from a foreign voyage, he was informed by Captain Wardwell that he and other rangers had been paid. He then applied to an agent to assist him in procuring his pay, but without success.

It appears that there are no records of the Ranger in either the Treasury, War, or Navy Departments; but the case has been twice favorably reported in the House of Representatives, and once a bill passed for its payment; but it being near the close of the Congress, the bill does not appear to have received any action in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROSS WILKINS AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct the settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Ross Wilkins, judge of the district court for the State of Michigan, and to the legal representatives of James Witherell and Solomon Sibley, late judges of that court, such amount as may be due to them for services performed in the capacity of a land board, at the same rates as were allowed to William Woodbridge and their associates on the land board.

Mr. KING. There is a report, I suppose, in this case. If there is, let it be read.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no report on this bill, but there is a report on this subject made in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and I send it to the Chair that it may be read. The committee did not deem it necessary this year to make another report.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear it.

The Secretary read it. It was a report made by Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, on the 26th of December, 1856, to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 645) on the petitions of Ross Wilkins and B. F. H. Witherell. These applications were from one of the judges of the Territory of Michigan, and from the son and legal representative of another, to be allowed the benefits of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide compensation for the services of George Morell, in adjusting titles to land in Michigan." That act allowed compensation to Judges Chipman and Woodbridge, as well as to Judge Morell; and the same reasons which justified the payment to them, as members of the "land board," in virtue of their judicial tenures, would seem to require that like compensation should be allowed to the other judges; and the committee reported a bill for that purpose. The facts and arguments in that case are set forth in a report made during the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress. The case of Judges Woodbridge and Henry Chipman was reported upon in 1848.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator, as I do not want to oppose his bill, to let it lie over, in order to give us some time to examine it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

The bill was postponed until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill for the relief of Duncan Robinson.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I would gladly forego the task that is now before me, especially as the whole subject has been debated by those much more able to enlighten the Senate and the country upon it than I can claim to be. Indeed, after the able report of my colleague on the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] on all the points involved in the controversy, which met with my entire approbation, backed by that masterly speech which he made on the case, it would be arrogant in me to suppose that I could add anything that would tend to enlighten either the Senate or the country on the subjects therein discussed. I would not speak at all, sir, if I did not know that the people of the State which I in part represent are more deeply moved with the consideration of this question than they ever have been before. They consider it a question of the first magnitude. They are alarmed at the boldness with which a constitution is urged upon a reluctant people against their will. They are alarmed at the progress of the principle of despotism which they think they perceive connected with the administration of this Government.

The people whom I represent are not alone in these gloomy apprehensions. If I can judge from all I can see around me, and from all that I read in the papers, the minds of the American people are pondering on very little else than the great question which we have before us for discussion. I regret, as much as any Senator upon this floor can regret, that the great question of slavery dividing the different sections of our country should be so often thrust upon us; but its enormous magnitude seems to throw every other question into the shade. Until it shall be settled one way or the other, I do not expect to hear much else discussed.

Mr. President, I am aware that there are those within my hearing who seem to underrate the importance of this issue; but the President, in his annual message, did not underrate it. He understood the importance of it, very much as I have now stated it to be; for he said in that message that, from the time of the abrogation of the Missouri restriction, there had been no other question before Congress or the country of any considerable importance. That declaration is the truth. We cannot ignore the subject if we would. I know that blame is frequently thrown on various individuals because superficial observers suppose that a man can raise all this agitation, as they call it, or that a man may allay it, at his pleasure. Sir, those who take such a view of this great overruling question are but very superficial observers of what is passing. This controversy has its root deep in the institutions of our country—unfortunately so. The fact is not to be ignored; the agitation is not to be put down by the will of any man, and not by any set of men. It has grown with our growth, it has strengthened with our strength, and it has become more dangerous and alarming now probably than at any other period in the existence of this nation.

I know, sir, there are crimination and recrimination on both sides. It is said by southern gentlemen that the North are aggressive; that we are trespassing upon their rights under the Constitution of the United States. I claim that the aggression is and always has been on the other side, and I shall endeavor briefly to specify of what it has consisted. I shall not deal in those generalities in which gentlemen on the other side have indulged. If the North feel keenly on this subject, I think I can easily show that they have great reason to feel so. I will not go back to the foundation of the Government. I intend, as far as possible, in the remarks that I shall make, to endeavor to strike out a new course, and avoid, as much as I can, those topics which have been so ably and so thoroughly discussed by those who have preceded me.

I arraign the South, then, first, (for I will go back no further than the annexation of Texas,) with an enormous aggression upon northern rights in seizing upon Texas, and bringing her into this Union for no other purpose than to uphold, strengthen, and render predominant in this Government the institution of slavery, and that in derogation of the political rights of the North. Not only so, sir, but I stand here to arraign the South, and their northern allies also, of having done it in flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States. There was no warrant in that instrument for this great act of aggression. Especially there can be no doubt that the manner in which she came into this Union was a flagrant, undeniable violation of the Constitution of the United States. Did the Constitution of the United States make any provision whereby you could make a treaty with a foreign Power, and bring her into this Union as a State? I would ask the strict constructionists, on the other side, where do you find it?

Is there any other provision in the Constitution that warrants an act like this? If Mr. Jefferson could not find in the Constitution power to acquire Louisiana, if he could not purchase a vacant territory, much less could he treat with a foreign nation to merge her own Government and come into this Union as an independent State? I only mention this, however, in passing, as an accusation that I bring against the ambition of the South in trespassing on the rights of the North. I do not propose to discuss it at large; for if we were to undertake it, it would exhaust our time, and furnish a topic, probably, as fruitful of argument as the one under consideration. But if gentlemen claim to have constitutional authority to do such an act, I say it belonged to the treaty-making power.

Texas, at the time we united our destinies with hers, was an independent State, with a government and officers of her own, in the same way that we existed as an independent State. We had recognized her independence; and we might as well have taken into our Government any Power on the face of the earth, and embarked our fortunes with them, as with Texas. Was there any other way to treat with a foreign independent State, except through the treaty-making power mentioned in the Constitution of the United States? Could you, by a joint resolution of Congress, do that which the Constitution had provided should be done by treaty? I know that you tried to do it in a constitutional way. When it was first proposed, there was no man so bold or so reckless as to suppose it could be done in any other way than by the exercise of the treaty-making power by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it requiring two thirds to ratify the act. It was found that that would be impossible. It was found hard to procure a majority here to assist in doing the deed, much less could you muster two thirds; and the darling project must have failed without a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

But, like every other attempt you make, Constitution or no Constitution, your ambition must be gratified; slavery must be upheld at all hazards; and come what may, her will is law. Cotton is king, and many of you are lords of cotton. You brought into competition with the political power of the free States a vast slaveholding region, with the stipulation that you might make it into five States, and thus bring ten Senators here to face down and vote down the free Senators of the North. It was a vast acquisition. It was in derogation of our political rights, and we had a right to complain of it. If it had been sought for the general good of the nation, if it had been contended that its object was to inure to the general benefit, that would have done something towards extenuating the iniquity of the deed; but that was not even pretended. If you look at Mr. Upshur's letter, you will find the object stated; if you look at Mr. Calhoun's communication at the time, you will find that, with a boldness and directness characteristic of the man, he places it upon the ground that it is to extend and strengthen the institution of slavery.

But I pass over that. Texas had been a free country. Under the just rule of Mexico, recently acquiring her own liberty, she could not, with a hypocrisy characteristic of older Governments, fail to accord liberty to all her people. She had, by her decree, before this region was seized upon by us, abrogated the institution of slavery through all her borders. Texas was seized by our agents; the seizure connived at by the Government; she was reenslaved; and then, in the language of the time, reannexed to this Government.

The next great and flagrant aggression upon the rights of the North, upon the honor of the North, upon the pride of the North, was forcing upon us your accursed fugitive bill, as a badge of servitude and subjection. Following us into every hole and corner of the North, you cannot go where you may not find the fugitive hunted within our own borders and to our own doors. We cannot teach the great lessons of freedom to our children without being in danger of having this accursed act come in conflict with all our teachings. If a northern man endeavors to impress his posterity with the glorious old doctrines of the Revolution—if he undertakes to teach them that all men are equal—the first thing he may know is a marshal dragging a man back to slavery, for no crime that he has committed. Sir, those that live in the slave regions know not, and cannot appreciate, the feelings of outrage and indignation consequent upon witnessing an act like this. I do not claim that it comes in violent conflict with any of our pecuniary interests; but it is a badge of inferiority, of servitude, in violation of our principles, that a free people cannot tolerate, and ought not to tolerate, for a moment. The old law was bad enough; but the new one was not only more rigid, but it transcended and violated the Constitution of the United States in many particulars that might easily be pointed out.

But you were not content with all this. The tame and easy servility of the North, our ready acquiescence in these aggressions, I have no doubt, tended to invite the more serious aggressions of a still later period. Now, sir, we approach another and greater aggression; for these encroachments upon northern rights are in direct proportion to our easy forbearance towards injustice. They now begin to come upon us thick and fast and more serious still, until the whole country is alarmed at the prospect of despotism now thundering at our very doors. Next was the bold, reckless—attempt shall I say; no, the perpetration of the perfidious national, or rather sectional act of the abrogation of the old Missouri restriction. I know it has been harped upon enough; it is thoroughly understood by our people, and the indignation of all just men rises in proportion to the enormity of the act. There was no palliation; there was no excuse for it. The ingenuity of man has never yet been able to conjure up a reason that would cover the enormity of that wicked and unjustifiable act. You say the restriction was unconstitutional. I will not argue that point. I know it was constitutional, because the principle of it had the sanction of all the great lights of constitutional law for more than seventy long years. Every department of the Government had sanctioned it as a constitutional act. The greatest jurists in the land had so pronounced it—men whose prejudices were all the other way, southern gentlemen who would have been glad to find an excuse in the Constitution to abrogate or get rid of it. Mr. Calhoun, the great light of southern rights, conceded its constitutionality. Your Presidents all upheld it; your judiciary sustained it; your Congress ratified it as often as the question was made. It was left to lesser lights, in a less pure period, I fear, of the administration of our Government, to discover that the Constitution had no warrant for this great act—this act of peace as it was called. It had been an act of peace, whether just or unjust, and I think it was unjust in the commencement. I believe, as a northern man, that if I had been in Congress at that day, I should have stood with those who repelled all the pretensions of the South. It is said they agitated then, and shook this nation to its very center, making direful threats of what would be done unless some compromise could be made in regard to that Territory. I would have stood, looking them in the eye, hand to hand, and I would have settled the question then. I would have settled it so that it should stay settled forever. All their croaking and grumbling I would treat as a surgeon would treat such conduct on the part of his patient. I would have amputated the limb, and the question should have been settled then.

But a few northern men thought otherwise. A few of them joining with the entire South, settled that controversy by that great compromise, as it was called, and the country reposed in peace under it. It is true that the indignation of the North momentarily arose, and, I believe, they politically laid in their graves all the representatives from that region who consented to it; but, nevertheless, it was finally acquiesced in as a final settlement of the controversy, and it preserved the peace, for thirty-three years, of our Government. After that lapse of time it was discovered that the act was unconstitutional, and a great and violent aggression upon southern rights. Why did not Mr. Calhoun, who was in the Cabinet at the time it was passed, discover it to be unconstitutional? Why did not all those men from that region of country discover that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional? Why did they sleep upon their rights for more than thirty-three years before waking up to a sense of the outrage and wrong?

But, sir, passing by the point of its constitutionality, for I want to leave nothing to cavil here, suppose it was flagrantly unconstitutional, as you claim that it was, is there no obligation of honor, is there nothing sacred in a solemn agreement between men who have a controversy and settled it? Is there no obligation that they shall not open it again? If a man, who had a controversy in a court of justice, and being doubtful how it would be decided according to the rigid principles of law, should agree with his adversary, and they should pledge their honor to each other, "right, or wrong, we will compromise," what would you think of him if, after the price which had been paid to him to accept the compromise was safely in his pocket, he should turn around and say to the court, "we made no compromise, and if we did, it was not a legal one?" Sir, there used to be such a thing as southern honor; but it was not made manifest upon the abrogation of that compromise. That act was a flagrant aggression. It was an outrage, viewed in any way you please. It was done, as all the rest of your aggressions are done, for the purpose of upholding human slavery and rendering predominant in the nation, politically, those who maintain it.

That act was done four years ago. Encouraged again by our acquiescence in it, and growing bolder by the impunity with which these lawless deeds had been done, you have ventured at last upon an act, the doing of which was in principle precisely that which aroused our forefathers, and induced them to look Great Britain's power in the face, and to put her at defiance. They sought to rule us; they sought to put down our principles of popular sovereignty by force and violence, by what they called law; they denied to a majority here the right to legislate for themselves, and claimed the right to legislate for us; they roused the lion in the heart of the people of this whole country, and everybody knows the consequence. I am amazed at the boldness with which this act is attempted. The people are alarmed. I do not believe that those who are urging this measure with such vehemence upon the people, understand at all how it is viewed in the country.

Now, sir, I have given you a few specifications of southern aggressions. I do not claim that they were purely southern, for I know you had the mercenaries of the North joined with you to help you to do the deed; but nevertheless, you cannot cover up your own want of principle behind those traitors of the North, because you knew that they were not backed by northern sentiment, nor authorized to do what they did.

How is it on the other side? It is claimed by southern gentlemen that the aggressions are all from the North; but they specify nothing. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] the other day—I do not see him now in his seat, and I am sorry for it—said that, although they dealt so kindly by us, though they had been of such great advantage to the North, we had repaid them by plunder and slander; we had constantly plundered the South; and, almost in the same breath, he declared—and he declared it triumphantly; and, sir, it makes my blood tingle in my veins, when I have to admit that it was true—that the slaveholders of the South have ruled this Government for sixty long years. That was true, sir. With more than two to one freemen against you, you have had the fortune to rule, with absolute despotism, this nation for sixty years. If that gentleman were here; I would propound to him this inquiry: if you have ruled us, as you have for sixty years, how do you reconcile that fact with the assertion that we have robbed you; and why did you permit the robbery? What act have we—a conquered people, domineered over from the outset—done? How could we commit aggressions upon you? Will any of you upon the other side explain it? I know you are howling frequently of aggressions at the North—of northern fanaticism; and you cast upon us every opprobrious epithet that you can muster from the dictionaries, in order to show that we are not, somehow, well-behaved towards you; but you govern us—you boast of it, and it is true. To-day every department of this Government lies prostrate under your heel, as it has for sixty years, as you confess. Tell me, then, wherein we have trespassed upon your rights? How could we do it, if we would?

He wanted to know what guarantees we could give that we would not plunder them with tariffs and restrictions upon trade. Sir, we never have plundered you in that way. If there has been a tariff, your leading men have proposed it; you have forced it upon the nation. If there has been a Bank of the United States, your statesmen have proposed it, and your votes have fastened it upon the country. All those policies that you deprecate sprang from your own section, were propounded by your own statesmen, and were upheld by their votes. We are the conquered people whom you boast you have ruled for sixty years; and you, the conquerors, complain of aggression and wrong! The idea is perfectly ridiculous. You have molded the policy of this Government; you have shaped the administration to suit yourself; no measure has passed without your assent, within my memory. I should like to hear southern gentlemen to-day mention to me the act that has passed Congress, or the policy of the Government that has been carried into effect, unless it has met the entire approbation of the southern section of this Union. I ask for information—what is it? I hope you will either answer me, or forever hold your peace. Let us hear no more of northern aggression, unless you can specify in what it consists; for, as Lord Coke well said, "fraud lurketh in generalities." We have plundered you; we have trespassed on your rights; but your bill of indictment specifies nothing. Who can meet your charges?

It is thought that we are very unreasonable because we take so much interest in the institution of slavery. Now, sir, it requires but very little sagacity to see how that must be. I have been here long enough to know that that great body of northern people who remain true to the traditions of their fathers, who act up to the spirit of those who inaugurated our institutions, are just as much proscribed from any of the benefits, emoluments, or honors of this Government, as if they were alien enemies. There are nearly thirteen hundred thousand voters belonging to the great Republican party of the North, who, year after year, see the Government administered by hands that to them are alien, and they cannot participate in it. Why? Because, when a nomination comes before you, the question is asked, how stands this northern man upon the institution of the South? What are his views? Did he ever, in an unguarded moment, give utterance to the impulses of the heart of every freeman? Did his tongue ever pronounce that which the heart of every freeman feels? If he did, and any spy can fish it up, and bring it here, he is proscribed from any favors from the Government under which he lives, and which he supports. This should furnish a reason to you why almost everything political that is unpurchasable in the market, that grounds itself upon principle, and cannot be swerved by those appliances, now ranks in the great Republican party of the North. If men are purchasable, if executive favor can reach and sway them, if any of those appliances that are brought to bear in political controversies can swerve them from the truth, they have gone over to you; they have repudiated the principles under which they were born; they have forgotten the sentiments that they imbibed even from their mothers' breasts. Such men have repudiated all this, and sworn fealty to an institution that they hate; such are the men of the North who find favor in this Government; the rest are aliens, proscribed by you. Yet, sir, because they are not perfectly patient under this state of things, they are said to be fanatical Abolitionists. I should like to know how long the patience of the South would hold out? Let us reverse this nefarious judgment; let northern majorities come here as inexorable as are you; let us inquire, is he a slave holder that is proposed for office? does he train in their company? and if he ever dropped a word that favored the institution of slavery, let us proscribe him—would there be any shrieking? would you bear it like lambs? I do you the credit of saying that you would rise up under such proscription as this, and show a spirit more worthy of the fathers than we do on this side. I know you would. If we should undertake to hold you to those same intolerant and proscriptive principles that you exercise towards us, you would hear a howl worse than Mr. Buchanan heard from the South when Walker would not count fraudulent votes.

Mr. President, I have stated some of the reasons why northern men take a deep and abiding interest in the question of slavery, because it tends to fasten its nefarious shackles upon them. We may just as well look it right straight in the face, for it never will be allayed with sentiment; you may sing hosannas to this Union until you are hoarse; you may talk of our common blood and our common memories; and you may eulogize that great flag under which our fathers fought; and you may go into hysterics on the subject; but I tell you that governments, in the long run, will be governed by their interests as they understand them, and by nothing else. These are all very pretty matters in their place, but the administrations of government are made of sterner stuff. They are never perpetuated by sentiments like these. I say to you, Mr. President, there is, unfortunately—and I regret it as much as any other man—a diversity between us in our government that seems almost irreconcilable. I do not know but that means may be found by which this great gulf can be bridged over; but on the one hand you find the freest communities that the world ever saw, where real and unadulterated democracy does not reign as a sentiment, but is lived out in practice by all the people; where there is no aristocracy; where there is no man so high that he can claim a privilege beyond his most humble fellow-citizen. This is the nature of the communities of the North, and of none more so than of that State which I have the honor in part to represent here. That is the freest of the free. It was there that the mind of that great patriot, Thomas Jefferson, fixed his eye the moment we had repelled the force of Great Britain. His philanthropic eye saw that great and beautiful wilderness lying open, soon to be peopled by the citizens of the United States. It was a leading object with him there to carry into practice those beautiful theories of equality which had charmed his great mind so long. He labored unceasingly until he had fixed out a document fully to carry out there his great idea that the people should rule the governments of the earth. He found nothing in the way of his theory; there was a blank sheet of paper. There was a government to be laid, unstained by any of the crimes of ancient Rome. No institutions had grown up there inconsistent with right; and he fixed upon that soil to carry out the great theory of self-government for which the world had labored and sighed for so many generations; and there the work was completed. In that region there is no aristocracy. In that glorious region there is no slave. Whoever comes there impressed with the image of God, is acknowledged to have an inalienable right to liberty that none but God can take away.

This is the character of the communities composing more than one half the States of this Union. How is it on the other side? Why, sir, I understood the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] in the beautiful speech that he made yesterday, which would have challenged the admiration of every one, except for some sentiments that were scattered through it, to say—I have not had the benefit of seeing his speech printed, but I think he said—that these ideas of political equality which were held up before our communities were utopian and fanciful, and never could be realized. This probably was not his language, but it was his sentiment. Those principles of equality, asserted in the great charter of human liberty, the Declaration of Independence, he believes to be utopian, incapable of practice; mere abstractions, not to be lived out.

I wish southern gentlemen were better acquainted than they seem to be with northern institutions. I tell the Senator from Virginia, you are wrong in believing this to be an abstraction. It is, thank God, a truth, the realization of which any man can witness who will cross over into my State. I have heard these sentiments uttered so often on the other side of the Chamber that I have come to know that our views of government are just as diverse as men's views possibly can be. There is, as I said before, an antagonism existing between us which I know not how you are to cover up. The Declaration of Independence an abstraction! Are the great rights which it proclaimed, and which were the boast and glory of our fathers, "glittering generalities," having no practical meaning? If so, I would ask any man what did you gain by that boasted Revolution of yours? Wherein does your Government differ from any despotism on the face of the earth? Once break loose from the glorious doctrines of that great charter of liberty, and you are in the slough of despond; you have nothing to distinguish you from the most horrible despotism that ever reigned over prostrate human nature. I ask again, why do you boast of what your fathers did, if they established a mere abstraction, or, as it is sometimes called, a "glittering generality?" The Senator from South Carolina, carrying out the same idea, said:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect, and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement."

Now, suppose you had not that class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement: which class can you dispense with best? Of what use is your idle aristocracy? In God's name, have they not been the curse, the blight of every nation of the earth? You cannot have this refined aristocracy, says the gentleman, unless you have a class to do your drudgery; and that is the sentiment of the whole South. How diametrically opposed to it is the whole practical system of the North! Is it reasonable, is it right, that "a class" shall do your drudgery—"a class" that shall obey? Sir, labor should never be done by a class. If you obeyed the mandate of the Almighty, and labor were distributed among all the able-bodied men, it would cease to be a task; it would become a mere amusement, and it would tax no man's physical powers above what would consist with his health and his welfare. It was designed—for God is just—that this drudgery of which the Senator speaks should be distributed among all the able-bodied men so as to make it light, and then it would not be inconsistent with the highest perfection of civilization and refinement; but, on the other hand, would lead directly to it. Labor done by a class! That, sir, was the old curse of the Old World. A class has been assigned to do the drudgery, to do all that is valuable, to produce everything that is beneficial; and the system leaves aristocratical drones, useless, vicious idlers, whom any community can well dispense with. I say this class you can dispense with to the advantage of any community that I know of; but the class who do your labor cannot be dispensed with. The Senator says you must have a class to do your degraded labor. I deny that labor is degraded; and here is the point of difference between us, which I fear can never be overcome. That is one grand reason why we resist your system coming into our Territories; it is because you are determined to contaminate all labor by this degraded class. Will the free, intelligent laborer place himself upon a level with your mere abject chattel, and toil there? Sir, he cannot do it, and ought not to do it, and will not do it.

What an idea of labor! The Senator supposes that the laboring class want but very little mind and very little skill. Sir, there is nothing on earth that puts the human intellect to all that it can attain like the varied labor of man. What does your drone, your refined aristocrat, do in his mind? What problems does he work out? He consumes the products of labor; he is idle, and ten to one he is also vicious. He never invents. Go to your Patent Office, and see what are the products of your degraded labor and your refined aristocrat. The latter never invents anything, unless it is a new way of stuffing a chicken or mixing liquor. [Laughter.] He invents nothing beneficial to man. Degraded labor, with a low intellect, is all you want! Sir, the machinery brought into operation by intelligent labor is doing now more drudgery than all the slaves upon the face of the earth. The elements are yoked to the machines of human usefulness, and there they are doing the work of bone and muscle, and your system cannot abide with it. The doom of slavery would be fixed, if it was by nothing else than the products of intelligent labor. You drudge along in the old way; you invent no steam engine, because your labor is degraded. You do not want skill; you want but very little mind; and the Senator thinks the more ignorant the laborers are the better, for he says they are so degraded that they have no ambition, and they never will endanger this refined class that eats up the proceeds of their labor!

That is the idea of government that prevails all through the slaveholding regions of the South. Again, the Senator says of the degraded class that do the drudgery:

"It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-sill."

And then he goes on to say that we of the North have white slaves; that we perform our labor by white slaves. This class must exist everywhere, and they must be a mud-sill upon which you must erect civil societies and political organizations. How little that gentleman understood of the spirit of our northern laborers! I would like to see him endeavoring to erect his political institutions upon their prostrate necks as mud-sills. I think it would be a little troublesome. He might as well make his bed in hell, or erect his building over a volcano, as to undertake to build on his northern "mud-sills." Then, with a simplicity that shows he knows nothing of northern society, he says we have sent our missionaries down to their very hearthstones to endanger their system.

I do not know how that is; but he turns round and asks how we would like them to send their missionaries up to teach our laborers their power. I was astonished at such an idea as that being presented to political men of the North, who know and see and feel the power of the laboring class of men. We are all laboring men, and the politician cannot live unless they breathe upon him; he cannot move unless he moves with their approbation. They are the soul, the strength, the body, the virtue, the main stay of all our society. Deprive our State of its laborers and what would it be? We have nothing else, and we have none of your refined society that is spoken of. We all labor, and are all disgraced, as the gentleman would call it, in our community. Labor with us is honorable; idleness is disreputable. That is the state of things with us, and the laboring man knows full well, and needs no missionary to tell him, the potency of his vote.

We should like to have your missionaries come up and endeavor to endanger our society! Good heavens! One man has the same interest in upholding it as another. Suppose one man is richer than another in Ohio. There is no very great diversity, as a general thing; but suppose he is; take the child of the poorest man in our State; and has he any temptation to overthrow our Government? No, sir; full of life, full of hope, full of ambition to go beyond him who has gone furthest, he wishes to avail himself of the same securities which have ministered to the upbuilding of others. He is a citizen, who holds all the rights of citizenship as dear as the most wealthy. His stake in society is the same; his hope is the same; his interest in good government is the same. He is none of your prostrate mud-sills, deprived of those rights which God Almighty has given him, trampled under foot, and made to minister to the interests of another man. There is no such system as that with us.

But the Senator spoke about a degraded class in our great commercial cities. I have to confess that there is some truth in that. We have a degraded class in the cities. They are the offscourings generally of the Old World—men who come here reduced to beggary by their ignorance; reduced to beggary by their vice; ignorant, vicious, dangerous. I do not deny it. They are incident to all large cities; but the Senator should not complain of them. They are the chief cornerstone of your political strength in the North. Find me the vicious ward of any city that does not uphold your system of slavery, vote for its candidates, support its measures, and labor for its men. No, sir, you should not complain of this vicious population. In truth and in fact, they are about the only stay and support you have there now, and you ought not to traduce them. From their very natures, they attach themselves to you, and I do not think by any treatment you will be able to drive them off. They are naturally with you; they were slaves in their own countries; they do not know anything else than to be the understrappers of somebody; and when they hear that here are slaveholders contending with freemen, you find them with the former all the time.

Mr. President, I think this shows the antagonism between the institutions of the North and the South. We have not made them so. Nobody here is particularly to blame for the state of things that exists. It has grown imperceptibly with our growth. Our lot has been cast either on one side of the line or the other. Our habits and our education have conformed to that state of things existing where our lot has been cast. I can appreciate and make allowances for that, but I cannot be biased as to the right of the matter. I know where that is.

Now, what is the remedy for this? If you bring us into collision, your system of despotism encountering our system of freedom here on this floor, do you suppose there will be no excitement? Is any one so superficial as to believe that it will depend on the temper and disposition of a man, how this great controversy shall be settled? Not at all, sir. You may preach harmony, you may preach forbearance till doomsday, but a violent conflict will take place every time these principles meet on this floor or elsewhere, because they are naturally antagonistic. God Almighty has made them so, and man cannot reconcile them. What, then, is our safety? It is to stand upon the principles you once professed, rigid State rights, yielding to the General Government just as little power as is possible to cement it together so far as to provide for the common defense; for the moment you drag these things into the General Government, I assure you that you may preach conciliation until doomsday, and conciliation will not come.

I do not know, sir, what is to be the result of this controversy. I know some of you threaten to leave the Union unless you are gratified every time a collision takes place between us; and that Texas of ours with which I opened this debate, stands in a singular attitude towards us to-day. I have in my drawer three resolutions of her Legislature presented to us at this session asking for men for her protection, and for sums of money to indemnify her for expenses incurred, as she claims, in protecting herself; and urging upon the General Government to make further provision for that State, which has already cost us so much. Her Legislature has sent to us a fourth resolution. I have not got it here, but I heard it read at the table; and, if I understood it aright, she has given us fair notice that she is about to go out of this Union. At all events, I do not think that was in good taste. I do not think it was politic; because we may say to her, "if you are really going to leave us, perhaps it is best for us to make no further appropriation for you." Why beg of us protection, and turn right around and tell us, "we are going to put you at defiance; we are going to hold a Hartford convention of the South, to deliberate whether we shall leave the Union?" Before I vote for the supplies she asks, I think I shall want to hear an explanation of this. I may want to know whether they are to inure to the benefit of the Union, or to furnish powder to blow out our own brains.

Let me say here, Mr. President, that I have no apprehensions about the Union. The people I represent have got bravely over any qualms about your dissolving the Union. You may preach about it, and howl about it, until your lungs are sore; it will not move a muscle of my constituents or of myself. I know that our destinies are cast together; and whether it is beneficial or not—and I do not know whether it is or not—you can obtain no divorce. We are wedded for better or for worse, and forever; and we had better make the best of our lot. You cannot go out. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] asked the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE], in the course of his remarks, whether, if they undertook to go out of the Union, we were going to forcibly interpose to prevent it? I do not remember exactly what the answer was, but I wanted to ask another question, for it has taxed my ingenuity to know how it is you can get a State out of this Union. If the most violent resolution, if the most flaming declaration, could have done it, your Union would have been blown to atoms long ago. It wants something more than conventions; it wants something stronger than resolutions. I do not know how you propose to effect it. How can a State go out? A man may commit treason under the Constitution of the United States, if he levies war against them; he may be hauled up and punished; but how, in Heaven's name, is a State to go out of the Union? I should like to have some one who talks about it show me the modus operandi.

There was one aggression of the South—I will call it an aggression—that I failed to mention in its proper place. I allude to the late nefarious decision of your Supreme Court. They made a new discovery—a discovery that, by vigor of the Constitution of the United States, you can carry slavery all over the continent wherever your flag may float. I approach that subject with no pleasure. I wish I could entertain a good opinion of the judges of that court. I wish I could believe they were patriotic. I wish I could believe they held the scales of justice equal between the rich and the poor, the great and the small, unswayed by political considerations, uninfluenced by anything but their duty, which is the most Godlike that man can ever administer; that is justice unmixed, unbiased justice. I wish I could believe that that court were actuated by no other than these great Godlike principles in the decision they have made. It was a most extraordinary decision. The mode of coming at it, the decision itself, the time when it was made, are all calculated to inspire the mind with a suspicion that all is not right. I affirm that the Supreme Court, in making this decision, has done what no court of the United States had ever done before; but I do not hold this court, and never did hold it, in that reverence which some gentlemen pretend to entertain. I remember that it seems to be the mere instrument of political power. It follows it as the incident follows the principal. In the old Federal times when your alien and sedition law was passed and it came before that court, they found no difficulty in maintaining that most flagrant violation of the Constitution. Your sedition law was upheld by the judges of that court, and men were imprisoned by its process; and yet to-day there is not a man to be found in these United States but what considers that law a most disgraceful law to remain on the statute-book. It does not remain there as a law, but it stands there as a memorial of the madness of party and the easy method in which men will violate the Constitution of the United States. That was upheld. All men now consider it as infamous, notwithstanding it had the sanction of that court.

Almost the entire speech of the Senator from Louisiana—and I wish he was here—was made for the purpose of sustaining the validity of that decision. I am not going extensively into it, for I have not time, nor does it need a very extensive examination to show that it is a fallacy, a mere sham; that it has not the semblance or color of authority.

Dred Scott, the plaintiff, claimed that he was a free man; and according to the course of practice from the earliest organization of the Government, in every district, (for the cases establishing it are numerous enough,) he sued for his freedom in the circuit court of the United States. The pretended claimant put in a plea to the jurisdiction. He said that Dred Scott was a negro; that his ancestors came from Africa; that they were slaves, and therefore he was not a citizen of the United States, and he had no right to a hearing in that court. Dred Scott demurred to that plea; and that demurrer came up before the court, and it was the only question they could decide. After getting the plaintiff out of court, and saying he has no standing here, after murdering him, the court go on to declare principles most fatal to the liberties and rights of many of the American people. The like was never done before in any court. No court in this Union has been heretofore more chary of giving decisions that were not called for by the case, than the Supreme Court of the United States. They have always repudiated it. They would never go further than the necessities of the case required them to go. Was not the decision of the question of jurisdiction an end of this case? A majority of the judges decided that Dred Scott had no right to be in the court. They dismissed him from their consideration. What further was there to do? The Senator from Louisiana, in his argument, did not pretend, as a lawyer, to argue that this was not the effect of the decision; but he uttered what seemed to me very much like sophistry. He read from the opinions of the court, claiming that they had a right to go further. I do not care what they claimed. Any man that ever went through a lawyer's office knows that when they decided that the plaintiff had no standing in court, the case was at an end; and any opinion they should give after that was a mere obiter dictum, entitled to no more respect than though it had been delivered here or in the streets.

Mr. President, there is another thing to be considered in reference to that case. Here, to be sure, was a poor negro, having no friends, no consideration, nobody to look to his interests. He was a member of a degraded class, with whom the court might deal with perfect impunity. I fear that the court, swayed by political reasons, forgot the rights of Dred Scott, and plunged into this political whirlpool in order to control its currents. Is it not remarkable that America, the first nation in the world, should decide that a man may be so low that he cannot even seek his rights in the courts of the country? Was there ever anything like it in any community before, whether civilized or barbarous? The court tells us we have men among us so low that they can have no rights; that they are mere merchandise. But I will not travel into that field, which has been so ably discussed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] They grounded their decision upon history, not the Constitution. They traveled out of the Constitution of the United States, and sought to found their decision upon what they picked up as scraps of history here and there; and that history was entirely and utterly perverted, as was proved by the Senator from New Hampshire so palpably that no gentleman on the other side has yet risen to challenge its accuracy; and they cannot do it. I have a law of Virginia here in my drawer, which was passed at about the period of which the Supreme Court speak when they say that negroes were considered as chattels whom any man might seize and convert to his own use. At that very instant, in old Virginia, he was a citizen, made so by statute, if he was free; and I do not know but that he had all the rights of a white man. At all events, he was declared there to be a citizen. He was then a citizen in at least eight of the States of this Union.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator advert to that statute and give me its title? I will not interrupt him now, though.

Mr. WADE. I will show it to the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. I will not interrupt the gentleman now.

Mr. WADE. I have it here, though I may not be able to put my hands on the exact place at this moment. In eight States of the Union a black man was a citizen; and I do not know but that he was entitled to all the rights of a white man; for at that period you will find, if you search the history of the country, that a distinction between black and white was not taken. It was between slave and free. That was the question. Up to the time alluded to by the Chief Justice, I can find nothing that discriminates between the color of men. The only question was whether a man was a freeman. If he was, he was entitled to all the rights of a freeman; if he was not, he was a slave. But the Chief Justice says that all of them were so held. Good heavens! Had he not heard of the scathing anathema of Thomas Jefferson, of Judge Tucker, and of other great lights and worthies of the Old Dominion about that same period, in language more pointed than any other men could use? When was it that Thomas Jefferson said he trembled for his country when he reflected that God was just, and that his vengeance would not sleep forever? Yet the Chief Justice says it was not controverted by anybody. Sir, it was controverted by every man of the Revolution. They, seeking their own rights at the cannon's mouth, claiming for themselves the utmost freedom, and invoking the aid of God to help them to work it out, had not the impudence to look to Heaven and ask a blessing on their exertions in favor of a liberty which they denied to their fellow-men. No such reproach, Judge Taney, can be brought on the heads of the great worthies of the Revolution.

But I will not pursue that subject. I hand the Senators over to the refutation of this position contained in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, which cannot be answered. I say it was a flagrant perversion of constitutional law to go into these scraps of history to determine what your Constitution is. I recollect very well a decision by Judge Story—I have not the book, and I care not to quote it except from memory—where the lawyers plied him with the consideration of what gentlemen said in the convention which framed the constitution, and what exponents of it outside of the convention thought of it. Judge Story said, "if you make the least trade with your fellow-man and put it in writing, you cannot call coteremporaneous declaration to explain what was meant by it, but you must stand upon the bond; what is not there, cannot be explained;" and then he adds, "if in a simple contract such rules are to prevail, with how much more force in this great charter of American liberty when the rights, the interests of all hang upon it?" You cannot look out of it, for if you do you have no Constitution. Then it will depend upon the memory of man, the opinions of frail men, transmitted to posterity without any authority at all. I say to you that the court, in traveling out of the principles of law and going into scraps of history to construe your Constitution, have entered a field of more danger to your Constitution than has been broached by any other department of the Government.

I know that, to gloss this over, the honorable Senator from Louisiana, with that plausible and beautiful style of which he is so completely master, escaped from the rugged inconsistencies of this nefarious decision by passing a eulogy on the old Chief Justice. It was beautiful; it relieved him from the burden of encountering the enormous, glaring unconstitutionality and breaches of law summed up there. Why, sir, he went so far as to send the old man to Heaven even before he died. I do not think that decision will help him on his road. He coolly joins the current of popular opinion, turns away from the poor man who had sought the administration of law in his behalf, and says to him, "you are a negro, and you cannot sue in court; if you have rights, we cannot investigate them; you are a mere chattel!" Sir, if that helps a man to Heaven, God forbid that I should act upon such principles.

There is another consideration connected with this decision. I have not time, and I have not made it a point, to go into all its enormities. There are only one or two points in it that I wish to bring before the Senate. So far as I have heard them, those who yield to the decision of the Supreme Court seem to suppose that it is obligatory on everybody, and that the Senate of the United States, like poor Dred Scott, are barred and thrown out of court; that the President of the United States, and the House of Representatives, and every department of the Government, are ignored, and no better off than poor Dred Scott. I deny the doctrine—the most dangerous that could be admitted in a free country—that these judges, holding their office for life, reposing with total immunity, have any right to decide the law of the land for every department of this Government. Sir, you would have the most concentrated, irresponsible despotism on God's earth if you give such an interpretation to the decisions of that or any other court. No, sir; each department must act for itself. I stand here, clothed with the same power, to proclaim what is the Constitution upon the passage of any law that comes before us, as that or any other court. I follow my own interpretation of the Constitution; I am bound to do it; I have sworn that I would, and I beg of the Senate never to yield to this arbitrary doctrine that the Supreme Court can bind the other departments of the Government; that we must yield to the decisions that they make. No, sir; never. They may decide on the poor man's rights, who is so unfortunate as to fall within their grasp. They have decided that Dred Scott could not sue in the court. Right or wrong, constitutional or unconstitutional, that stands. It is the highest court; it has decided in the last resort. Dred Scott's rights have been determined, and determined forever; but no other department of the Government, no other right, was touched. Talk about their deciding that slavery exists in Kansas as much as in South Carolina! Talk about the highest tribunal in the land deciding that slavery is in your Territories; that every inch of ground outside of the free States is slave territory! I pity the weakness of the man who yields to any such idea as that. That court has no such transcendent power. It could bind nobody but the suitors in the court. It would be unfortunate if it could.

I know with what avidity your facile President seized upon the idea, and stultified himself by saying that it was a mystery to him that any man should ever doubt it. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday disposed of him in that particular. He disposed of him forever, and showed a hypocrisy, I am compelled to say, disgraceful to a man even in a private station. He who had deliberately put forth the doctrines of the Missouri compromise; he who had sought, over and over again, in the ripeness of his judgment, after full deliberation, to procure its extension and recognition by Congress, now turns coldly around and tells us it is a mystery that any man should ever have doubted it! Well, sir, if Mr. Buchanan is a mystery to himself, he is no mystery to me.

There is one other consideration that I wish to bring before the Senate. Why is it and how is it that the southern States, with one third, or less than one third, of the free population of this nation, have been enabled for sixty years to rule the destinies of the country? It has been done, in the first place, (and that is one reason why I contest every inch of ground,) because in a close oligarchy you have a power that a democracy of the same numbers can never have politically. The power of the Government seems to be in inverse ratio to the number of people that participate in the Government. And this is obvious enough. You have a class of not more than three hundred and fifty thousand slaveholders in the United States. They have governed this Union (so says the Senator from South Carolina, and he says truly) for sixty long years; not the people of the South, mind you; he says the slaveholders have ruled the nation. That is true. First of all, they placed their feet on the necks of all those who do not hold slaves. The poor men of the South he utterly ignores as having any political power, and I suppose they have none. They have votes, no doubt; but those votes are given in accordance with the will of this aristocracy, who are all-powerful; for it has been observed, and truly observed, that he who has the power over the subsistence of another has the power over his will. You, the wealthy slaveholders of the South, wield absolute dominion over your poorer white neighbors; therefore it was that the Senator from South Carolina said the slaveholders have ruled the nation. You three hundred and fifty thousand slaveholders have ruled your six million whites, (I go according to the census of 1850;) you have not only ruled your six million, but you have also ruled the fourteen million free people of the North.

How have you done it? You have done it because you had a general bond of interest uniting you, tying you together as if animated by one soul. What was the interest to me was the interest of another. You are forced all on the same platform, all acting to one end. You found the Democracy of the North divided in various pursuits, laboring in their various avocations, with very little time to study this problem of politics; and you have always been able to seduce enough of us over to you to enable you to carry your government along. I know that gentlemen smile at this; but I am compelled by truth to state facts here that I wish I could hide from the world. It is a rottenness at the North that you do not have. It is disreputable to us, but I am compelled to admit it. Your allies, the doughfaces of the North, in my judgment, are the most despicable of men. The modern doughface is not a character peculiar to the age in which we live, but you find traces of him at every period of the world's history. He is void of pride; he is void of self-respect; he is actuated by a mean, groveling selfishness that would sell his Maker for a price. Why, sir, when old Moses, under the immediate inspiration of God Almighty, enticed a whole nation of slaves, and ran away, not to Canada, but to old Canaan, I suppose that Pharaoh and all the chivalry of old Egypt denounced him as a most furious Abolitionist. [Laughter.] I do not know but that they blasphemed their God, who had assisted the fugitives from labor to escape. I have no doubt at all that when some southern gentlemen of the gospel come up to preach to the North, they will say that the Almighty acted a very fanatical part in this business. I am afraid they will say so; for He was aiding and abetting in the escape. But amidst the glories of that great deliverance, even feeding upon miracles of the Almighty as they went along, there were not wanting those who loved Egypt better than they loved liberty; whose souls longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt; and who could turn from the visible glories of the Almighty God to worship an Egyptian calf. These were the doughfaces of that day. They were national men. [Laughter.] They were not exactly northern men with southern principles; but they were Israelites with Egyptian principles. [Laughter.]

Again, when the Savior of the world went forth on his great mission to proclaim glad tidings of joy to all the people of the earth, to break every yoke, and to preach deliverance to the captive, He met with the same class of men in the persons of Judas Iscariot and the chief priests. In the days of our own Revolution, when Washington and his noble associates were carrying on that struggle to establish justice, and to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, they met with the same class of men in the admirers of George III. and Lord North.

They are all of the same class—false to the education of their fathers—false to the great principles which have been instilled into them by their mothers from their birth—willing to do anything that will minister to the cupidity of their masters, let the consequences be what they may. It is this class of men, aided by a close aristocracy at the South, that has enabled the minority to rule with iron hand the majority since the organization of this Government. I have endeavored to daguerreotype these men for the benefit of future ages; for I believe that, like the Indian tribes, they are disappearing. You have put them to very hard service, sir. They die faster than the northern negroes in your rice-swamps—politically, I mean. You put them to service that they cannot stand. When you ask them to vote for a fugitive bill, they may do it once, but political death stares them in the face. When you ask them to go with you for the repeal of the Missouri restriction, you find the same state of things. And now, worst of all, when you ask them to fasten upon their fellow-men, in a Territory of the United States, a constitution which that people abhor, I tell you every northern representative who participates in this act, is not only politically dead, but he may thank his God if he escapes with that.

I find, sir, that I am detaining the Senate longer than I wished; and yet, if I am to go over the argument of the subject immediately under consideration, I shall have to detain them some time longer. ["Go on!"] I shall be as brief as possible on this part of the case. I desire first to notice some things in the argument of the able and eloquent gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who addressed us on the day before yesterday. He endeavored to show that slavery was recognized by the common law of this country; and he even went to the continent of Europe, and entertained us with a very interesting discourse as to the old system of feudal slavery existing there under the title of villenage in its various forms. It is a little humiliating to us Anglo-Saxons, who claim that our race never has been, and never can be, enslaved, to show us that our ancestors, many generations ago, were the most abject of slaves. That, however, is the truth; but I did not wish to parade it before the Senate, for I had sufficient pride to endeavor to make the world believe that we were above these weaknesses, and that our ancestors always had been. In return, I have briefly alluded to the fact that his ancestors also were slaves; but they were very honorably discharged.

In the course of the Senator's argument, his astute and gifted mind entered upon a subject that he could not get along with very well. He endeavored to show that there was a distinction between the right of a slaveholder to his slave and the remedy he might have; and hence he claimed that when a slave went into a free country, the master did not lose his right over him, but lost the remedy. He said that in a free country where there was no law for the protection of the rights of the master, he did not lose his right to the slave, but lost his remedy—lost his power to control the slave. He likened it to the case of a man who had a patent right, or a poet who had a property in the productions of his own inspiration. I will read the Senator's language to show how the most gifted man, when he is not on his guard, may admit away his own case. He said:

"There lives now a man in England, who, from time to time, sings to the enchanted ear of the civilized world strains of such melody that the charmed senses seem to abandon the grosser regions of earth, and to rise to purer and serener regions above. God has created that man a poet. His inspiration is his; his songs are his by right Divine; they are his property, so recognized by human law; yet here in these United States men steal Tennyson's works, and sell his property for their profit; and this because, in spite of the violated conscience of the nation, we refuse to give him protection for his property."

Again, following out the same idea, he said:

"Does not every man see at once that the right of the inventor to his discovery, that the right of the poet to his inspiration, depends upon those principles of eternal justice which God has implanted in the heart of man, and that wherever he cannot exercise them, it is because man, faithless to the trust that he has received from God, denies them the protection to which they are entitled?"

That is a very sound doctrine, in my judgment—it is an appeal to that higher law which has been so much traduced. The poet has a divine right to the inspiration of his genius and the products of his mind; the inventor of a machine has a God-given right to the use of his discovery. Does not the honorable Senator see that if these rights are from God, above human law, no constitution and no law of man can take them away? And how much more has a man a right to his own body and to his own soul, than he can be said to have to his own productions. How could the gentleman fail to see that if the poet and the inventor had this divine right, the slaveholder could not claim the right of ownership over another man? Would not that man have the same God-given right that he claims for the poet and the discoverer? Most assuredly he would. This admission stultified his whole case. He admits, then, that slavery would be impossible. It is not a matter of right. No, sir; he might as well admit at the outset that slavery is not a matter of right. It is a matter of positive law. It is a matter of force. It is a matter of fraud. It is not a matter of right; and the moment the slave gets beyond the power to enforce the mandate, he is as free as his master. Has God Almighty put any mark on him by which you can say when he gets into a foreign jurisdiction, which is the slave and which the master? The slave might as well claim a right to the master, as the master to the slave, the moment he passes beyond the jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. President, with regard to the Kansas question, I shall treat it very briefly, for I have detained the Senate so long that it would not be pardonable in me to detain them much longer; nor have I strength to continue the argument. I contended here, four years ago, that the abrogation of the Missouri restriction would be attended by the same train of circumstances that has taken place. I contended then that you were opening this Territory to strife and to contention; that you were putting it up to a vendue, to make it a theater where the most selfish and outrageous passions would contend for the mastery; that you were begetting a state of civil war. You claimed that it was going to be all peace; that it was done for the purpose of withdrawing this terrible controversy from the Halls of Congress to your Territories. Do you gain anything by it? Agitation begins in your Territories. Is it not sure to find its way into these Halls?

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] the other day, in the eloquent speech which he delivered here, proclaimed that he who made an assertion to the detriment of a man that he could not prove, stood forth as a calumniator. I endorse the doctrine—that is so; and I stand here with the proof to show that the Territory of Kansas has been governed by a system of fraud, force, and oppression from the time the law was passed even until now. I assert it without fear of contradiction, and I stand here charged as a calumniator unless I prove it.

It does not come, however, well from the other side of the Senate to deny these things. It comes with very bad grace from them. The House of Representatives sent into that Territory a commission of the most honorable men, not on one side of politics, but on both, there to investigate the charges that were made against the first Legislature who, it was claimed, had usurped themselves into their positions by force, by fraud, by an invasion unparalleled in the history of the world—plain, palpable, known, premeditated, in open day. The commission went there. I have its report before me. I have read more than ninety of the depositions that were taken of men who are not impeached, men who were partisans, many of them, against the side of the question which I advocate. Here are their depositions. Perhaps I had better read some of them. They go to show you that even before this law was passed, there were organized upon the borders of Missouri divers lodges, under different names, for the sole and only purpose of carrying slavery into that Territory at all hazards. That was the object of their organization. They had all the paraphernalia of a secret society. They had their grips, their pass-words, their modes of recognition of one another; and before the day of election they went over there, embodied in military array, in vast numbers, with their colors flying and their drums beating, with guns, cannon, pistols, and bowie knives. They disseminated themselves through all the Territory, took possession of all the polls but one, and frequently removed the judges, giving them a certain time to deliver the poll-books—a few minutes—holding watch in hand, and pointing pistols at the heads of the election judges. They drove them off with force and fraud. This is undeniable. The volume before me proves it. It will go down to the latest posterity that these nefarious acts are proved. They are part of the records of your legislation. They never shall be gainsayed.

I know the Senator from South Carolina, and a good many other Senators, have been willing to divide the odium of this transaction with us. He thought there were disgraceful frauds on both sides—"disgraceful," said he, "to the country," and he has not sought to investigate them. He says it is a disagreeable subject, and he has no doubt both sides are guilty. Sir, it was not on both sides. It was only on one side. You took possession of those polls. You elected your own men, members of a foreign State, who came in there to control the destinies of this Territory, which it was especially said should be ruled as its own citizens pleased.

I do not want to detain the Senate by reading the pages which I have turned down in this document, unless some gentleman wishes to hear them. They are long, but they are all pertinent. All go to show the facts I have stated, and there is nobody to deny or contradict them. Now, you say we do not prove them. Did not we ask you for a commission to examine them during the last Congress? We made charges; we said they were true; we had letters and communications imploring us to investigate the state of things that was prevailing there; but as often as we asked you to give us a commission you refused it. Standing on that refusal, you turn around and deny the weight of the authorities we produce. Sir, that will not go down. Now, at a later day, when your candle-box frauds, your forgeries most disgraceful, are coming to light—when they are known of all men—we ask you for a commission to investigate this matter; and as often as we ask it you turn around coolly and vote us down, and then deny that there is any such thing! Sir, the country will take cognizance of that.

The fraud by which the election of March 30, 1855, was carried, is established. I know you undertake to estop us by saying that Governor Reeder gave certificates to a majority of the members. So he did; but that did not cure the usurpation. I think the Governor allowed but four days to receive protests contesting the seats of the members elect. The people, scattered as they were, could not prepare their memorials to the Governor and get them there in time. In every instance where it was done, the election was set aside for most palpable frauds; but the setting them aside availed nothing. There were your blue lodges, your usurpers, in power. They were taking their seats by a usurpation; they were not to be turned aside by anything like this. New elections were ordered in several of the districts, and in every instance the free-State men were returned; but, on the very first day of the meeting of the Legislature, without investigation, without referring to a committee, they just turned every free-State man right out of the Legislature. What good would it do to give certificates? But is a man to be estopped on a gross usurpation like this? Is an American citizen to be cheated out of his rights under forms of law? I ask any honorable gentleman on the other side, would you submit to it? No, sir, you would not. Would you submit to be governed by a gang of usurpers who, without right and in defiance of right, had taken possession of your ballot-boxes, defeated your election, turned your countrymen out, and foreigners usurped your places? Would technicalities avail? No, sir; I have too high an opinion of you to believe that.

It would be idle, mere miserable pettifoggery, to come in and say, oh, you have certificates from the Governor and that cures everything, and we cannot be admitted to prove that it was a usurpation. Sir, there was not a man who received his certificate as having been elected on that day, who had any more title to a seat in the Legislature than he had to the kingdom of heaven; and can a certificate give a man the right to rule in this country? Sir, American liberty rests on no fragile basis like that; and shame to the man who will say that he would succumb to a fraud like this.

Such was the original usurpation. It was the result of fraud. It was worse than void. It was a result brought about by the commission of the highest crimes against American liberty that man can be guilty of. It was a Legislature elected in this manner, that took the initiatory steps towards the convention which framed this constitution. I say a body elected in such a manner could do no legal acts. They got together, however, and in hot haste passed all the laws of Missouri in a body, as the Senator from Michigan stated yesterday. They did not alter their titles, but they took a short road, by saying we will take the whole code, and wherever it says State it shall be construed to mean "Territory." I have looked through that code somewhat, and there I find the provisions for patrols to keep the slaves in order at night, as they have in Missouri. Those laws were transferred into the Territory of Kansas before there was, perhaps, a single slave there. Laws were passed ordering the people to patrol the districts to see that the slaves kept in order. The fact is, that they swallowed the Missouri statute-book whole, and did not know what was in it, and to them it made no difference what was in it. They went further, and passed laws which would have been disgraceful to any king or country, from Nero to Nicholas. You can find no such laws on any statute book. They were unconstitutional; and even General Cass, on this floor, was compelled to say that they were infamous and disgraceful to the age; but yet the Senate of the United States would not repeal them.

The Senator from Louisiana did not touch on this subject. He passed it by as easily and as lightly as he could. He dwelt on the beauties of old Judge Taney more than he did on the frauds and violence in Kansas. He talked about the Toombs bill, and said we would not vote for it. He said the people of the Territory sent here petitions and wanted Congress to accept the Topeka constitution, but the majority in this body would not do that, but were willing to pass an enabling act. There is a little curious history mixed up with that act which has come out at this session. It is all of a piece with the candle-box frauds, and shows that that was intended as a snap-judgment. The Toombs bill was plausible upon its face, and really the great objection to it at the time was the state of the Territory. It was then in the hands of the border-ruffians, the usurpers, and it was impossible to get officers there who would act with any fairness, or give any certainty that anything like justice would be done. That was our real objection to it, for I was in my heart so convinced that the principle was universally acknowledged that a constitution formed by a convention ought to be submitted to the people, that I did not know but it was contained in that bill; I was off my guard. I could not believe any American citizen would endeavor to rob a people of this God-given right of forming their own institutions, especially as you had said that the people of Kansas above all others should be perfectly free to make their own institutions in their own way.

How was that? I have learned during the session, by what has come out at side-bar here, that this was a matter of deliberation at that day, that the Committee on Territories, as I have understood the statement, were summoned to the house of their chief, there to sit in judgment on this very clause, whether the people should or should not have this right; and I understand that there such a clause in the first bill was stricken out, and it was passed by this body without any such clause.

Mr. HALE. For "peculiar reasons."

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, for peculiar reasons. It was a matter of premeditation. It did not happen by accident. You did not intend at that period or at any other, that the people should have the right to sit in judgment on the constitution by which they were to be governed. I do not know that I understand this matter aright, but I state my impressions in regard to it just as I have understood it as it came out here.

Mr. STUART. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him at this point. I think there has been sufficient importance given to that statement to have it corrected; and I deem it my duty, having, I think, as much knowledge of that matter as anybody else, to say that at no time during the discussions upon that bill, by those who framed it and perfected it, was that subject consulted about at all. Although I voted for that bill, the fact of whether it contained such a provision or not, never came under my notice, and I took it for granted, as the Senator from Ohio says he did, that any constitution which might be formed under it, would be submitted to the people. I only say that in the preparation of the bill, and the consultations that were talked about by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (I believe I was present at every single one of them,) there was no such subject considered.

Mr. GREEN. I wish simply to make one remark. How it should be taken for granted by anybody that there would be a resubmission of the constitution after it was formed by the convention, when it had never been required in a single instance in the history of this Government, in an enabling act, is to me inexplicable. It was not so regarded.

Mr. STUART. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio will allow me to say—I ask pardon for interfering with him in this matter, but I do not mean to state the argument—the Senator from Missouri was not here at the time, and knew nothing about the consultation on that subject. I am stating my impression; at the proper time I will state the argument. I have given my own impression and expectation on that subject; and I stated, also, that the discussion referred to was not so regarded.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I beg leave to explain—

Mr. WADE. I wish first to state that I am told I made a mistake. The gentlemen who assembled and deliberated on this subject were not the Committee on Territories. I thought that was the statement, but I am corrected in that particular. The meeting is said to have been composed of some gentlemen; I do not know who was there.

Mr. GREEN. I merely desire to remark, in justice to the Senator from Michigan, that I do not pretend to say what was in his mind; I do not pretend to say what he thought or supposed; but I do pretend to say there had never, up to that period been a single enabling act requiring the constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people.

Mr. PUGH. Will my colleague allow me to say a word? I was not in Washington city when that bill was framed. I arrived here the very day when it was put on its passage. I never saw the bill except in the form in which it finally passed. I had had no consultation with any person in regard to it. I read the bill in my seat here, and I approved the bill, and I still approve it. As to the question whether the constitution was to be submitted to the people, I have no recollection that my attention was called to the fact one way or the other; because, like the Senator from Missouri, I never had known such a provision in an enabling act of Congress before. I supposed it would be left to the discretion of the convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, as this seems to be rather a conversational matter, I wish to state that for myself, when that bill was under consideration in the Senate, I objected to it distinctly on the ground that it contained no provision requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people. That was one of the objections which I made to the bill. I do not know that the remarks which I made attracted the attention of anybody else; but in the views which I submitted at that time, which are published in the Globe—and I have sent out for the volume, but it has not yet come in—it will be found that I made it a distinct point of objection to the Toombs bill, as it was called, that it contained no provision for submitting the constitution which the convention should form to the people for their approbation; and I thought it was going quite too far, as I stated, to allow a convention to be assembled under such authority as then held sway in Kansas, to form a constitution and fix it forever upon the people of Kansas without consulting them in regard to it.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator from Ohio will indulge me for a moment. It is due to myself to state that I understood distinctly at that time that there was no such provision in that Toombs bill. That was one amongst other reasons for not giving it my support; and I rather think the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] himself mentioned it at the time.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from Ohio has been so considerate and forbearing that I hope he will indulge me for a moment.

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I think I may supply facts which have lapsed from the memory of other Senators, because when that question was made, at an early day in this session, by an honorable Senator from Illinois, now absent, [Mr. DOUGLAS,]

I looked at the record to see what the facts were, and I think it will be found that the facts were these: the Senator from Illinois, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, reported a bill, which he has since called an enabling act, and in that bill there was a provision requiring that the constitution to be formed under it should be submitted to the people after it was formed. The Senator from Georgia, I think, some two months afterwards, introduced into the Senate, on leave given, a bill of like character, and in the bill of the Senator from Georgia there was no such provision. Afterwards both the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Committee on Territories, and the bill introduced by the Senator from Georgia, I do not recollect on whose motion, were committed, sent back to the Committee on Territories, and then the chairman of the Committee on Territories reported the bill, which afterwards passed the Senate, without any provision for submitting the constitution to the people; so that his bill went back to the committee with that provision in it, and came out without it. I think that is the correct statement.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to say in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, that the bill reported from the Committee on Territories during the last Congress, called the enabling act, was in pursuance of the recommendation of President Pierce, providing that when Kansas had a sufficient population she might form a State government. The bill introduced by the Senator from Georgia, called the Toombs bill, was a provision for taking the sense of the people by commissioners, and providing for the formation of a State government immediately. The great difference between them was, that one was provisional, providing for a future time when the Territory should have a sufficient population, and the other contemplated immediate action.

Mr. BIGLER. I regret exceedingly, sir, that I happened to be out of my seat when this topic was presented. I do not know how it originated—I presume, with the Senator from Ohio in the course of his remarks. I understand that the Senator from Michigan has alleged that the question of the right of the people to vote on the adoption of the constitution was not discussed on a certain occasion to which I have heretofore referred, and in regard to which some feeling grew up between the Senator from Illinois and myself. I regret, in addition, that the Senator from Illinois is not now in his seat, for if it be necessary to discuss that unpleasant question again, perhaps it would be as well to do it now as at any other time. For my part I am perfectly prepared for any ordeal on that subject. The Senate will bear me witness, and the country will bear me witness—

Mr. WADE. I did not intend to yield the floor for an argument, but simply for an explanation in regard to this matter.

Mr. BIGLER. I must beg the Senator's pardon. I came into the Chamber under the impression that he had closed his remarks. ["Oh, no."] Still, sir, I trust the Senator from Ohio will indulge me on a question so peculiarly personal and interesting.

What I said when this point first came up, I reassert—every word of it; and all the examination I have given the question has confirmed me in the truth of what I then said. I did not say that the distinct proposition was discussed; I did not say what this Senator or that Senator did or said on the occasion. This I did say, and this I repeat, that the result of that interview and discussion was, to leave the impression clear on my mind that the intention of the bill, known as the Toombs bill, was to bring Kansas into the Union as a State through the agency of one popular vote, and that for delegates to the convention. Did I not show that the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois, in March, 1856, contained an express provision requiring for the constitution the sanction of the people? Did I not show that the bill read in place by the Senator from Georgia, in the subsequent month of June, contained the same provision? Did I not show that both those bills were referred to the committee of which the Senator from Illinois is the able chairman; and that the bill reported as an amendment to what was known as the Toombs bill, or one supplying both those referred to the committee, contained no such provision? I gave that history in justification of the impression which I expressed; and

I repeat it as a complete vindication of all I said.

I know, sir, that I have been told that I entirely misunderstood the nature of the discussion on that occasion; that it had reference, not to a vote of the people, but that the question was whether, when the proposed law should have been fully executed, and the commissioners to be appointed had performed their functions, Kansas was a State in the Union, or whether it would require another vote in Congress. I admit that was a leading topic; but can I find any stronger evidence, in addition to what I have given of the correctness of my impressions, than that history itself? It is clear, that if it was a question whether Kansas was in the Union when that law had been fully administered, I could have had the impression that there was to be a vote of the people on the constitution.

I do not desire, at this time, in the absence of the Senator from Illinois, to go into this question at any length. I stated a distinct recollection only in reference to what the Senator from Georgia had said. The impression made on my mind was in this way: He related to me the history of Ohio; the peculiar facts in the history of that State; that it had been in the Union for years without having been voted in by Congress; and that, when a committee was appointed to inquire into the fact whether Ohio was in the Union, the answer by the committee was that the constitution of Ohio was republican. That item of history left its impression upon my mind. Now, sir, on no occasion have I attempted to impugn the motives or the integrity of any Senator who participated in that consultation and discussion; but I have defended myself; I have done it by the history of the case. I inquired on this floor how the provision requiring the people to vote was stricken out of the bill. Who did it? Why was it done? It surely was not done to secure to the people of Kansas the right to vote. A provision similar was afterwards inserted in the Minnesota bill, and that went still further to strengthen the impressions I had entertained as to the character of the Toombs bill.

Mr. President, I have no pride of opinion in these things. I think I am as ready to bear and forbear as any man. But in a matter that concerns my personal integrity, I shall allow no man to question me. I represent a proud and a patriotic people here; and when I know that I speak the truth, I shall stand by the right, regardless of consequences. My impressions are clear that it was the intention to bring Kansas into the Union through the agency of one popular vote under the Toombs bill; that it was not contemplated that the constitution to be prepared, in the way prescribed in that bill, should be submitted to the vote of the people. No provision was made for an election of that kind. It was a scheme complete in itself, and there was no arrangement for a popular vote on the constitution. The agency of the commissioners ceased when the convention was elected.

Now, sir, I feel greatly at a loss, for I do not know precisely what was said on this subject—

Mr. PUGH. There was no issue made with the Senator at all, on any of the points to which he has alluded; and therefore I suggest that my colleague is entitled to continue his remarks, and the Senator may proceed afterwards.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. I want to ask him if he did not make a speech in the Territory of Kansas, last summer, in which he advocated the submission of the constitution to be made to the vote of the people of that Territory?

Mr. BIGLER. That is very irrelevant. What has that to do with the question I have been discussing? If, however, the Senator from Ohio is perfectly willing to allow me to do so, I shall answer the Senator from Massachusetts. I have seen that story embellished and circulating in the papers. Now, sir, I said in Kansas just what I have said on this floor. I was in favor of submitting the constitution to a vote of the people. I was not in the habit of making speeches in Kansas. On one occasion, and one only, perhaps for ten minutes, I expressed my views, speaking generally about the character of the Territory and the importance of peace and quiet to the people, and the blessings of a State. I did say that the constitution ought to be submitted to a vote; but it is justice to myself to say, that when I said that I had no other question in view than that of slavery; and had any man, with sufficient authority, said "we will submit the slavery question," my answer would have been, that is sufficient. But I did not say I would not vote for the admission, unless the constitution was voted on by the people. Furthermore, I happen to have a reply at hand, here in my desk, in a speech which I made in August, immediately after my return from Kansas, in answer to Mr. Wilmot, in which I took precisely the position which I have occupied on this floor; that was, if the popular sense was ascertained on the slavery question, that was all that we, outside of the Territory, had any right to expect, or require, or look into.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President, this debate has taken a very extraordinary turn; and, after the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I think it is proper that the Senator from Illinois should be sent for, or that the Senate should adjourn over until Monday. [A laugh.] I know that some gentlemen have a habit of coughing and speaking in an insulting manner when Senators rise here. I think that is very unworthy of a gentleman. I do not think any gentleman would indulge in it.

Now, Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and I recollect very well, that when on a former occasion the Senator from Illinois interrogated him on the point to which he has just spoken, he did not at that time speak positively, or have any positive recollection of what did take place in the house of the Senator from Illinois; but he said his impression was that such a debate did take place. The Senator from Illinois flatly denied it within the hearing of every Senator on this floor. He is now confined to his bed, I understand, very sick; though I do not know but that he might be sent for.

But, sir, it is now after three o'clock, and I hope that the Senator from Ohio will give way to a motion to adjourn, or that the Senate will proceed to other business this afternoon, the Private Calendar for example, because I am very anxious that the Senator from Illinois should be present if this debate is to be continued this afternoon. I think every friend of his upon this floor—I do not speak of his political friends, but every gentleman who respects him, should vote to give him an opportunity to be here so that the Senator from Pennsylvania may again repeat what he so valiantly repeated a few moments since.

Mr. WADE. If there is a motion to adjourn I am willing to give way, for I am very tired myself; but I shall get through very soon.

Mr. GREEN. I object to an adjournment.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BIGLER. I think I am entitled at least to that courtesy for a moment. I know the Senator from Ohio will extend it to me. I cannot permit the Senator from California to place me in a false position. His intimation is, that I have said in the absence of the Senator from Illinois what I did not say in his presence.

Mr. BRODERICK. Such is my impression, sir.

Mr. BIGLER. Well, your impressions are wrong. The variation is simply so far as relates to the discussion of the question of Kansas being in the Union under that bill. That is the only essential variation. I have made no issue with the Senator from Illinois, and I have been careful not to do so because of his absence; more so than I should have been if he had been present. The Senator from California would put this question in a false view before the Senate. Now, sir, I hope the Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WADE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRODERICK. Only a few moments, sir. My memory must be very treacherous, if the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. My impression is that he did deny that the Senator from Illinois was present when this meeting took place.

I think that when the Senator from Illinois further interrogated him, he again said that he did not know whether that gentleman was present, or had any knowledge of the fact. I may be mistaken.

Mr. HALE. No, you are not.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am very confident as to the accuracy of my recollection. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will find that he did it with a great deal of tremor. I thought he had taken it all back in the most submissive manner; and therefore I intended, out of the respect I bore him at that time, to talk to him upon the question. But, sir, I let it pass, and said nothing to him about it. I believe four fifths of the Senators who are now present were upon the floor at the time that debate took place, and will concur with me in this respect. The Senator from Illinois is now confined to his bed by sickness; and I hope that, out of respect to that gentleman, the Senate will adjourn, and then we shall be able, on Monday, to ascertain whether the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct or not.

Mr. BIGLER and Mr. WADE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio claim the floor?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; and I only wish to say that, since this matter has come up in the shape it has, if there are personal considerations requiring time for explanation, I will not stand in the way of an adjournment; I will give way to a motion of that kind.

Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to remark—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. WADE. For the purpose of allowing a motion to adjourn to be made, if any gentleman sees fit to make it.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to make a suggestion. If you are determined to postpone this subject, there are other matters to attend to. Do not let us adjourn.

Mr. BRODERICK. If there are other matters to attend to, let us proceed to their consideration. I move that this question be postponed until Monday at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. GREEN. I hope that motion will not prevail. This debate must be ended.

Several Senators rose

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question before hearing anything that may be said. The Chair will not recognize any Senator until he states the question before the Senate. It is moved and seconded that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Monday at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD and Mr. BRODERICK called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President—

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me to say a word which may relieve him probably from some embarrassment. I heard the allegations of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Pennsylvania on a former occasion; and I took it on myself, as their common friend, to bring them together to have a conversation on this subject. My own impression was that the Senator from Pennsylvania was distinct and correct in his statement, but that the conversation transpired in another portion of the room when the Senator from Illinois did not hear it; and I understood that to be their mutual understanding.

Now, if I thought the honor of the Senator from Illinois were involved in any degree, even in the slightest degree, I should move to postpone the further consideration of this question; or, if my colleague says it will be convenient to him, and that he desires it, I will vote to postpone it; but I do not understand how a collateral matter brought in here by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who did not hear my colleague, is to usurp the whole attention of the Senate, and to lead off the Senate into a great many other collateral matters. That is the reason why I shall be compelled to vote against the postponement, unless my colleague desires it. I thought the matter between the Senators from Pennsylvania and Illinois was all happily understood between them at that time. I tendered my good offices as their friend, and thought it was ended.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator from Ohio is substantially correct in what he has stated. He will remember, however, that it was subsequent to that time that I made my prepared speech and gave the history of this case in justification of what I had previously said. It will be remembered, and the debate would show if I had it at hand, that I said to the Senator from Illinois that I only intended to hold him accountable by the record. I stated that I did not pretend to recollect that the Senator from Illinois participated in the particular discussion to which I referred. I so stated in the first debate. It is not becoming in the Senator from California to characterize the manner in which I did what I conceived to be an act of propriety. I could not recollect the particular part which the Senator from Illinois had in the discussion, nor was it necessary. I only gave the general impression made on my mind. I afterwards gave the history of the case as confirming it. That is consistent with all I said.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think it a duty that I owe to the Senate, as well as to the Senator from Illinois, to state that when the Senator from New Hampshire, some fifteen or twenty days since, made his speech, I understood, at that time, the Senator from Illinois to say that the Senator from New Hampshire intended to allude to the meeting which took place in his room. The Senator from Illinois informed the Senator from Pennsylvania, that if the Senator from New Hampshire did allude to that subject again, he would, upon this floor, denounce the allegation as a falsehood, if the Senator from Pennsylvania did not qualify it in some manner. Now, sir, the Senator from Illinois is absent—

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator is talking about what the record here or the debate will not show one word of. It never occurred.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am talking about what the Senator from Illinois informed me; so that it is a question of veracity between the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator shall not attack the Senator from Illinois in his absence. The Senator from Illinois never did any such thing on the floor of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania pause? The Chair must attempt to control debate and make it regular, and therefore the Chair will not allow it to proceed until he asks the Senator entitled to the floor whether he yields the floor to the Senator interrupting. That will enable the Chair to exercise some control over the manner of proceeding.

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield.

Mr. BIGLER. Every Senator here knows that the Senator from New Hampshire did discuss that subject pointedly and distinctly. The Senator from California says that the Senator from Illinois asserted that he would rise here and denounce it as false. The Senator from Illinois never did any such thing. Now, sir, where is the issue? Denounce as false, what, sir? The assertion that that interview left the impression on my mind, as I over and over repeated, that the intention and the effect of that bill was to bring Kansas into the Union through the agency of one popular vote, and that vote for delegates—that is all.

Mr. BRODERICK. Well, Mr. President, I suppose when the Senator from Illinois takes his seat in this body, he would like to speak upon this question. It is now three hours since the Senator from Ohio commenced his remarks. I understand there are a great many private bills upon the table, and I hope the Senate will postpone this matter until half past twelve o'clock on Monday, so that we can proceed with private business on the Calendar. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. We have been sitting here, very intensely engaged, all the week.

Mr. BROWN. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Before the vote is taken, I will state that I was requested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to inform the Senate that he had paired off with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. YULEE.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Fitch, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, and Toombs—18.

So the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. D. HALEY.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a joint resolution of the corporation of Washington, asking Congress to make an appropriation for opening and grading Massachusetts avenue from Twelfth street to the northwestern boundary of the city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a joint resolution of the corporation of Washington, in relation to lighting certain avenues and streets in that city with gas; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLLAMER presented the memorial of Ebenezer Watson, praying an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of citizens of Patterson, New Jersey, for the adoption of measures for the gradual and peaceful extinction of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of R. F. Mason, Passed Assistant Surgeon in the Navy, praying that his pay may date from his examination, and not from the time of his commission; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of Fort Dodge, Iowa, praying that the public lands may cease to be considered a source of public revenue, and that hereafter all entries of them may be confined to actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented two petitions from citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the public lands may cease to be considered a source of public revenue, and that hereafter entries of them may be confined to actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Fort Smith, in that State, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of steamboat officers and citizens of Napoleon, Arkansas, praying the establishment of a board of inspectors of steamboats at Memphis, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of inhabitants of Yates county, New York, praying that a pension may be granted to Martha Brown, widow of a revolutionary soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented resolutions of the New York State Agricultural Society, recommending that a grant of land be made to each of the several States and Territories of the Union, including the District of Columbia, for the maintenance and endowment of agricultural colleges therein; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be granted in farms or lots, free of cost, to actual settlers only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of New York, instructing the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to use their influence to procure the enactment of a law granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Indian wars from 1791 to 1795, and to the widows of such as have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of New York, instructing the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to urge the enactment of a law granting to the militia of the States arms and equipments of the most efficient patterns, and in increased quantities, and also the enactment of a law to reorganize the militia system; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER. I present the petition of Charlotte Taylor, now residing in the State of Connecticut, the only surviving child of the late William Scarbrough, of Savannah, Georgia. As the petition is very short, and as it will more clearly explain its purport than I can, I ask that it may be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of Charlotte Taylor, now residing in the State of Connecticut, respectfully shows: That your petitioner is the only surviving child of the late William Scarbrough, of Savannah, Georgia; that her father, being an energetic and enterprising man, of great mechanical genius, caused to be constructed, in the years 1818 and 1819, with his own means and those of every friend he could enlist in the effort, the first steamer that ever crossed the Atlantic—the Savannah, of Savannah, Captain Stevens Rogers, of New London, commanding; that her voyage was entirely successful, and inaugurated a new and brilliant era in the history of the naval and commercial marine of the country. For the details of said voyage, and for other interesting details connected with the enterprise, your petitioner refers to the affidavit of Captain Rogers, hereto annexed, and which, she prays, may be taken as a part of this her petition. Your petitioner prays that your honorable bodies will take into consideration the great sacrifices which her father made in accomplishing this great work, (for it utterly ruined and impoverished him), and that you will award to your petitioner such pecuniary acknowledgment as you may see fit for the great and lasting benefits which have resulted to the country from the enterprise, and pecuniary sacrifices of said William Scarbrough. And your petitioner will ever pray, &c., &c.

CHARLOTTE TAYLOR.

I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of John W. Pray, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas W. Ward, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COLLAMER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 200) in relation to the duties of postmasters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BIGGS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 201) to execute the treaties of 1817 and 1819, with the Cherokees, by making provision for the reservations under the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 359) for the relief of Duncan Robertson, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

An act for the relief of John Hamilton; and
A joint resolution to authorize certain officers and men, who have been engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin, to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles A. Kinkead, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 199) for the relief of Livingston, Kinkead & Co. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of St. Louis county, Minnesota, and the petition of citizens of Copper Harbor, Lake Superior, respecting an agency for the Indian bands of Lake Superior, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, relative to the adoption of measures for the protection of citizens of Texas against Indian depredations, presented February 16 and February 24, and the resolution of that Legislature relative to the removal of Indians west of the Pecos river, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Secretary of War; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of David Gordon, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. No. 21) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled, "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854. The resolution was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

ROSS WILKINS AND OTHERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the business next in order on the Calendar is the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.]

Mr. STUART. I suppose it is not desired to discuss that question to-day. There is a bill on the table which I observed my colleague desired to have passed a day or two ago, but it was laid over. I hope it will now be taken up.

Mr. GREEN. It was laid over at the request of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] who is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Virginia, I think, has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. STUART. There is no objection to it certainly. The Senator from Virginia has examined it. The case is one of great merit.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is the bill (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct the settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley, which was laid over on Saturday until to-day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BIGGS. Is there any report accompanying the bill? If not too long, I ask that it be read.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Vermont can state in a moment the facts of this case.

Mr. COLLAMER. This bill relates to a claim for services as members of the land board of Michigan, some years since. As judges of the Territory they were directed to adjudicate on the French land claims in Detroit and that vicinity, and had a great deal of service of that kind to do. Their colleagues on that board have been from time to time provided for by two different acts, and for the services of these two judges, one of whom is deceased, it is proposed by this bill to pay at the same rate as the others; and that is the whole bill. Congress has passed upon it for the different members of that board from time to time, and have made provision for all of them except two. They now apply to have pay at the same rate as the others have received.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. HALE. I wish to offer the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the military asylum near Washington city, District of Columbia, and of resorting to some other means for providing for the inmates of that institution.

I ask for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Before the resolution is passed, I wish to say that a resolution of similar character was passed by the Senate at the last session, and an inquiry was instituted and pursued by the Committee on Military Affairs. They made a report, and the result of that report was an act of Congress abolishing the military asylum at Harrodsburg, in Kentucky. Since that, I have received several communications, and I am told that there have been communications also received by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, showing a most gross abuse of the purpose of Congress, and of the fund which is created by a tax on the soldiers' pay.

In the military establishment of this city, the pensioners are made menial servants of the officers, subjected to military discipline, fed just as they would be if they were in the deserts of Utah, arbitrarily fined if they take an apple from the ground, or a cucumber from the vines, which are bought with their own money, together with the asylum which Congress has furnished, and for which they pay. It costs $600 a year for each man at this asylum; and yet the men are stinted and treated worse than they could be in any desert in which they might be put. But while they are thus robbed, the officers, as will appear by this report, have had double pay—their pay in the Army, and their pay as superintendents. The money of the men has been taken to make splendid accommodations for entertaining the President of the United States and the Secretary of War last summer, so as to blind their eyes and get them to wink at the gross frauds which are perpetrated on these old soldiers. I will submit the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs; and if they will go into it, they will find a system of abuse in this city, right under the very nose of Congress, that ought to make every man ashamed. The case would be bad enough if it were the public money and the public funds that were thus used; but these men are not dependent on the charities of the Government, for it is their own money of which they are robbed to feast and entertain military officers, the President of the United States, and the Secretary of War, and these poor old creatures are subjected to hard work, and compelled to menial services and menial offices for the officers. If an old man, perhaps eighty years of age, happens to be guilty of any dereliction, he is fined. In addition to gross misappropriation of his money by fines and exorbitant exactions, he is again defrauded. I hope the resolution will pass and the inquiry be made. The resolution was agreed to.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I move to take up the unfinished special order.

Mr. WADE. I am ready to go on at any time. It makes no difference to me.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President—

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for a moment?

Mr. WADE. I will yield, sir; but I hardly want to get postponed as long as I was the other day, for I am very anxious to finish my remarks on this subject. I will yield, sir.

Mr. BRODERICK. When the Senate adjourned, Mr. President, on Saturday, I stated that Judge DOUGLAS would be in his seat to-day, for the purpose of replying to the speech made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I saw the Judge yesterday, and he informed me that he would be here to-day if his doctor would permit him to leave his room. I have just received a letter from him, in which he states that it will be impossible for him to be in the Senate to-day, but he will try to be here to-morrow or the following day. By that time, I suppose, as the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania has been reported, the Senator from Illinois will have been able to see what was stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

While I am up, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a paragraph which I find in the New York Herald, a paper that has a very large circulation. I suppose the largest of any paper in the Union. It is in these words:

"Quite a personal wrangle occurred in the Senate to-day between Messrs. BIGLER and BRODERICK. Mr. BRODERICK took exception to remarks made by Mr. BIGLER in reference to Mr. DOUGLAS, who is detained at home by sickness, and asked that the Senate adjourn, in order to give DOUGLAS an opportunity to vindicate himself from this insidious attack. Mr. BRODERICK promptly rebuked the Senator from California for his impertinence, and here the matter ended."

Now, sir, I did not think on Saturday that I received any rebuke from the Senator from Pennsylvania, or from any other Senator upon this floor. I have never yet received a rebuke in this Chamber, and I hope I never shall. I try to conduct myself here as becomes a Senator. It cannot be possible that the man who wrote this paragraph was present when the debate took place on Saturday. If he was present he has fabricated a deliberate falsehood, which is unbecoming in any one who is entitled to privileges in this Chamber as a reporter. I am sure that when the editor of that paper finds out that this paragraph is untrue, he will correct the erroneous statement. I thought it proper to direct the attention of the Senate to this subject to avoid misapprehension.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, I suppose I must.

Mr. BIGLER. I rise, Mr. President, simply to set myself right in reference to the debate of Saturday, not to account for this newspaper paragraph. I know nothing about it, and of course no Senator is responsible for what is said in the newspapers. There is scarcely a day of my life that I do not see some unaccountable statement in them. What I feel it due to myself to say is, that I came into the Chamber on Saturday, after the question, to which I then referred, had been in some way suggested. I spoke under mistaken apprehensions of what had been said. I am satisfied from what I know now, that if I had been in my seat I should not have felt required to take notice of what passed.

Now, sir, an additional remark, and one only; and that is as regards the relations of the Senator from Illinois and myself. I certainly was not sensible of making any attack upon him, or saying what could be understood as offensive. I rose for the purpose of defending myself against what I thought was an imputation on what I had previously said on the unpleasant topic under consideration. I am not in the least disposed, in the absence of the Senator from Illinois, to say anything on this question, or any other, that I would not say in his presence; and I feel satisfied that, when that honorable Senator and myself discuss this question, if ever we do discuss it, or any other, the Senator from California will be convinced that we are each controlled by honorable bearing and manly motives. We have a difference of opinion on this question, but I do not know that we have anything more unpleasant, and I did not intend to be offensive to the Senator from Illinois in his absence, but to say what I thought was just to myself.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, when I alluded on Saturday to that enabling act, which was called the Toombs bill, I had no idea that I was about to wake up so many reminiscences as I have, in almost every direction in this Chamber. I called attention to it, not with any purpose whatever of raising any question over the manner in which a clause in that bill seemed to have been stricken out. I do not care who struck it out; I do not care what deliberations were had about it. The reason, and the only reason, why I alluded to it was, that I thought the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] in calling attention to it, had given it a consequence to which it was not entitled; and I had some observations that I thought proper to make on that point. But the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] always exceedingly jealous of any imputation as to his differing with the President on any question, supposed that some one was about arraigning him for a departure from the Democratic faith on this subject. Now, sir, I should have been the last man in the world to suspect him of any such thing. I supposed he and the President were just as much alike as the Siamese twins. [Laughter.] I supposed what one thought the other thought; what befel one always befel the other at the same time. I have no doubt that he is always orthodox. I hardly know from his remarks who was the great discoverer of this improved idea of popular sovereignty. The President, to be sure, tells us that, in regard to submitting constitutions to the people, he formerly held that this constitution must be submitted to the people of Kansas, to the whole people; and that they must have a fair opportunity to vote on it, and must not be interrupted by fraud or violence; but in his late message he tells us that his mind at that period was fixed entirely on the slavery clause; he did not think of anything else. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to have declared on Saturday that he formerly held that a constitution certainly should be submitted to the people for their approval or dissent; but he also observed that he, like the President, when he said so, thought of nothing except the slavery clause. I do not know but that it may be prudent, in the view of some, to withhold the whole of a constitution from the consideration of the people who are to live under it at the time. It might be an overdose; it might be a little too much for the stomachs of the people to take a whole constitution; and if the people are not to judge of it, who can do it better than Doctor Buchanan, or the Senator from Pennsylvania? They give it to the people by clauses; they suppose there are some things too high for the consideration of the people, when they come to investigate a constitution. There are other matters, if I understand them, which it is safe to intrust the people with, and they are to be the judges of what shall be submitted.

But, sir, I was led to this course of remark from the zeal of gentlemen to define their positions on this subject. I suppose it is a principle of the Democratic party always to be in line with the President on all subjects. I suppose if he takes snuff, every true Democrat ought to sneeze, or else be read out of the party; and I suppose all true Democrats are willing to do that. I have taken it for granted that such would be the fact. But I will state my object in calling attention to the Toombs bill. I was not invited into the famous council where all the clauses of that bill were taken under consideration, and yet I doubt not that I understand it just about as well as they did, and they will correct me if I do not state it aright. A bill admitting Kansas under what was called the Topeka constitution had lately passed the House of Representatives, at the period at which the Toombs bill was framed. It was sent here; and this body had voted it down. The Republicans voted for it, and the Democracy voted against it. We were outnumbered, and the Topeka constitution was killed. As the presidential campaign was approaching, it did not look exactly right, considering the commotions that had taken place in Kansas Territory, that, after voting down the proposition the people of the Territory had given you, you should go into the canvass without substituting anything for it. If I was to guess now, I should think that council was held for the purpose of getting up a very plausible measure, which they knew the Republicans would have to vote against, and which could not pass the House of Representatives, and which would be a very good thing to take on the stump in the canvass. My opinion is, that that is about all the importance that is to be attached to what was called the Toombs bill.

I do not care much what clauses it had in it. It was plausible enough on its face, I know, except in this particular; and I was off my guard in relation to it. I did not look to see whether it had that or not; I did not care whether it had it or not. I knew then, as now, that the Administration had everything their own way in that Territory; and when you provided for officers to execute your law, if it were made by an angel from heaven, it would be perverted to the very worst of purposes, and it would be turned into a party channel that could not be got rid of. I knew that was so, and I voted against the bill because no bill could be properly, justly, and equitably carried out in the Territory under the officers who then presided there. It gave the Democratic party a little advantage over us, because our ideas were not patent on the face of the bill, and people would probably look to its language more than they would to the circumstances prevailing in the Territory, which rendered it exceedingly inexpedient that anybody should then vote for the immediate organization of the Territory into a State under the officers who were to take charge of it.

The Senator from Louisiana alluded to it as a reproach to the Republicans here that they did not vote for it, as though it was an olive branch held out by the Democracy that we refused, and the people there refused. He intimated that while we professed to wish that something might be done to make peace in the Territory, and give the people a State constitution with a right to regulate their affairs, we stood here to reject it. He said that while the people were calling for assistance, we were voting against the measure proposed, to which he argued there was no objection. That is a very lawyer-like argument, and very shrewd, and it might possibly deceive the people; but it will not deceive Senators. We all understand these little policies that prevail here. I will say no more about that bill. It is a thing of the past; let it go.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 71.

A great deal has been said in regard to the Topeka constitution. It has been a great source of reproach to the people of Kansas that they got up the Topeka constitution. They have been denounced as traitors, as rebels, as everything vile and contaminating, because they sent to us, for ratification, their Topeka constitution. It has been a fruitful theme for the President of the United States. Availing himself of the impunity of his position, he has hurled these opprobrious epithets without stint on the heads of a people struggling for their rights. He had no business, as Chief magistrate of the nation, to visit on the heads of the people, without proof, such epithets as he has bestowed on them through all his messages. His messages teem with those vile epithets, as bad as any that were thundered from the royalists to the leaders of our Revolution. Indeed, sir, if you trace them as they have been traced in the other House, the parallel is so near that a man would suppose the President himself had copied the old royal edicts. But what does all that signify? I take no pleasure in stating that it was false, slanderous, and calumnious, because there was no truth to found it upon.

What did the people of Kansas do, that was unlawful, in getting up the Topeka constitution? Look at their notices. They are all before us; they are all officially here; and gentlemen, whenever they speak of it with reproach, do not avail themselves of the light that is on their tables. Did those people propose to revolutionize that Territory? No, sir. They called a great meeting of the people. They invited everybody to come up and see if they could not agree on some method by which a State constitution should be provided. They held a convention for that purpose, which consisted of an overwhelming majority of all the people in the Territory, and their constitution was ratified by a deliberate vote of that people not less than twice.

But did they propose to organize under it in defiance of the laws of the United States? Not at all. From the time they called the convention, they always accompanied their action with a notice that it was to be submitted to the Congress of the United States for their approval or disapproval. It took barely the form of a petition; nothing more nor less. Has it come to this, sir, that the people of the United States cannot petition Congress for a redress of grievances, unless they submit to be accused as traitors and rebels to the Government? Is this the way you are to meet the respectful calls and applications of the people of the United States for a redress of grievances? Is this the way your President expects to get along in dealing with the high-spirited people of this nation? He will have a hard road in traveling that Jordan.

Are they rebels? The Senator from Louisiana said they were rebels; the President says they were rebels. If they were, there are a great many more rebels than are to be found in the Territory of Kansas. I stand here as a champion for those rebels. Were the framers of the Topeka constitution rebels? So am I. Were they rebels? If so, a majority of the House of Representatives were rebels, for they approved of all their doings, and, so far as they could, gave effect to their petition.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the Senator remember the resolution of the Topeka people declaring their right to organize their government in defiance of the Congress of the United States, and their determination to do it?

Mr. WADE. I do not recollect any such thing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I can show it to the gentleman.

Mr. WADE. But the gentleman, as a lawyer, will not pretend that that made rebels or traitors of the people. I suppose that does not help the case at all, if it be so. Treason, by the grace of God, does not consist in words of mouth in this country. It did in Kansas, for there their wise judges got up a great many constructive treasons. I am talking of the language which gentlemen here have used with a full knowledge of all its opprobrious import. A man may say a great many things with perfect impunity, which he may not act out. There was no rebellion in the action of these people; nothing unlawful in it. Whatever they may have said—and I do not know what they said, for I do not watch men's words much; their actions are what I take cognizance of; their actions are what the law takes cognizance of—the people of Kansas, in framing that constitution, have done nothing more than they had a perfect right, as American citizens, to do; and I challenge all the legal acumen of this body to contradict what I now declare.

Then, sir, let not your President of the United States, let none of his champions, stand up and charge those people, struggling for their rights, with being rebels. I hold that a man ought not to stand here on the immunities thrown around him to assail others who have no such immunity. I hold that it is not right for him to do so. The men who framed that constitution communicated with General Cass, a member of the Senate on this floor at the time. They asked him if he was willing to take charge of their petition, and to present it to the Senate of the United States? And he answered them that he was willing to do it. If they were traitors, General Cass was little less than a traitor, because he assented to what was done; and in treason, I believe, there are no accessories. He presented it to the Senate of the United States. I know how it was assailed by partyism. I know that the man who brought it and delivered it to the Senator who presented it here, was denounced as a forger. The instrument was denounced as spurious, as never having come from the people assembled at Topeka; and the Senate disposed of it under that hypothesis. But you did not arraign General Cass for presenting it as being a traitor. I do not like to hear quite so much about rebellion as we have heard for the last year or two. I know that everybody who did not yield a quiet assent to be trampled under foot by border ruffianism was denounced as a traitor. I know that on the other side of this Chamber, for more than two years, you have invoked nothing else but the mere technicalities of law to cover your utter nakedness of principle. You have sought to steal the liberties of a whole people, and screen yourselves behind the technicalities of what you call law, but which, on closer investigation, turns out to be a bare usurpation, without color of authority.

Mr. President, it will be an evil day for the American people when they, through the forms and meshes of crooked lawyers, are to lose their liberty. It will be an evil day for the liberties of this country whenever men will submit that their liberties shall be taken away in this nefarious manner. It has been well observed by others in the course of this debate, that it is the usual, and I might say the vulgar, course of despotism, to entrap their victims through the forms of unjust laws. But perhaps enough has been said on that point. I feel a little warmly on it because I do not like to see men struggling for the rights of American citizens in a distant province of this nation, denounced by these high authorities as infamous traitors, who ought to lose their lives instead of having any favor granted to them.

I say again, sir, there is not one particle of substance in the charge. The get-together of the Topeka convention were here petitioners to the Government of the United States for redress of grievances, and they asked you to give them redress by accepting the constitution which they had framed. I believe nobody denies or doubts that that constitution had the sanction of a vast majority of the people of the Territory; and you had allured them to make just such an application. Had you not invited them to do anything that they thought would minister to their welfare, by saying that they should be left perfectly free to form their domestic institutions in their own way, without consulting anybody? When a vast and overwhelming majority of the people were anxious to do this, who would suppose that the very moment they took all of you at your word, from the President of the United States down or up, they would be charged with treason, treachery, and crime? Sir, if there was anything wrong in it, you had lured them into it—you had entrapped them into it, by the inviting manner in which you had made your law; but as a lawyer, I say to the Senator from Louisiana, and I say to the President, that the Topeka constitution was just as much authorized by law as was your Lecompton constitution, or any other that has been made there.

Even if the so-called Territorial Legislature were clothed with authority to act as such—if they were not mere usurpers, as they were—I say they had no power to abrogate the law of Congress, and set up a government for themselves. I know the President seeks to find the power in the particular clause of your Kansas bill to which I have already alluded; but that shallow sophistry of his is rejected in this Chamber by every respectable lawyer here. I think he has no second on this floor to back him in what he says about the power of that bill as an enabling act to authorize the people of the Territory, independently of Congress, to frame a State constitution for themselves. Then, did you authorize them, by your act, to do it? No, sir; Congress has given them no authority to abrogate the law of Congress; to destroy the very law under which they were organized. You had authorized no such thing. Therefore, your Lecompton constitution was just as naked of all authority of law as was the Topeka constitution. It was all well enough as a petition; I do not deny that. The people had a right, through their Legislature, if they had a Legislature, to take measures to form a constitution. They had a right to meet outside of all Legislatures, and call the people together, and consult upon the same thing; for the very knot of the combination, the very touchstone that could make anything legal, was, that when they had done their part of the proposition, they should obtain the sanction of Congress to it. Without that sanction, the action of your Lecompton convention is as bare of legal authority as it can be. What the Topeka convention did had no authority of law until it had the sanction of Congress. Therefore, these acts stand on precisely the same footing in point of legal authority.

How is it, then, that an impartial Chief Magistrate will denounce the friends of the one as rebels, and those of the other as patriots? It is because he has turned partisan himself, because he hears nothing but what is breathed in his ear by sycophants. The truth he never hears; or, if he does, his mind is so perverse that he does not appreciate it.

I am not in a condition to prolong this debate a great while, and therefore I shall pass to the next phase of the matter. You say the Legislature authorized a convention. They could call it; there was nothing wrong about it; but I contend there was no authority about it. They called a convention. Now, this is the position I assume, and I invite attention to it from any part of this Chamber, from the most eminent lawyers in it: If the Territorial Legislature had no authority to call a convention; if it still required an enabling act to give it real legal validity; then, when they called their convention, it was perfectly optional with the people to comply with the act or not. It was a mere voluntary call on them, not authorized by law, inviting them to vote for delegates to frame a constitution under which they would live.

This act having no binding authority of law, it was at the option of every man to do just as he pleased about it. If he went, it was well enough. If he failed to go, you could not denounce him as having done anything wrong, because there was no law compelling him to go. It was a mere invitation from an irresponsible power to come up and aid them in doing a certain act. That is all the shrewdest lawyer can make out of it. So we strip you even of the technicality of law, upon which you seek to deprive the people of Kansas of the right of self-government. Your technicality has failed you. It is not even necessary for us to go back and show your Legislature to be arrant usurpers and enemies to the great mass of the people there, as they were. We may, if we see fit, denounce you as rebels with as much reason as you have denounced us, because you got together without authority of law, and sought to frame a constitution under which you would live.

The President has said over and over again that this was done by authority of law, that the people had a perfect right to go and vote, and that it was their duty to go, and that if they did not go they were in default. He said it was all fair. Now, sir, I take no pleasure in saying that the President at the very time he made this declaration, if he was not blind, deaf, and dumb, must have known that it was not true. If he had read the communications that were sent to him constantly from that Territory by its Governors and its other officers, he could not fail to have known at the time he made this declaration that in one half of the counties no census was taken or record made of the voters, and the law required that as a condition upon which a man should vote. No man need rise and tell me here that that is not so, because I will face him down with authorities that he cannot overcome. I have the law that required the registry; I have the law that required the census to be taken. The question is, was it taken? If it was not taken, why was it not done? Governor Walker says it was not taken for no fault of the people there. He says in some of his letters that it was not taken in many counties because there was no pay provided for those who should do it, and they would not do it for nothing; and in other places the people, suspecting that it was all a trick and a fraud, were reluctant. But that was no excuse. You never have taken a census of the United States where there were not vast numbers of people who were most strenuously opposed to it; and on inquiring, your deputy marshals, as they go round, were frequently chased out of the houses by the women with broomsticks, thinking, probably, that the object was to levy a tax on them. Would that be any excuse for not taking a census? You find one or two men who are reluctant or opposed to it for any reason. Can the President plant himself upon a solitary objection like that and say it was an excuse that the people would not submit their names to be registered? If a man would not comply with the law, if he would not give his name when he was asked, he would be no gentleman, I grant you; but you could not convict him of any crime for not doing it, and certainly you could not deprive his neighbor, who was perfectly willing to give his name, of his rights. You indulge in these generalities; you say that A, B, C, or D, went into a county, and Tom, Dick, or Harry said "I will not have my name registered," and then turn about and say the people can lose their liberties by a default consequent on such proceedings as these! Sir, it is arrant nonsense, come from what source it may.

The fact was, that the people could not vote if they would; and, in a great many instances, would not if they could; and I commend them for it. The experience they had had in that Territory had shown them already that it was a mere empty humbug to vote, for votes did no good. Cincinnati Directories and candle-box returns have been infinitely more potent than the real votes of the inhabitants of that Territory. What good would it do them to vote? You had already taught them that there was a purpose to be accomplished; and, if votes would not answer, Cincinnati Directories, forged returns, anything would be resorted to; the thing would move on, majority or no majority.

The American people are supposed to be a shrewd people. They understand pretty well Peter Funk auctions. Once in a while, a greenhorn gets taken in; but the great mass of the people will not be taken in by them. But the President of the United States has set up and devised schemes as shallow, as fraudulent—yea, as infamous as that; and he supposes the people of the United States are going to be defrauded by any such nefarious means as those. Sir, he will find they will not work. They would not work in the days of the Revolution, and much less will they work now.

Well, sir, a Legislature was elected shortly after the time these delegates were elected to frame a constitution. You attempted an outrageous fraud then in order to carry the Legislature. Your Oxford and Delaware-Crossing frauds were resorted to. I have the evidence of them all here. Nobody doubts them. There is not a man here who will rise and say that it is not the truth that these frauds were open, palpable, notorious, understood by everybody. Governor Walker investigated them, and said so. He even went up into one of the precincts where these frauds were committed, and found that it was impossible such a vote could have been cast there. He found the people amazed that any such pretenses should be made; and he found that the names of your best men, whose names were notorious, known all over the country, were on the voting lists, because they did not seem to have great facility in inventing names. They seized upon all the great names of the country and placed them upon their list. Governor Walker took the returns of Johnson county and others. He seemed to ponder over that subject a little; and I am sorry that he did. I am amazed that any man, in any section of the country, the very moment that he found that such a gross, insulting fraud had been sought to be palmed off upon the people, should hesitate an instant to throw it into the face of the scoundrels who had presented it. He hesitated, and after he knew how it was, he saw fit to place his rejection of the return on a technicality, rather than on the naked deformity—the want of votes. They had not certified the fraud in technical language, and therefore he threw it out. I should have thrown it out for the substantial reason, and thrown your technicality to the dogs.

How was he met? It was said—I do not know with what truth, it was in all the papers—that the fortunes of the Governor and Secretary declined from the moment they rejected these infamous frauds. It changed the character of the Legislature. It gave a vast majority in that Legislature to the Republicans; whereas, if these frauds were made effectual, they would have made this Legislature just like that which preceded it. It was a great disappointment, and it is said that some sections of the country "howled" over it; and President Buchanan, as they began to howl, trembled at their howling, and it resulted in the dismissal of both those honest officers from their trust. Sir, future ages will be amazed at the audacity of the President who would make it a matter of reproach to one of his officers that he had failed to give effect to a fraud which should confine a man to the penitentiary for life.

But, sir, the fraud was discovered; nobody could gainsay it; the free-State legislative ticket was triumphant; and now what is to be done? Your Lecompton convention quailed and trembled under that aspect of the case. They went to drumming up their men, and they hardly got a quorum, because they saw that the scepter had departed from this Judah, and it had got into the hands of honest men. Your Lecomptonites did not like to brave public opinion, and enact this famous Lecompton constitution. I believe they never did get a quorum there. The fact is, that every man who had the least sense of decency or shame about him, never appeared in the convention at all; but a minority appeared, and they conjured up a constitution. We have it here, sir. We have it sent to us for ratification by the President of the United States; and when he sent it, he was in full possession of all these nefarious facts. Instead of sending it to us, he should have trampled it under his heel as a spurious thing, disgraceful to all who gave assent to it. They made their constitution, and they provided for submitting a part of it to the people. How? It is sometimes contended on this floor that it was understood when this convention met that they were to be clothed with plenary, sovereign, irrevocable power, to make just such a government for that people as they pleased; that their doings, under no circumstances, were ever to be submitted to the people. There is plausibility in that, because you recollect that the act calling the convention was vetoed by the Governor because it did not contain a clause submitting the constitution to the people; but it was passed over the head of your Governor by a two-third vote of these patriots. So it was premeditated malice. It was deliberated upon; and fraud was meditated by them. They knew very well, they could not make a mistake about it, that the people who had just returned a Legislature against them by more than three to one, would nullify this beautiful constitution of theirs mighty quick if it were submitted to them; and hence they were going to steal a constitution, and fasten it on the necks of their fellow-citizens behind their backs, and against their will. The President has aided and abetted this fraud.

Now, sir, after the Lecompton convention made this constitution, even if there had been any legality about it, before it became binding on the people, the Legislature whom the people had just chosen took the subject under consideration, and they sent forth their edict of more than ten to one, (for they represented more than ten to one of the people of the Territory,) that this constitution should be submitted to the popular vote. But Mr. Buchanan says, "ah! it was a little too late." Good God, sir! When a man lets judgment go against him by default, I know of no court that will not permit him to pay the costs, open the default, and try the case on its merits; but when the great cause of human liberty and right, when the great cause of the American citizen is concerned, when the question is, shall the American citizen have a voice and a vote as to the constitution under which he and his posterity are to live, perhaps forever, ah! then he is debarred, he has no power to set it aside! He is foreclosed just as the people were foreclosed because they would not go and vote at your Peter Funk election for a convention.

There was a default! Who was to take advantage of their default? That would be a material inquiry, it strikes me. They were too late, says President Buchanan. Too late for whom? Were they not making a constitution for the people of the Territory of Kansas? Who had a right to interfere? Were they to lose their right by laches, if they committed laches by suffering a default? To whose benefit was it to inure? What tyrant is there that is ready, when the people make default, to claim that meed of liberty which should have belonged to them? Why, sir, in an adversary suit, I understand that if a man will not take care of his rights judgment will pass against him; and, after all the provisions of law have been complied with, he may forfeit his rights to his adversary; but here there is no adversary. It is the people themselves asking to make a constitution for themselves; and President Buchanan and many Senators here likened it to some adversary suit in which there is a party that has some right to take advantage of any want of compliance with the law. Is this your new-fangled popular sovereignty? Who is to take advantage of it? Why, sir, it is as much a slave State, says the President, as Georgia or South Carolina. Was it to inure to their benefit if the people should lose a day in asserting their rights? Was any other State to gain what they lost? If there ever was a tissue of legal nonsense dished up and sent to the Senate of the United States, it is such a message as the President has sent here. I hate to use harsh terms, but I have reason for them. If it is new in the history of this Government, the things I comment on are new.

The people lose their own rights; they are a day too late; the tyrant has bestrode their necks; the constitution is framed; and Mr. Buchanan says, "ah, you are too late to retrieve your rights; somebody has got hold of them; I do not know who, but you have lost them. You ought to have been on the alert; you have lost a day, and your liberties are gone forever." Why, sir, even in the good old Norman days they said the dignity of a freeman was such that even their highest courts could not force him to come in under ten days. First, they must go to him and invite him to come in like a gentleman, tell him what the business was for which he was wanted, because it was beneath the dignity of a free citizen in England at that period, to have a summons come in such a mandatory form that he must obey it in a moment. It seemed to be a mark of servitude that our sturdy ancestors would not submit to. It is not so now, however. In one day your liberties may be gone. In one day you may become a slave and be denied all chance of liberty. Why do you say these men are rebels and traitors? You have had an army of two thousand men in Kansas and all the paraphernalia of war, for what purpose? To compel that people to conduct their domestic concerns in their own way! [Laughter.] They would not do it. Did you ever hear of so perverse a race as there is in that Territory? Two thousand soldiers with all the paraphernalia of war are required to force a people to do just as they please. [Laughter.] Governor Walker wrote to the President over, and over again, before he got the hang of these men. The first persons he met in the Territory when he got there were those busy border ruffians, always in communication with the President, who seem to have mesmerized him and entranced him. The Governor, no doubt, took letters of introduction to some of the first border-ruffians in the Territory; and they seemed to have obtained their knowledge at first from that source. They wrote ferocious letters for about a month. Governor Walker, however, finally took it upon himself to act the missionary. He thundered forth his proclamation. First, he told the people he would enforce those border-ruffian usurped laws upon them; but he had the grace to say that when the constitution came to be acted upon, all of them should have a fair opportunity to vote. He said "such are my instructions from the President, such is my will; and in that respect you shall not be thwarted." He went amongst the people; he found them uneasy about the government which was ruling them. He wrote to the President, over and over again, that there was reason to fear there would be civil war if tyranny was persisted in, and that the only way he could pacify them was by assuring them on the authority of the President that they should have the right to make their own constitution, in their own way. He said that was the only pacification he could offer them, and if he had not done it the Territory would have been in a blaze of war. He wrote to the President that he had told the people of his consultations with the President; he informed them that they had the faith of the President and the Cabinet that the constitution would be submitted to them. The people there had had a little experience of Presidents and Cabinets. They said to Governor Walker "these are very fine words of yours; but we have been dealt with so falsely and perfidiously by our government that we fear even your good faith cannot protect us;" but he gave such assurances as ultimately pacified them.

There must be some secret history connected with the course of the Administration in reference to this matter, which it would be exceedingly interesting to have unfolded. The President in his inaugural had proclaimed in the hearing of the whole people of the United States that the people of Kansas should have a free and fair opportunity to vote on their own constitution. He proclaimed that, as a matter of course, that must be done. He admits it in his last message. He acknowledges in that message that he made these general statements; but he says his mind dwelt on the question of slavery only. Well, sir, I am not a man who wishes to keep anything back, and I tell my friends here who expect to support the people of Kansas in their course, you cannot blink the question; it is slavery that the people are opposed to. I have no doubt they would like to express their sentiments on every part of the constitution; but I candidly admit that if there were no slavery in it, there would not be much contention about it on the other side of the Chamber, nor on this. Let not my friends say that it makes no difference whether there is slavery in it or not, and that the bare question is on the submission. I agree that they are right in principle on that. The people should pass upon anything and everything connected with their welfare touching the constitution under which they are to live; but nevertheless the slavery question is the great matter that divides us.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to make an interrogatory of him at this point of his remarks? I feel very much interested in his speech, and desire to put one question to him.

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. BIGGS. He has argued about the course of the President as to the expression of the voice of the people of Kansas on this constitution. He has stated, however, that the important question involved, is the question of slavery. Now I desire to ask him, and I know he will answer me with his characteristic frankness: if it was satisfactorily shown to him that a majority of the people of Kansas were in favor of that provision of the constitution which recognizes, tolerates, and protects slavery, would he vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union, or would he vote for the admission of any State into the Union with a constitution tolerating, recognizing, or protecting slavery?

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, I would not do any such thing under any circumstances; I never will; I give you notice of that. I have no idea of spreading slavery into country now free. I do not discuss the merits or demerits of it. The reason why I do not discuss them is, that they are nothing to me, so far as my vote goes, and more especially in this Territory that you have stolen from freedom against good faith. I know the question you have put was outside of the record. It was like the opinion of the court in the Dred Scott case; but I am willing to answer it. This Territory was proclaimed to be free; the best guarantees that the best men in this country could ever give made it free; and you have undertaken, by fraud to steal it for slavery. I might rest on that; but, as you expect some effect to flow from it beyond that, I give you the full benefit of my views. But they are my views; do not proclaim them as anybody else's. I do not know or care about the views of the Republican party on such questions. I am very apt to consult my own views of propriety.

Mr. BIGGS. I believe the Senator concurs entirely with the Republican party. In their platform, I believe, they took that position.

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, you may get that from the platform, not from me. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is something extraordinary in the manner in which this constitution was submitted. Was the like of it ever heard of before? I have heard floating rumors that the ingenuity of this whole District was invoked to invent that form of submission; but I do not know how the fact was. I do not believe that rude border-ruffianism had the ingenuity to invent these meshes of slavery. I fear that the fingers of men at the other end of the avenue may be tainted with it. I do not know that; but I have shrewd surmises about it. How was it submitted? I will ask first, why did you submit it at all? On the other side of this Chamber you claim that the convention was under no obligations whatever to the people; that the convention was supreme; that it might do as it pleased; that, if it did not submit it, the people must be content—a doctrine as much fraught with despotism as anything that can be found in the eastern world. You say that a set of men called into a convention can, at their will, frame an instrument by which the whole people are to be bound, hand and foot, against their will. Why, sir, it is an absurdity, in my judgment, altogether too palpable for argument in any part of the United States.

If we hold our liberties by such a tenure as that, they stand on a more fragile basis than I have supposed. Why, sir, I have always supposed that everybody understood that when a convention was framing a constitution, it was merely making a proposition to the people who were to be governed by it. They say to the people: "Will you have this? We have done our best to make a constitution which we, as members of this community, have believed would be acceptable to you. We propose, therefore, that you look into it, and, if it meets with your approbation, make it your constitution." I have always supposed that that was the meaning of the action of such a convention; and certainly it is, if American liberty means anything.

The men assembled at Leecompton dare not present their constitution to this body without some attempt to cover it up; they must make an attempt to submit it. How have they done it? Why, sir, they have contrived, by ingenuity, to get up a scheme whereby the form of voting might be preserved to the people, and the result be the same, let them vote as they would. It makes me think of a man who built a hog-pen up in our country once, and the rails were so crooked and winding, that when his hogs got through and thought they had got out, as they wound along they came right in again. [Laughter.] So here, the people were to say "constitution with slavery," or "constitution without slavery." If they said "constitution with slavery," that gave them slavery up to their ears; it never could be done away with. If they voted "constitution without slavery," what would an unsophisticated man suppose would come then? He would suppose he had got out of the pen; but the fact is, it twisted him right in where he was before. He had not gone an inch; slavery was there; it was to be there; it was to be protected there forever, vote as you would. And they extorted an oath, before they put this nefarious fraud to the people, that they should support it!

Now, sir, whoever devised this scheme had a more mean and contemptible opinion of the American people than is consistent with republicanism or Democracy. I do not believe there is a despot on God's earth that dare deal thus with his people; and you say they are to be bound by such a Peter Funk operation as that! Do you suppose men are to be entrapped and deprived of their liberties in this way? The only difference in the result, whether they voted for the constitution with slavery or without it, was, whether they would allow the future importation of slaves into the State, or whether those now there should be kept in slavery, with their posterity, forever. It was to be a slave State, and, in the language of the President, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina, whether the people voted that they would have the constitution with slavery, or whether they said they would have it without slavery. Is not that a fine aspect to hold up to the American people, to suppose they are to be gulled by such a thing as that?

Then they provided, in the schedule, that the vote should be returned to one John Calhoun, the president of the convention. I deny, as a legal proposition, that Calhoun could politically live one moment after the convention had expired. All the incidents die with the principal. He was defunct, and it was not in the power of the convention to keep him on foot in his official form one hour after that.

But, passing by that point, we see the shrewd ingenuity with which it was done. This Calhoun was empowered, as dictator there, to fix all the election districts, to appoint the judges, his own mere creatures and instruments, to make the returns, and they were to make them to him, and, as it is construed now, to make them either this year or next year, just as he pleases. They said the returns should be made to him in eight days after the election, but he need never exhibit them at all; and he has proclaimed in this city, to the honorable Senator from Illinois, who has stated it on this floor, that unless this constitution be adopted, he, in his sovereign majesty, never will make known what was done!

Mr. President, is it not an open, downright insult offered to the American Senate, to send this fugitive from justice, armed with this tremendous power of turning a constitutional majority one way or the other, just as he sees fit? Will the liberty-loving people of the United States submit to this kind of authority and dictation? Who is this John C. Calhoun?

A SENATOR. He drops the "C."

Mr. WADE. I am glad he does so, for the honor of his predecessor. Who is he? We know nothing about him. The only history of him we have, is that he has been indignantly driven out by that people, as a violator of their laws, as a man so infamous that they would not suffer him to live there at all, and he has fled to the place where everything that is anti-republican and tyrannical seems to fly—he has sought a city of refuge here, where everything too vile to live at home seems to find a place. Here we are waiting on John Calhoun for light as to who shall govern the Territory of Kansas. ["The State."] Well; the State of Kansas, when it gets to be a State. I know the President calls it a State now, and did it a great while ago. Was ever anything done like it on this continent before? When before—was a man armed with authority to take the votes of the people of a State, bury them up in a candle-box, if you please, or carry them in his pocket, not letting anybody be witness of what he has got, and there hold them in the face of the whole people just as long as he pleases, and, if he pleases, so forever? Sir, if you give sanction to frauds like this, American institutions are on their last legs, and they ought to be. John Calhoun, sitting in some public house in this city, with the destinies of a great State in his pocket, and he refusing to exhibit the truth to the Senate of the United States, to the President of the United States, to the House of Representatives, or to anybody interested to know anything about it! Dictator John Calhoun is to say who shall rule Kansas. A gentleman here said the other day, "Cotton is king." He was mistaken. Sir, it is John Calhoun who is king.

But I do not wish to pursue this subject any further. I am sick of it. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] said he had seen enough to satisfy him that these frauds were sickening and shameful, and he did not want to investigate them. It is sickening; it is loathing to the American mind to contemplate these nefarious frauds that are flouted in our faces; and we have no means to redress them. Sir, we should scout them from us with indignation; and I hope, for the honor of the American name, that all these proceedings, so fraught with most palpable and undeniable fraud, will receive the stern denunciation of this body.

I omitted to notice one little point that I ought to have mentioned, and that was the disagreement between gentlemen on this floor as to what should be done with a constitution formed in this way. The Senator from Louisiana did not tell us what he would do in a matter of this kind. It was a rough spot for him. I believe he did not intimate whether he thought, if there was a majority in favor of this constitution, we ought to reject it, or not. I believe his speech is barren on that subject. The Senator from South Carolina, finding himself pressed to the wall, came to the conclusion that, in framing constitutions, a minority ought to rule. That was a new discovery! Minorities should rule, because you have not got a majority! He spoke that which seems to be acted out by many others.

Now, we are told, as a kind of salvo, by the President of the United States, after he has consigned us, soul and body, to the South and to slavery, that this constitution can be changed. He seems not to have a single idea of the North; he has forgotten that there is a North; and yet he turns around in his message, and finally says to us two or three times over, that the best way is to admit Kansas into the Union as a State, because they can then make a free State so much quicker than they could if you referred the whole matter back to them. Was there any sincerity in that? Is there any southern gentleman on this floor who is going to contend that this constitution shall be crowded down the throats of that people because then they can, with greater speed and facility, make Kansas a free State? Is that it? Was that view of it designed for the other side, or was it to cheat us? It was not designed for both, everybody knows, and nobody will vote for it with that view.

The President, however, has said that the people can alter their constitution when they please. That point has been so ably argued by other gentlemen that I am not going to enter into it elaborately. I will ask southern gentlemen, are you willing to yield to that doctrine? If the constitution prescribes the mode and manner of its amendment, can you, without revolution, go across roads, run counter to it, and amend it in a different manner from that pointed out in it? Southern gentlemen have an equal representation on this floor, gentlemen of the small States on this floor compete with the largest; but if a bare majority can alter constitutions at our will, how long will we submit to be outvoted by mere minorities who, in this body govern, so far as they can govern, the people of the United States? It was a compact made, it was part and parcel of the Constitution of the United States; it cannot be abrogated without revolution, and he who should attempt it would be a rebel; and yet your Chief Magistrate is preaching up to us such doctrines as these, and telling the people that although your fundamental law prescribes the mode of its amendment, all such restrictions are void, and a bare majority can rule. He says these limitations in the constitution are no more than limitations upon a municipal corporation; a majority can alter it at their will.

Sir, the doctrine is as new as it is revolutionary and dangerous. Other gentlemen have hinted that this could be done. My colleague [Mr. PUGH] upon this floor has presented an amendment, which contemplates that we can help a people to make their own constitution—that we may say they shall construe it for themselves. I know very well that my honorable colleague did not intend to deceive anybody when he offered this amendment; but I know that if it be adopted, its only effect will be to deceive thousands of unsophisticated men who are not lawyers. Will State-rights men on this floor contend that we can modify a constitution for the people of a State? You who have repudiated the old Jefferson proviso; many of you who claim even that a State of this Union may secede at will, do you hold that you may force a State into the Union against her will on just such conditions as you please? Sir, such doctrines as these will hardly answer with the American people. You can no more force a people into this Union against their will, with a constitution which they repudiate, than you can force them out of the Union against their will; nor any more than they can secede of their own will. Both attempts are revolutionary, having no warrant in the Constitution; and I am amazed that a man of the age of the President of the United States, a man of the conservative ideas that he has been supposed to entertain, should have put forth a doctrine that would root up and overturn at the mere will of the majority, not only the Constitution of the United States, but every constitution in the States of the Union.

There is one other idea that has been constantly put forth here by many gentlemen who are attempting to justify the admission of this Territory into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. They say that other States have been admitted without an enabling act. Sir, all that is said on this subject I will not say is mere sophistry; but it ought to deceive nobody. Perhaps more than half the new States have come into the Union without any enabling act. I do not think that such an act is at all essential. Here are a people all homogeneous, all having the same interests, having no matter of contention between them; they could get together, and, without any dissent, frame a constitution, and ask us to admit them under it. The evidence must be such, always has been such in every instance, that there has been no reason to doubt that the constitution had the approbation of the whole people, or of a vast majority. Why do you require a popular vote on that point? Because, when there is dispute, it is the only means of ascertaining where the majority is; but if there is no dispute you can have that evidence in another way, and it is just as legitimate. What has that to do as a precedent with a case where civil war even is raging in regard to the constitution that is presented; where strife, contention, and arms are invoked to settle the controversy? You are likening that to a peaceful gathering of homogeneous people, all agreed to fix their institutions in their own way. Sir, there is no parallel. One throws no light on the other. The people of Kansas, in three days, can settle this matter, if you will let them. You are convulsing the whole nation by the attempt to force a constitution on the unwilling necks of a people, which they abhor and detest. Withdraw your force, withdraw your coercion, say to that people, "assemble yourselves together peacefully, and determine what constitution you choose to live under;" and my word for it, sir, the hour you do so, peace and tranquillity will reign throughout the whole of Kansas. Every man knows it.

This contention is kept up for no other reason than to hang on the necks of that people this pet institution of slavery. In one hour you can make peace. Adopt the other course, and God only knows to what it will lead. I do not know what may be the result now; but it has never yet been found that by external interference, by force, or by fraud, you could coerce any set of American people to submit to a government they abhorred and detested. If they do it now, it will only mark the degeneracy of this age and of this people, and show that we are verging toward slavery and despotism. In my judgment, it is as necessary for us to rebuke and overthrow the frauds to which I have alluded as anything else we possibly can do. If there is anything more dangerous to this Union than another, it is the immunity that is given to fraud, allowing your ballot-box to be invaded. Why, sir, the hour your ballot-box is undermined to that degree that American people shall not have confidence in it, from that very hour you render free government impossible. Will you encourage it, will you foster these infamous attempts to undermine and overthrow the institutions of this country, and render representative democracy utterly impossible?

Sir, I am a member, and I am proud of it, of the great Republican party. It is no sectional party. It is accused of all manner of sins; but it is organized upon the broadest equity—to give every man his rights, and invade no man's rights. It intends to render impartial justice to every section of this nation; it invokes the aid of good men from all sections and from all parties, who loathe the frauds which have beset the old parties. It is the only hope of those who see the Government, in the hands of the old parties, now running waste and suffering shipwreck. This great party was not organized by any man, any more than the Whig party was overthrown by the interposition of any man. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY,] the other day, supposed that the old Whig party was entirely obliterated and overthrown by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.] Well, sir, I admit his power; I admit his ability; I admit his worthiness to mold parties for good, and they would be as safe in his hands as in the hands of anybody; but he has not the power, and there never was a man armed with power to put down or put up a great party, like the old Whig party, or to substitute in its place the Republican party. The great Republican party has grown out of your abuses. Your old friends have distrusted you. They could not follow the corrupt lead of their old partisans longer; and, as if animated by a single voice and by one soul, they have come up in order to correct these evils. It is not the work of any man. There is no man so high as to say; "I have organized the Republican party." No set of men can say that they have done it. This great party is yet in its infancy. It looked your old organizations, two years ago, in the second year of its age, sternly in the face, and contended for the highest honor of this nation. Those corrupt means, that led to her organization, are as rife now as they were when she was organized. Her principles are just.

I would not speak of a party in this high tribunal, were it not that we are constantly maligned with the idea that we belong to a sectional party. I deny it. The mission of this great party is to overthrow fraud; to reinstate the Government on her old glorious republican foundation; to administer it as the fathers administered it. With that view, she plants her feet firmly on the Declaration of Independence. She takes the Constitution of the United States in the one hand, and the union of the States and the rights of the States in the other; and she intends, with those banners flying, to march directly on until she has corrected these abuses, and brought back the ship of State to her good old moorings.

A struggle was continued until five minutes past six o'clock on Tuesday morning, the night having been consumed by innumerable motions to postpone and to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays were taken. An occasional speech diversified the scene. The majority at length yielded, and the Senate adjourned. The residue of this day's proceedings will be published in the Appendix.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 15, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. C. H. HALL.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be a motion submitted on Monday last, by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce a bill providing for erecting a building in the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, for a post office and custom-house.

CALL OF THE STATES.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I ask the consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the States be called, beginning where the Speaker left off; and that upon such call members may introduce bills for reference only, of which previous notice has been given, and resolutions for reference, to which no objection shall be made; and that said bills shall not be brought before the House, by motions to reconsider.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title: "An act (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton;" when the Speaker signed the same.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. ENGLISH. I propose to withdraw the motion now pending, believing that I can accomplish the object I had in view in making it in another and better way. I withdraw the motion, and in lieu thereof I submit the following resolutions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What would be the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The call of the States for resolutions.

Mr. DOWDELL. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask to have my resolutions reported.

The resolutions were reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House the amount of tolls collected on the Louisville and Portland canals since the United States became the owner of a controlling interest in the stock of said company, and what disposition has been made of the money so received from tolls; and if any portion thereof has been used for the purpose of enlarging said canal, that he inform this House how much and under what law or authority the same has been expended. Also, that he inform the House the nature and extent of the interest of the United States in said canal; and whether he has any information that the parties in charge of the same have appropriated, or propose to appropriate, the income of said canal, or the funds on hand belonging to the United States, without the concurrence of Congress; and if so, under what law and by what authority.

And resolved, further, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for a reduction of the tolls upon the Louisville and Portland canal; and also to inquire what further legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the interest of the United States in said canal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object, because I—

Mr. ENGLISH. Debate is not in order. I want to debate the resolutions myself, if debate is to be allowed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. So do I.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. EDIE and HAWKINS were appointed.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ENGLISH. I think if the resolutions be again read, the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his objection to them.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. ENGLISH. If the rules be suspended, I do not propose to discuss the resolutions. I will call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 147, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrian, Ahl, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Campbell, Caskey, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Coffay, Collins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Dandrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Daves, Dean, Dinwiddie, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Feloy, Foster, Garnett, Cartrell, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Jevett, George W. Jones, J. Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Macay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Milton, Montgomery, Moore, Mort, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Paudleton, Pettit, Phelps, Niblack, Nichol, Olin, Parker, Quintan, Reagan, Reilly, Phillips, Pike, Pettit, Powell, Quinan, Scott, Searing, Aaron Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Robert Smith, Samuel A.

Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Warren, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wortendyke, John W. Wright, and Zollcoffer—147.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bennett, Burroughs, Ezra Clark, Cragin, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Edie, Giddings, Gilmer, Granger, Harlan, Bill, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miller, Murray, Peyton, Potter, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, William Stewart, Tappan, Underwood, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilson, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—42.

So the rules were suspended (two thirds voting in favor thereof.)

Pending the above call, Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that his colleagues, Messrs. KELLY and FENTON had paired off.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. LANDY, was detained at home by indisposition in his family.

The result of the vote having been announced, Mr. ENGLISH moved the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the call for the previous question, to allow me ten minutes in which to submit an explanation to the House.

Mr. ENGLISH. I should like to accommodate the gentleman; but if he submits any remarks I shall feel myself under a necessity of submitting some in reply, and therefore I must insist on my call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then I trust that the call for the previous question will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 66, noes 88.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGHURST and BRYAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas fifty-five.

Mr. ENGLISH. I do not ask for a further count.

The SPEAKER. Then the House refuses to sustain the call for the previous question.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, about the year 1825, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky incorporated a company for the purpose of constructing a canal around the falls of the Ohio river, on the Kentucky side. The Government of the United States became a subscriber to the stock of that company to the amount of about two hundred and forty thousand dollars. The canal was completed about the year 1830; and since that time the dividends which have been declared on the stock belonging to the Government of the United States have gone to the credit of the United States. They have amounted to such a sum as not only to reimburse the Treasury for the $240,000 which the United States invested in the stock of said company, but to such an amount as to enable the Government, out of these extra dividends, to purchase the entire stock in that company owned by private individuals. The original stock only amounted to $1,000,000, and yet there has been exacted from the commerce of that river more than $3,000,000 in the shape of tolls. We find, on examination of the record, that in the year 1855, the Government of the United States became the owner of all the stock excepting a mere nominal interest; and that for several years previous to that time, the tolls received exceeded the expenditures something like the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum; and if I am not mistaken, the average toll received per annum since the completion of the canal, is about the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. The Government, when it purchased the stock owned by private individuals, not only paid par value for it, but in some instances paid as much as three dollars for one dollar of stock. The United States has virtually owned this entire canal for the last three or four years; and, sir, the object which I have in view in introducing these resolutions, is to ascertain what has become of the hundreds of thousands of dollars collected since that time from the boatmen on that river by this canal company, and which, so far as I am advised, have not gone into the Treasury of the United States, where it belongs. On the contrary, I understand that this canal company not only claim to collect tolls on that canal, but to appropriate it to such uses as they may deem expedient, without consulting the Congress of the United States.

I find, sir, that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky has actually passed an act authorizing the construction of a new canal, as a branch of the old one, out of the canal revenues accrued and to accrue, which ought to and do belong to the Government of the United States. Here is the act: An act to amend the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company be so amended as to authorize said company to construct with the revenues and on the credit of the corporation, a branch canal sufficient to pass the largest class of steam vessels navigating the Ohio river; and the said company are hereby vested with all the power and authority to acquire and hold the necessary lands for said branch, and to construct the same, vested by the charter and amendments for the construction of the original canal; and all the provisions of the original charter and amendments shall be and are hereby made as applicable to the branch as to the original canal.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to a statement of Mr. E. Lockhart, superintendent of the canal. He says, alluding to the law I have just quoted:

"The board, thus clothed with full authority to go on with the work, intend to commence the construction of the branch canal this spring. They have provided themselves with a plan of the new locks, and are only awaiting good weather to make a beginning. The charter authorizes them to borrow money on the credit of the company to the extent of $1,000,000. The navigation of the canal through the present locks will not be in the least interrupted by the construction of the branch. The money now in the treasury of the company, with the accruing tolls, will first be used, and when exhausted, a loan will probably be resorted to, and the work will be carried on to completion as speedily as possible. The work will probably cost $500,000, and will require two years for its completion, in which time the tolls will pay about two hundred thousand dollars, requiring $300,000 to be raised by loan, which can easily be done on the credit of the company."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the state of the case. The United States has been reimbursed the amount of money which she originally subscribed to the stock of this company, and the toll collected upon the canal, over and above what was required for that purpose, has been sufficient to sink the entire amount of stock owned by individuals, so that virtually the Government of the United States is this day the owner of the entire stock, and has been so for many years, and yet we have no account of what has been done with the tolls which have been levied upon the boatmen and the commerce of that river, and now the fact is disclosed by the superintendent, and by the action of the Kentucky Legislature, that it is actually proposed to take the accrued tolls, and the tolls hereafter to be collected, and which belong to the United States, and dispose of the same without the assent of Congress. How many private fortunes are to be made out of it remains to be developed. Mr. Speaker, I maintain that we have no satisfactory account of what has been done with the revenues since the United States Government has become the owner of the stock, and the object of these resolutions, in part, is to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, upon whom this subject has been devolved, to give us the information in his possession, in regard to it. I propose, also, that the Committee on Roads and Canals inquire into the expediency of reducing the tolls to such a sum as will be sufficient merely to keep the canal in repair and pay the expenses of the same. My object is to relieve the commerce of the Ohio river from the onerous tax now imposed upon it by that canal, and to get at all the facts so that the House may act intelligently upon the subject. I say there is nothing unfair in the proposition, and I think it should be adopted without a dissenting voice. When the Secretary of the Treasury makes his response it will be proper to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals, that they may inquire into the whole subject. If it shall turn out that there should be legislation in regard to it, that committee will report the fact, and the House will take action accordingly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know but that the gentleman from Indiana has himself made about the speech I could have desired, in explanation of the affairs of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; but he has made some very wide inaccuracies, which are extraordinary; coming, as they do, from a gentleman directly from the locality of the canal. I agree with the gentleman that, about the year 1824 or 1825, the Legislature of Kentucky chartered a company to construct a canal around the falls of the Ohio. The number of shares of the stock of that company was ten thousand, of $100 each. Of these shares the United States subscribed for twenty-three hundred, and private individuals subscribed for the other seventy-seven hundred. As a shareholder, the United States Government drew in dividends from the company, $257,000 in money, being the whole amount that the United States had subscribed, and $27,000 of clear profit upon the investment. All this cash went into the Treasury of the United States.

About that time these gentlemen on the Indiana side of the river commenced petitioning Congress to make a free canal on their side of the river; and by these petitions, and their agitation of the subject, they endangered the property of the private stockholders in the Louisville and Portland canal. By the growth of western commerce it had become palpable that that canal was not equal to the wants of commerce, and that it must be enlarged, or a new one be constructed. The western people objected to the collection of any tolls whatever on the commerce of the Ohio, and they insisted upon having a free canal. To accommodate them, the Legislature of Kentucky, at the instance of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, amended the charter of that company, by which it was provided that the canal company might take the whole proceeds of the annual working of the canal, and thereby create a fund, which, instead of being divided among the stockholders, should be appropriated to the purchase and absorption of the private stock. By that instrumentality the private stockholders got rid of their shares, and the canal company absorbed its whole stock, except five shares. The Kentucky statute provided that the company was to take this amendment of the charter on the condition that, when, by this process, the whole stock had been taken out of private hands, it should be first offered to the United States, on the condition that the United States should make the canal equal to the wants of commerce, and should impose no larger tolls than such as would keep the canal in repair. If the United States did not take it on that condition, then the canal company was to offer it to the State of Kentucky on the same conditions; and if the State of Kentucky did not take it, the canal company was to offer it to the city of Louisville on the same conditions. The whole proceeds of the canal were invested year by year, in obedience to the amended charter, and with the knowledge of the United States, in purchasing in the private stock, till there remained but five shares of the seventy-seven hundred.

The gentleman commits a wide mistake in supposing that by that process of absorption merely, the United States became the proprietor of the shares so purchased. The United States have not now a share more than they had when the charter was made. They still hold their twenty-three hundred shares, and no more. And let me say to the Congress of the United States that they will never hold another share until the United States perform the conditions on which the trust declared in the Kentucky statute is to inure to the benefit of the United States. Year in and year out the Representative from the city of Louisville has been before Congress with this offer made by the company, asking that an appropriation may be made to make the Louisville and Portland canal "equal to the wants of commerce," so that the United States might become the proprietor of the work, in conformity with the Kentucky statute; and year by year the constitutional scruples of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have prevented that being done. Year by year, when I have attempted to get an appropriation for this purpose, these same Indiana gentlemen have proposed to acquiesce in it with the condition that the Government of the United States, in appropriating money to make the Louisville and Portland canal equal to the wants of commerce, should also appropriate money to build another canal on the Indiana side of the river. I have been urged, year by year, to accept this sort of compromise, but I have rejected it, and have stated on the floor of this House that there was no necessity for a canal on the Indiana side of the river. I have stated again and again that in my opinion, from being conversant with the locality, no canal could be made on the Indiana side of the river that would ameliorate the condition of commerce, unless it shall be built some seven or eight miles long, and that then it would have to cross the valleys of a creek which could be crossed in time of flood only by constructions that would throw the aqueducts to Rome by the Campagna into perfect insignificance.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that the construction of a canal on the Indiana side of the river is a question in controversy here now; if so, I shall have something to say upon that subject.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I had no doubt in the world, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman would flinch in this controversy, and I have not been mistaken.

Mr. ENGLISH. I insist upon my point of order. The gentleman has no right to discuss the propriety or impropriety of constructing a canal around the falls on the Indiana side, and if he has, I shall claim the same right, and shall be able to show that a new and better canal can be made on the Indiana side, and for less money, and with less obstructions to commerce, than the Louisville and Portland canal can be enlarged.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman seemed to go into the whole history of the Louisville and Portland canal—its revenues and the proceedings of its company; but whenever I commence to develop and exfoliate the proceedings of those who want a canal on the Indiana side, and to show the point that they are after, the gentleman suddenly discovers that there is a point of order necessary to be intervened. I object to the gentleman's resolutions for this reason, that they do injustice to the five honorable men who now hold that stock. And I say here that there are no more honorable men on the face of the earth than those five men; and I am sure that the gentleman does not intend, even darkly, to insinuate, or to cast the most distant imputation, that these men have soiled their fingers by corruption.

Mr. ENGLISH. The object that I had in introducing these resolutions is to arrive at the facts through official sources. I make no imputation. I simply desire to get at the facts.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The condition of this company has been reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the opening of each year, and they who feel disposed to inquire into the proceedings of the company have had an opportunity—from the day of its charter down to this day—to look at the annual exhibit of its debits and credits, and at the manner in which every dollar that came into its treasury was disposed of. There has been no secrecy about this matter; the company has come here again and again with this offer to the Government of the United States, and their offer has again and again been rejected.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, without undertaking to give any directions, (as he clearly had no right to do,) but representing, as he did, the two thousand three hundred shares of the stock of the United States in the corporation, suggested to the managers of the corporation; first, that they should reduce the tolls one half. They did so; and still the commerce of the Ohio, on the reduced tolls, created a large surplus in the treasury of the company. What was to be done with that surplus? The directors determined, in conformity with a suggestion from the Secretary of the Treasury, that they would appropriate the surplus to the improvement of the canal, and they did proceed, as the Secretary of the Treasury reported to Congress in 1856, to widen and deepen the canal, cut a turn-out, so that steamboats could pass, and made a variety of improvements, such as a pivot bridge, booms, &c., to facilitate the passage of vessels through the canal. They, finding that a surplus of some fifty-odd thousand dollars had accumulated, have gone to the Kentucky Legislature and asked for an amendment of their charter, by which they may go forward and do the whole work, so as to make, upon their own responsibility, a canal equal to the wants of commerce, when it will be handed over to the United States, if the United States shall choose to receive it, without costing them a dollar. The Kentucky Legislature of course passed the act for amending the charter without a word; and I stand here the Representative of the district in which that canal is situated, to inform the gentleman from Indiana, and the House, that I do not propose again to ask a dollar from Congress for that work.

But when the fact leaks out that, under the amendment passed by the Kentucky Legislature to the charter of this company, the company is going forward to make the improvements according to the wishes of the commercial men of the country, and in accordance with the design that has been submitted, year by year, to Congress, those gentlemen representing the Indiana side become suddenly alarmed lest the commerce of the Ohio river may be mulcted and fined. They now want, when they find that these improvements are to be made without costing the national Treasury a dollar, to inquire by what authority it is to be done.

Mr. HUGHES. I want the gentleman from Kentucky to leave me out.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will leave the gentleman from Indiana out. I say the Representatives of the Indiana side of the river, and the Representatives of the Cincinnati interest, become suddenly alarmed; and the gentleman from Indiana wants to get the Secretary of the Treasury to write a letter showing the gross amount of proceeds that have been drawn from this canal since the Government of the United States have had the controlling interest. Why, sir, God knows she has never had the controlling interest; and she never will have a controlling interest until she has performed the condition under which she was to acquire that stock; which was, that she should make the canal equal to the wants of commerce. Sir, year by year have I been here exhausting my lungs, more than once, in trying to obtain an appropriation for the purpose of making that canal equal to the wants of commerce. Congress has failed to make such an appropriation; and now, I do not propose to ask Congress for any more appropriations. The canal company then went to the Kentucky Legislature for an amendment to their charter, and their charter was amended. Under their amended charter they have gone on and acquired property to make a branch canal; and they announce that they are ready to commence the work in the spring, and that they have entered into a contract for a canal equal to the wants of commerce for $600,000. They will go on and complete this canal, and then what will become of the proposition for the construction of a canal on the Indiana side of the river by an appropriation from the Federal Treasury? When a canal shall have been completed, which shall permit your Cincinnati boats to travel through free; what will become of these propositions to build a canal at the Government expense, at a cost of ten or fifteen million dollars, which will never be reimbursed? There will not be left an excuse for appropriating a dollar in that way.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky when I have ever made a proposition in this House of the character he has just mentioned?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know that the gentleman has introduced such a proposition. I refer to the interest that has been here, year in and year out, ever since I have been a member of Congress. I do not recollect whether the gentleman from Indiana ever introduced such a bill; but I recollect that, whenever I have introduced a proposition for my canal, it has always been incumbered by opposition from Indiana and from Cincinnati. They would not let my canal be improved, unless I would take it cum onere of a big canal on the Indiana side of the river.

Whether the gentleman is the sponsor of that movement, I do not know. That has been the countervailing interest which has caused the dilatoriness of the United States Government. And that interest, with the constitutional scruples of gentlemen, have prevented the United States from carrying forward the improvements upon which this stock in the hands of private individuals was to be transferred. But, sir, now, beyond the two thousand three hundred shares owned by the Government, there are seven thousand seven hundred shares in the hands of other parties. And now, if you want to know the dividends they have earned and the dividends they have declared, raise a committee, and gentlemen of this House shall learn the history of the matter from the commencement to the present time. I pledge my word to gentlemen that they shall have a fair and satisfactory exhibit of every dollar that has passed through the hands of these gentlemen.

But I do not want resolutions like these passed.

They carry upon their face the inference that the Government of the United States may have been injured, and that there may have been a misapplication of the funds by the gentlemen who have, from time to time, been in the discharge of that trust. I do not want the Secretary of the Treasury to write down its history. I want the books to be examined. They may be brought here, and they shall be brought here if you choose. I understand the history of it from beginning to end, as perfectly as I do my ABC's.

Mr. ENGLISH. If the gentleman understands this matter from the beginning, as I have no doubt he does, I should like to ask him if he denies the assertion which I made, that the Government of the United States owns the whole of the stock except five shares?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says:

"In January, 1855, the net receipts of the canal were sufficient to purchase the balance of the private stock, and all was purchased and transferred to the United States except five shares left standing—one to the name of the president, and one to the name of each of the directors of the canal."

This, sir, is the statement of a distinguished citizen of Louisville—the Hon. James Guthrie—when he was Secretary of the Treasury; and it will be seen that it fully sustains the statement made by me.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have already explained that. I have told the gentleman that, under the Kentucky statute, the canal stands ready to be transferred to the Government of the United States, whenever the Government of the United States shall make an appropriation. But Mr. Guthrie did not understand it, and nobody else could understand, that the United States have become the proprietors of the canal; because, in addition to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, the action of the corporators of the State corporation was required to discharge the trust created by the statute. And I take this further legal position, and refer it to any gentleman of the House learned in the law, that if these five corporators had attempted to transfer it to the United States Government, without the performance of the condition upon which the trust was declared, any court of equity would have enjoined against that transfer. The State of Kentucky and the city of Louisville were reversioners in the matter, and they both had legal interest in the transfer. Like bidders at a sale, if they stood forward ready to put down the bid that they thought equal to the wants of the commerce upon the transfer of the stock, they had the equitable right, the legal right, to do so. And, sir, Mr. Guthrie and your Comptroller together, could not have deprived them of it. You have got no property; and all I ask is, that Congress, at this stage of the proceeding, shall not go forward to make an ex parte investigation, by which I fear that injustice may be done to these gentlemen. Give a committee, by which every dollar that has been collected, and how it has been expended, shall be shown, and I will venture my head that there will not be a fourpence missing from the accounts, and that there will not be a dollar exhibited in the accounts, except what has gone to the improvement of the canal itself, and the amelioration of the commerce of the Ohio river.

I think the passage of this resolution would be wrong. You might, it may be, without any such intention, spread upon the records of the Government that which would stain these men, and might create a presumption against them. They might be put down here without giving them a hearing at all. They have not come forward, but they will come forward. This canal will be made, and it will be made equal to the wants of commerce, and they will not ask a dollar from the Treasury to do it; and when it is done, it will be ready to be handed over to the Government of the United States, who have so long and so pertinaciously been unjust to the commerce of the Ohio river, unless you burden the Government with another useless and wasteful expenditure of the public money.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, I discover, during the progress of this argument, that there is a contest lying behind the question between Kentucky and Indiana. Now, to any person familiar with the commerce of the Ohio river, it is well known that the commerce of at least half of the States of the Union has been suffering for years for want of sufficient capacity in that canal to accommodate that commerce. So long as the question occupies its present position, there is no probability that the Louisville canal will be sufficiently enlarged to accommodate the trade of the Ohio river, and to allow the boats from New Orleans to pass uninterrupted to Pittsburgh. While the advocates of the Indiana canal are embarrassing the enlargement of the Louisville canal, there is no probability of completing a great work that ought to be completed, which is the building of a dam at the narrows below Louisville, high enough to raise the water over the rapids, to accommodate both sides of the river and the entire trade of the Ohio. The sooner this is done the better. I have the opinion of scientific engineers that it must ultimately be done. It is the proper way to remedy the difficulties, and settle the contest between Kentucky and Indiana. I voted in favor of the resolution for the purpose of bringing out the testimony which would demonstrate that this canal has not the capacity to accommodate the trade that is now passing over the Ohio river. But, while I have done that, I am satisfied that a thorough investigation of this question will result in the adoption of the plan which I suggest to accommodate all parties.

Mr. RITCHIE. Mr. Speaker, the district which I represent has a great interest in some means of getting around the falls of the Ohio without obstruction, or with as little obstruction as possible. Ever since I have been in Congress, any effort to improve the navigation around the falls has been opposed by difficulties between the members from Kentucky and the members from Indiana. I have been desirous, ever since I have been here, to procure an appropriation from Congress, or money in any way it could be obtained, in order to enlarge the present canal at the falls at Louisville, so that it could be made adequate to the wants of commerce. I believe, from a report of the engineers on that subject, which I have examined, that that purpose can be accomplished in less time, and at a smaller expense, in that way than in any other. For that reason I have uniformly supported that plan. If I should be mistaken in that, if it be impracticable, I should then go for an appropriation of money to make a canal upon the Indiana side—for, as between the two sides of the river, I have no choice. My only object is to have the means of getting around the falls with the least possible obstruction to commerce, and the least possible expense in the way of toll.

I find now, sir, that this subject, as it stands, is in this situation: we have no prospect of getting from this Congress, or of obtaining the sanction of the Executive for any appropriation for the building of a canal on either side of the river; and as a practical measure we have this company in the very act of applying the tolls now collected for the enlargement of the canal on the Kentucky side. If let alone, they will, in my judgment, have a canal there in a short time, which will probably answer the purpose of the commerce of that river. I see no possible way of getting at this result in any other mode than the one now adopted. I see no hope in the present state of the national finances and in the present aspect of the political forces in this House and in the Senate, with the constitutional scruples of the Democratic majorities, of getting money from the National Government for this purpose, either to enlarge the canal on the Louisville side, or to build a canal upon the Indiana side. I therefore go for what I consider the only practical measure on this subject, and that is to permit these men, who have now the Louisville canal, to go on collecting their tolls and to enlarge the present canal, which is now in existence upon the Kentucky side, until it is adequate for the purposes required.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken when he intimated that I did not represent a district bordering upon the Ohio river. Two counties in my district border upon the river, and the flourishing city of Madison is the county seat of one of them. The statement of this fact alone will show that my constituents have an immediate interest in every question connected with this transit around the falls of the Ohio. There are now, Mr. Speaker, and have been for years, two rival interests contending in reference to this matter—one is the interest of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and the other the interest of the proposed canal on the Indiana side of the river. I believe that the facts with reference to the past history of the Louisville and Portland canal have been fully and fairly stated by the gentleman from Kentucky. Whatever may be the interest of this corporation or that, or the interest of Kentucky, or the interest of Indiana, with reference to this matter, it must be apparent, I think, to the judgment of every man, that the interests of the trading community, and the commercial people upon that river, whether upon the one side of the river or the other, is the same. If a man starts with a cargo of produce for New Orleans from the city of Madison, it is his interest to get his cargo to market by the shortest and cheapest route. It is not important to him whether he gets around the falls upon the Kentucky side or upon the Indiana side. What he wants is to get around the falls as quickly and as cheaply as possible. It may be important to the stockholders and corporators who shall take the tolls; but that is a question in which the commercial portion of the community has no interest whatever. Their interest is that no one shall take any tolls at all; and that, if possible, the canal shall be free.

Now, sir, a bill has been introduced into this House during the present session, by the gentleman from Ohio, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and is now in the hands of that committee, proposing the construction of a canal around the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side. What is the question which presents itself to this Congress as legislators? Why, sir, their object will be, as it is their duty, to accomplish the construction of a commodious and ready transit around these rapids, in the cheapest and most expeditious manner. How shall it be done? By the appropriation of money from the public Treasury to construct a new canal on the Indiana side, or by so fostering the interests of the canal already constructed, as to open there a cheap and speedy transit for commerce? Now I undertake to say—and I base my assertion upon information derived from some of my constituents whose daily business is to trade up and down that river—that it will meet the wants and wishes of the commercial portion of the country to widen the Louisville and Portland canal as speedily as possible, and allow the commerce of the river to pass through it. I do not know that these resolutions strike a blow at that canal. I do not think that I should support them if they did. The Indiana Legislature, some years ago, chartered a company for the purpose of constructing a canal upon the Indiana side. That company made an extensive survey and examination, and that project has been in the stock market for years.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. I dislike to make the point upon the gentleman from Indiana, but I do not understand that any question is now before this House in regard to the practicability of building a canal upon the Indiana shore, or damming the river at the narrows. The simple question embraced in these resolutions is as to the propriety of calling upon a certain Department for information, and the gentleman from Indiana should confine himself to that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken. The Chair had supposed, during most of this discussion, that very much of what has been said was not directly pertinent to the subject-matter under discussion; and would have so decided if the question had been raised upon any gentleman preceding the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to make a suggestion on this subject. There are three propositions before the House. These resolutions call for information, and the relevancy of this information to the propositions before the House must be taken into consideration when voting upon them. I will endeavor, however, to proceed in order; though it is difficult, in my judgment, to vote understandingly on this call for information, unless we may discuss what are the proposed acts of legislation to which the information relates.

Now, sir, why do we want information in regard to the manner in which the finances of the Louisville and Portland canal have been administered? Why, to enable us to determine whether we will make a new canal, enlarge that one, or adopt some proposition to slack-water the navigation of the river. An intimation on the latter point has been thrown out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE.] I purpose to show, with the permission of the House and of the Speaker, that the true policy is to let the existing canal be enlarged and widened as soon as possible. Therefore, we ought not to trouble the Department for information, the very giving of which will require that a considerable portion of the clerical force of the Department be diverted from their appropriate employment to get up this information; and I would say here, in regard to resolutions of inquiry generally, (and I have it from a reliable and high source,) that the Departments are unable to meet the frequent calls that are made on them by this House for information, unless additional force be furnished them to do the labor thereby imposed. I was going on to say that the proposition for a canal upon the Indiana side is in the hands of the Committee on Commerce. The president of the company is here as an agent, sent by the Board of Trade of Cincinnati; and the very fact that this charter has existed for years—

Mr. BURNETT. I must insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to see the pertinency of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, to the pending resolutions. It may be that there is something intended by the resolutions which the Chair does not see or cannot comprehend. All that the first resolution looks to is information with reference to what has been done by certain officers connected with the Louisville and Portland canal; and there is a second resolution directing the Committee on Roads and Canals to inquire into the expediency of providing for reducing the tolls on that canal. That is all that the resolutions purport; and as to whether there be a proposition to build other canals at other points, the Chair cannot perceive how that can be considered pertinent to the resolutions before the House.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, then, I will put a question, for information, to the mover of the resolutions. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether he is not in favor of the construction of a new canal on the Indiana side of the river?

Mr. BURNETT. I object to his answering the question.

Mr. ENGLISH. Under the ruling of the Chair it would not be proper for me to answer the gentleman's inquiry, and therefore I will not answer it; but I am always for Indiana interests and would answer it fully if it would be in order.

Mr. EDIE. I desire to know, whether it is not competent for the gentleman, at this stage of the proceedings, to presume that the object of the proposed reduction of tolls is to destroy the canal, and thus pave the way for constructing a canal on the Indiana side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it would require a rather metaphysical mind to see the application of that to the pending proposition.

Mr. HUGHES. If I cannot be permitted to take the same range of discussion which other gentlemen have taken on this question, and if I must close my mouth under points of order, I shall endeavor to close the mouths of other gentlemen by calling the previous question; and I do it.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his call for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. Withdraw your point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. You were out of order, and I will confine myself to the resolutions before the House. I desire to make a few remarks, and ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. Will you renew it?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. HUGHES. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not understand, as my colleague from the Louisville district does, that these resolutions contemplate depriving the State of Kentucky of any rights that she or any of her citizens may have in this canal. I cannot, for my life, see why there should be any objection to the calling for the information asked for by these resolutions.

What are the facts, as conceded by my colleague, and the gentleman from Indiana? There is no proposition here for the building of a canal on the Indiana shore, or for the damming the Ohio river at the Narrows. There is nothing of that sort here; but merely a simple inquiry, asking for information as to the management of this canal. If it has been fairly managed, if there has been nothing wrong done, then the gentlemen who are interested in this canal are not injured by the information being given.

My colleague says that there was originally $1,000,000 of this stock—the United States owning twenty-three hundred shares, and private individuals seventy-seven hundred shares. Now, my colleague and the former Secretary of the Treasury of the United States do not understand this matter alike. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to the House of Representatives in 1855, says that this stock has been purchased—that is, the seventy-seven hundred shares owned by private individuals—and has been transferred; to whom? My colleague says that the Government does not own it; but the late Secretary of the Treasury says that the United States have it by transfer. If that be so, then the Government of the United States is the owner of all this stock, except five shares. Now, what is the next inquiry?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My statement is this: that the offer to transfer it was made by the company to the United States on the performance of the conditions required by the Kentucky statute, and there it stands to-day. I know that that is the fact; for I have been myself written to this winter, since I have been here, advising with me as to the propriety of formally withdrawing the offer.

Mr. BURNETT. I now desire to ask my colleague a question. It is this: if the United States do not own the seventy-seven hundred shares of stock, (except five,) to whom do they belong?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. They are held in trust by these five men for the United States, if the United States will perform the condition of the trust, for the State of Kentucky as a second chooser, and for the city of Louisville as a third chooser.

Mr. ENGLISH. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] will allow me, I can set this matter right by showing the precise language of the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie, who, it is well known, is himself a resident of the city of Louisville. He says, in his official report:

"In January, 1855, the net receipts of the canal were sufficient to purchase the balance of the private stock, and all was purchased and transferred to the United States except five shares."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That is nothing more than what my colleague [Mr. BURNETT] has just stated. The emphasis does not make it any stronger. My colleague said that that was the statement of Mr. Guthrie, and I know that such was his statement. But I suppose the state of facts to be this: that Mr. Guthrie spoke of a transfer having been made while there was only an offer to transfer, which offer the General Government has never accepted. In my country it takes two to make a bargain.

Mr. BURNETT. My colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, and myself, agree as to the facts. Now, let us examine the question as to whether we, as the representatives of the people of the nation, ought not to have this inquiry. Why should we not? My constituents are as much interested in the navigation of the Ohio river as are the constituents of any gentleman on this floor. The people of the whole country are interested in the navigation of the Ohio river. We all alike have an interest in it, and it is our duty to protect the people in their rights on that river. These resolutions ask for information—for what? With a view that we may determine the question as to whether there is any action on the part of the General Government necessary to protect the rights of the people of the country against five shareholders in this Louisville and Portland canal.

The Legislature of Kentucky, it is true, passed a bill in which they provide that this company may enlarge this canal. How? Out of the proceeds arising from the tolls collected from the commerce of that river.

Then the General Government owns every dollar of that stock, except the five shares owned by private individuals. The Legislature of Kentucky does not contemplate making this a free canal. But, sir, these five shareholders of this canal are to enlarge it, and the commerce of the whole country is to be taxed—for whose benefit? For the benefit of these five private shareholders.

Now, sir, I take as deep an interest in the affairs of Kentucky as any man in this House, and will go as far to promote the interests of the citizens of my own district and of that State, but I will not sit here in my seat, and by my vote aid in refusing to call for information which will enable us to determine intelligently what the action of the House should be.

I am opposed to the project for building a canal on the Indiana side. I am opposed to the Cincinnati project. But suppose, for instance, these five private shareholders who own this individual stock, go on and enlarge the canal, has not the Government some voice in this matter? She owns all the stock, which has been paid up and transferred to her, except five shares; we are now calling for information to see how this money has been expended, and by what authority they have appropriated the tolls which have been collected to widening and deepening the canal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will read to the gentleman from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, where the authority comes from:

"In April, 1855, the Department authorized the president and directors of the canal to make certain improvements; to be paid out of the surplus tolls, with a distinct instruction that nothing was to be expended but the excess of the tolls over and above the expenses, and no debts to be contracted. The improvements authorized were a floating and swinging boom at the head of the canal, two additional basins at passing-places for boats, and the making smooth the ledges on each side of the canal, and the widening it somewhat. These improvements, it was considered, would benefit the navigation and facilitate the free passage of boats, and could be effected in two years with the surplus receipts, and were strictly within the expenditures for improvements as contemplated in the act of 1842, and impliedly consented to by the United States."

There is the authority giving the assent of the United States to making these improvements.

Mr. BURNETT. It may be that the Secretary of the Treasury had not the power to give the assent of the United States. But I will not discuss that question, for it is not the question before us. I am for protecting the interests of commerce, and of the people of this country, for we are all interested in it. I am for protecting my constituents against any attempt upon the part of these five shareholders to levy upon the commerce of that river for the purpose of enlarging this canal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to understand my colleague. Suppose Congress makes no disposition of the surplus revenue which arises from the tolls collected from the canal: the Government owns but twenty-three hundred shares; seventy-seven hundred shares are owned by private individuals; and do I understand my colleague to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to give the assent of the Government to the dedication of the surplus to making improvements?

Mr. BURNETT. The basis upon which my colleague rests his question will not do. Why? He bases it upon the supposition that the Government does not own the seventy-seven hundred shares formerly in the hands of individuals.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. I insist on applying the gentleman's own question of order to himself.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, sir, I will keep within the bounds of order. My colleague rests his question upon the basis that seventy-seven hundred shares of this stock are owned by private individuals, when in fact the General Government owns them, and the General Government has the right to control them. Private individuals have surrendered their rights to them. Who says so? The Secretary of the Treasury—an official of the General Government, who has the right to speak upon the subject. He says the right of ownership of these seventy-seven hundred shares is in the General Government.

I was remarking that I had an interest in the navigation of the Ohio river. My constituents are interested in it. There is no gentleman upon this floor whose constituents are more deeply interested. I am for protecting the rights of these private shareholders; but I am for protecting the interests of the Government, and, above all, I am for protecting the interests of the people themselves.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I cannot, I feel further. I say I am for protecting the rights of the people; and how do I propose to do it? I propose to do it by voting for these resolutions, in order that we may have this information before us. If there is nothing "rotten in Denmark," then we do not do those five gentlemen who own shares any injustice. I will bear testimony to their high character, so far as I know them. I will not for a moment intimate that they have done anything that is not fair and right, or that they have not properly and legitimately appropriated the funds which have come into their hands; but, believing they have so acted, as a Kentuckian, I want the facts before us, so that everybody may judge for themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. BURNETT. I cannot yield the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I wish to ask whether this information has already been given us from the Department?

Mr. BURNETT. It has not, according to my understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then we ought to have it.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, sir, the Kentucky Legislature have passed this act enlarging the powers of this corporation, composed of these individuals owning five shares; and the question with me is, will you get the information which is necessary to enable you to judge how you can best protect the interests of the people against, if need be, those five individuals who claim the power to build this canal, and then to go on and collect what tolls they please? In compliance with my agreement with the gentleman from Indiana, I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for a moment to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I cannot.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to state to the gentleman from Kentucky the object of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order unless by general consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose to detain the House with debate. The Committee on Commerce have jurisdiction of this subject. They had the subject before them during the last Congress, and they have the subject before them now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us have the information.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, called for tellers on the resolutions.

Tellers were not ordered.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. ENGLISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 259 granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain in 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period; the consideration of which had been postponed to this day.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have a resolution to offer in relation to that bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Before the resolution is read, I ask to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which a communication from the Treasury Department was on Friday last laid upon the table.

Mr. SAVAGE's resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That bill No. 259, granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order therein for the 6th day of April next, and continue the same from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be in order if the gentleman will withdraw his pending motion to recommit.

Mr. SAVAGE. I withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does it not take a two-thirds vote to adopt that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. CLINGMAN. For how many days does it make this bill the special order?

The SPEAKER. Until disposed of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will limit the resolution so that the bill will be made a special order for three days, I will not object to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If this resolution comes in by unanimous consent, would not a majority vote adopt it?

The SPEAKER. A two-thirds vote is required to make a special order. It changes the order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to the bill being made a special order, if the time be limited.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am ready to make any fair compromise. I stand here to-day to carry out my original promise to do everything that is necessary to bring the question to a fair vote of the House. If it suits the policy of the House to limit debate on a bill of so much importance, very well. It requires, in my judgment, some time for discussion; and I doubt the propriety of limiting it to a few days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, inadvertently, perhaps, stated to the gentleman from Tennessee that the resolution could be submitted. If there be objection, it requires a two-thirds vote to introduce the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, unless it be limited as to time.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will modify my resolution so as to provide that the debate shall only continue for three days.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will not the effect of making this a special order be to give this bill precedence over business which we may be considering at the time?

The SPEAKER. It will give this bill, on the 6th day of April, precedence over all other business.

Mr. CLEMENS. Then I object to it.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to inquire whether this bill was not before us regularly before the resolution was submitted?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it not in order, then, to move to make that bill a special order for the 6th day of April next? Does it require unanimous consent to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SAVAGE. And I have moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman move to make it a special order?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. SAVAGE. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I will put the time further off, and afford opportunity for other business to come up. Instead of the 6th of April, I will say the 22d of April.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman agree to the further modification that debate shall continue only for three days?

Mr. SAVAGE. I agree to that, also.

Mr. CLEMENS. As there seems to be so much unanimity in the House in regard to this bill, I will withdraw my objection on a condition. As no danger can be incurred by postponing the period, I will suggest the 26th day of May.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, no! We will adjourn before then.

Mr. CLEMENS. Then I object to the resolution.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SAVAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUITMAN. Is not the next business in order the motion to recommit the volunteer bill?

The SPEAKER. This is resolution day.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I now call up the resolution I offered this morning.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the States be called, beginning where the Speaker left off, and upon said call members may introduce bills for reference only, and of which previous notice has been given, and resolutions for reference to which no objection is made; and said bills shall not again be brought before the House by motions to reconsider.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman to modify his resolution. He says resolutions to which no objection is made. Let them all come in and stand upon an equal footing.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to allow me to offer a preamble to the resolution, the purport of which he will see when it is read.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I cannot yield.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. The rules cannot be suspended so as to take in a mass of business. If the gentleman has a bill which he wants action upon, he can move to have the rules suspended in order to take up that particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri is to suspend any and all rules of the House which prevent him from submitting the resolution; and if two thirds vote in favor of the resolution, every rule is suspended.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. The other day the Chair allowed great latitude of debate upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That was a question of privilege. This is a question involving the priority of business, and under the rules of the House it is expressly provided that every such question shall be decided without debate.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a decision made last Congress—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I call my colleague to order. I object to debate.

Mr. SEWARD. The objection comes with a bad grace from my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I know that; and the Chair has the right to call me to order; and I will sit down. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the resolution. Will not the regular order of business be the calling of States for bills and resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It will be; but notwithstanding that any gentleman has the right to set it aside by moving to suspend the rules.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The effect of the resolution will be to allow a single member, by objecting, to cut off the introduction of a resolution. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were then suspended, (two thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, moved the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 29.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

In compliance with the resolution, the Speaker proceeded to call the several States for bills for reference, and resolutions to which no objection would be made, commencing with the State of Virginia.

CHANGES IN DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. FAULKNER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act approved March 3, 1849, as transferred from the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Interior the supervisory and appellate powers then exercised by the War Department in relation to the acts of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and of reporting a bill to restore to the War Department its former supervision and control of Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOVEJOY objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 137) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of the late Abigail Nason, sister and devisee of John Lord, deceased; also, an act (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct a settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WINSLOW introduced a joint resolution as to the distribution of certain documents; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY, ETC.

Mr. GILMER introduced a bill to prevent the accumulation of unnecessary surpluses in the Treasury, and to equalize the grants of lands to the several States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the Chair whether, under the resolution, bills can come in as a matter of course?

The SPEAKER. They are entitled to be introduced, as a matter of course, where notice has been previously given.

Mr. GILMER. Notice has been given ever since the 9th of February.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not understand that the gentleman can introduce, as a matter of course, a bill of which previous notice has been given. He merely gives notice, under the rule, that he will ask leave to introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is right in that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And if there be objection, it requires a vote of the House to give that leave.

The SPEAKER. But a majority of the House can give it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Certainly, sir. That I supposed. I am opposed to this bill in any shape in which it can come up here.

Mr. GILMER. I merely want it referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With all due respect to the gentleman, I do not want it referred anywhere.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Has not the gentleman a right to introduce his bill under the resolution that was adopted?

Mr. GROW. Under the phraseology of the resolution, do we not suspend this rule?

The resolution was again read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not see why objection does not apply to bills as well as to resolutions.

Mr. GROW. According to the phraseology of the resolution, the rule is suspended. It specifies expressly that bills, of which previous notice has been given, may be introduced for reference only.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the adoption of the resolution supersedes the necessity of propounding the question to the House, "Will the House allow the bill to be introduced?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be rejected.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House prevents that motion being made, because it provides that bills shall be introduced for reference only.

Mr. GILMER. I only ask to have the bill referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can entertain no motion in reference to a bill presented, except a motion to refer; and that without debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was the vote adopting the resolution reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. GILMER asked leave to introduce a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Has previous notice been given of that bill?

Mr. GILMER. It has not; but I desire to introduce it.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I object.

Mr. GILMER. I desire, then, to give notice that I shall introduce the bill when it is in order.

PRINTING OF COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. MILES asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That seven thousand copies of the Coast Survey report be printed for the use of the House, and for distribution by the Coast Survey office.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

PRINTING OF THE PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. MILES asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, of the mechanical portion of the Patent Office report for the year 1857, sixty thousand copies.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

AMIN BEY.

Mr. BOYCE asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, with copies of all credentials or other evidences on file in his Department showing the official character of Amin Bey who visited this country as the representative of his Imperial Majesty the Grand Sultan of Turkey; also, copies of all correspondence touching the official character of the said Amin Bey, either with the Turkish Government or others; also, a statement of the amount of money appropriated, and copies of the papers upon which said appropriation was based; how much of said appropriation was expended, and why any portion of it was withheld.

Mr. MORGAN objected.

FORT RIDGELY AND SOUTH PASS ROADS.

Mr. KEITT. At the request of the Delegate from Minnesota, [Mr. KINGSBURY,] I introduce a bill making an appropriation for the completion of the Fort Ridgely and South Pass wagon road.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. KEITT. I move to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope not. I move to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. GROW. This is in continuation of an appropriation originally made through the Committee on Territories. The Secretary of the Interior has regularly estimated for it, and the estimates, I suppose, are before the Committee of Ways and Means. I would suggest that for the purpose of facilitating business it had better go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COVODE. I understand that this appropriation is needed immediately for military purposes. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROW. I desire to ask the Delegate from Minnesota what reference he wishes the bill to take?

Mr. KINGSBURY. I would prefer the Committee on Military Affairs rather than the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GOVERNMENT BARRACKS AT SAVANNAH.

Mr. SEWARD presented a bill for the transfer and cession of the Government barracks at Savannah, Georgia, to the city of Savannah.

Mr. LETCHER. Has previous notice been given of that bill?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I object.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I beg leave to report a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, introduced a bill giving to citizens above the age of twenty-one years, male and female, who will settle on the same and make certain improvements thereon, a square tract of one hundred and sixty acres of the public land, free from any incumbrances, past, present, and future; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ROME POST OFFICE.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of building a post office at the city of Rome, Georgia, or making an appropriation to repair the damages lately done by fire.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. When North Carolina was called, I was absent from the Hall. I therefore ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I object. When we get through the call the gentleman can then offer his resolution.

SOLDIERS OF THE CREEK WAR.

Mr. DOWDELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855, and the act amendatory, being approved the 14th day of May, 1856, as to extend the benefits and provisions of said act to embrace the volunteers and militia in the State of Alabama, who have rendered fourteen days' actual service in the Creek Indian war of 1836, whether such persons served with the armed forces, or were regularly mustered into the service of, or paid by, the United States or not, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KELSEY objected.

EUFULA A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. SHORTER introduced a bill to constitute the city of Eufaula, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

VOLUNTEER BILL.

Mr. QUITMAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, be made the special order of the day for to-morrow, and each succeeding day for three days, or until the same be disposed of.

Mr. PHELPS. I will not object, provided the resolution says that it shall not interfere with the present order.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. EUSTIS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed of the mechanical portion of the Patent Office report for the year 1857, sixty thousand copies.

Mr. STANTON objected.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. EUSTIS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That seven thousand copies of the Coast Survey report be printed for the use of this House, and for distribution by the Coast Survey office.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. SANDIDGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. SEWARD objected.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS.

Mr. BLISS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so changing the mode of distributing seeds from the Patent Office as to send them to the several State agricultural societies, or to otherwise so distribute them as to relieve members of Congress from the duty of distributing the same; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LETCHER. Allow me to make a suggestion. Where there is no agricultural society, let the seeds be sent to the clerk of the county court.

Mr. COBB. I object to the resolution.

AMENDMENT OF JUDICIARY ACT.

Mr. BLISS introduced a bill to repeal the twenty-fourth section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, and the seventh section of the act further to provide for the collection of debts, passed March 2, 1833; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEXICAN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. HARLAN introduced a joint resolution directing the payment of certain Mexican volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Chair, and to continue during this Congress, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the best mode of taking the census of 1860, with leave to report, by bill or otherwise, at any time during the session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I give notice that I shall try to get the resolution in whenever another opportunity presents itself.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think there is an existing law to provide for that.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

Mr. COX submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be requested to consider the propriety of reporting a joint resolution authorizing the Clerk of this House to furnish (in lieu of books already ordered and not delivered, and which he has not now on hand,) to those entitled thereto, either as members or the representatives of the members of former Congresses, such books as he has on hand of equal value, with those already ordered and never delivered to such members or their representatives.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

ELECTION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. LEITER introduced a bill to provide for the election of postmasters by the people; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LEITER moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ENGLISH. It strikes me that the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I move that reference.

Mr. LEITER. I modify my motion, so that it will be to refer it as the gentleman indicates.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

APPOINTMENT OF PERSONS TO OFFICE.

Mr. LEITER asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House the names of members of the Thirty-Third Congress, who voted for the Nebraska-Kansas act on its final passage, who were thereafter appointed to office under the late and present Administrations, the office to which each member was appointed, the time of appointment, and by whom such appointment was made.

Mr. McQUEEN objected.

JURORS FOR UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. STANTON asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law providing for the selection of jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States by suitable and proper officers in various parts of the several circuits and districts, to be appointed in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

Mr. HUGHES objected.

REPORTS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. GROESBECK introduced a joint resolution in relation to purchasing and distributing a certain number of the reports of the Supreme Court, with Notes and Digest by R. R. Curtis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DELIVERY OF BOOKS.

Mr. COX asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be requested to deliver to the widow of Jonathan Taylor, a member of a former Congress, from books which he has now on hand, books of equal value with those ordered to said Jonathan Taylor by the resolutions of Congress.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I understand that the objection made to the resolution which I offered a short time since, in relation to the appointment of a committee to inquire into the best mode of taking the census of 1860, has been withdrawn. I ask that the resolution may again be read.

The resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. KEITT objected to its introduction.

REMOVAL OF DESKS FROM THE HALL.

Mr. PENDLETON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to remove from the Hall all the desks which have been provided for the use of the members, and to rearrange the chairs in such manner as may be convenient after such removal; and that he provide two writing-tables, one to be placed on each side of the Hall, in the vacant spaces behind the chairs.

Mr. GREENWOOD objected.

FURNISHING BOOKS.

Mr. COX. I renew the resolution I offered a short time since, in reference to instructing the Committee on the Library to make certain inquiries, as the objection has been withdrawn.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected to its introduction.

PRINTING EXTRA COPIES OF A BILL.

Mr. COX asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House, five hundred extra copies of the bill reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, "to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army," &c.

Mr. KEITT objected.

Mr. COX. I have numerous requests from members of the House for copies of this bill, and I cannot supply them.

Mr. KEITT. Well, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I object.

PUBLICATION OF BOOKS.

Mr. BURNETT asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and he same is hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency and propriety of dispensing with the publication of any book or books, or any volume thereof, heretofore ordered by Congress and which have not been executed; and that they report thereon as soon as practicable; and that they inquire whether any of said books may be dispensed with, the printing of which has been commenced; and that they report, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, objected.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. BURNETT introduced a bill to provide for the erection of a post office and custom-house at Paducah, in the State of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

POST ROUTES.

Mr. BURNETT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post route from Paducah, in Kentucky, to Paris, in the State of Tennessee, via Palma, Benton, Wadsworth, and Murray; also, from Paducah to Hickman, in the State of Kentucky, via Hickory Grove, Mayfield, Feliciana, and Lodgetown; also, from Mayfield, Kentucky, to Paris, Tennessee, via Boydsville; from Mayfield to Paris, Tennessee, via Farmington and Murray; also, from Paducah to Blandville, via Newton's Creek and Hazlewood; also, from Hopkinsville, in Kentucky, to Paducah, via Cerulean Springs, Wallonia, Ferry Corner, Birmingham, and Briarsburg.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. This is nothing but a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. EDIE. I renew the objection, on the ground that the gentleman can have the committee attend to the matter without a resolution.

POST OFFICE AT COVINGTON.

Mr. STEVENSON introduced a bill to provide for the erection of a post office at Covington, in the Commonwealth of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ELECTION RIOT IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the memorial of sundry citizens of Washington, touching the interference of the United States marines at the election of corporation officers in Washington, in June, 1857, be, and the same is hereby, referred to a select committee of seven members of this House, to be appointed by the Speaker, with instructions to said committee to inquire—

1. Whether the President of the United States exceeded the authority vested in his hands, by law, in ordering the United States marines to be marched into the city of Washington, and to be placed under the orders of the Mayor of Washington to quell an alleged riot that interfered with the privilege of a peaceable corporation election in this city.

2. Whether any facts exist implicating the Secretary of War, or any other executive officer of this Government, in the charge of having procured an order for said United States marines before the President had given an order for them to be furnished to the Mayor of Washington.

3. Whether there has been any obstruction to the impartial administration of justice in connection with said alleged riot, interposed by any judicial or ministerial officer or officers of the United States in the District of Columbia, and, if so, what facts exhibit such improper conduct upon the part of the said judicial or ministerial officer or officers.

4. Also, to inquire into and report all the facts which will fairly exhibit the conduct of the United States marines, and the officers in command of them on the occasion referred to in the memorial, and the extent of damage done by them to persons and property upon that occasion.

Resolved, That said committee have leave to send for persons and papers, and may sit during the sessions of this House, and may report, by bill or otherwise, whatever may, in their opinion, be demanded by the facts of the case.

Mr. REAGAN objected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then I present the memorial referred to.

The SPEAKER. The memorial can be presented under the rules.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Do I understand the Chair to decide that I cannot present it now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can present the memorial under the rules. He cannot present it under the order adopted this morning providing for the presentation of bills and such resolutions as no objection is made to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am charged with the presentation of this memorial. My State is called, and I offer to present it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot present it under the order of the House. The only way in which he can present it is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to have a special committee raised on this matter.

POST OFFICE ADVERTISING.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to inform the House what number of newspapers published in the city of Washington is employed, under the existing laws or regulations, to advertise the mail lettings, and what amount of compensation is paid to each thereof; also, what number of papers in the several States is employed to advertise the same, and at what price; and whether, in his opinion, the former cannot be hereafter altogether discontinued, and the latter curtailed, without detriment to the Post Office Department.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT JACKSON.

Mr. AVERY introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a post office, court-house, and pension office, at the city of Jackson, in the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. AVERY. I introduced, the other day, under the rule, a memorial on the same subject, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

It was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. AVERY also introduced a bill to increase the appropriation for public buildings at the city of Memphis, Tennessee, and that the same be used for a custom-house and post office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. AVERY also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, introduced a bill to establish a communication by railroad and telegraph between the Atlantic States and California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the special committee on the Pacific railroad.

Mr. PHELPS. I perceive that that bill covers a large amount of manuscript, and I desire the gentleman from Tennessee to submit a motion to have it printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I adopt the suggestion. I move that it be ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Tennessee; one in reference to the postal laws of the United States, and the other instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and in reference to the Hon. JOHN BELL. The first were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and the second were laid on the table; and all were ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a bill to extend the provisions of certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMPENSATION OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. MAYNARD asked leave to introduce the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of increasing the compensation now allowed to the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed further to inquire into the expediency of supplying each of the clerks of the circuit courts of the United States and each of the district attorneys of the United States for the use of their respective offices, a copy of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORGAN objected.

THE POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. ATKINS introduced a bill to amend the postal laws of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LAND OFFICE RECORDS.

Mr. FOLEY introduced a bill to provide for granting exemplifications of records and papers relating to lands, the entry, location, and purchase thereof, remaining in the General Land Office, and fixing the fees to be charged therefor; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NEW ALBANY POST OFFICE, ETC.

Mr. ENGLISH introduced a bill to provide for erecting a building in the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, for a post office, custom-house, and pension office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LANDS FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not present when the State of Kentucky was called. I ask the consent of the House to present certain resolutions from the Kentucky Agricultural Society, asking an appropriation of the public lands for agricultural purposes. I ask that the resolutions may be printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COBB. The resolutions relate to a donation of the public lands, as I understand, and I hope they will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection. The resolutions were so referred.

SUSPENSION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. HUGHES asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be directed to report to the House the amount of work now done on the unpublished volumes of the Pacific railroad surveys, and the cost thereof, and how many volumes are yet unfinished, and the probable cost of printing the same; and to suspend the printing thereof until otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, objected.

JOHN W. WOLCOTT.

Mr. HUGHES asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Whereas, The record of the proceedings of the House, in the case of John W. Wolcott, a witness now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, does not show that said witness was imprisoned for refusing to testify in a matter wherein the House has jurisdiction to enforce the testimony of witnesses by attachment for contempt: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said John W. Wolcott, be, and he is hereby, released from said imprisonment.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it in order to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I then give notice that when the call shall have been completed, I will move to suspend the rules. I understand the grand jury have indicted this gentleman, and I think the House ought to pass a resolution turning him over to the courts to be tried.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I offer, at the request of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY,] a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. KELSEY. Has previous notice been given of that bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gave notice.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, one gentleman could not give notice of the intention of any other gentleman to introduce a bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Well, sir, no one objects.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Not until the order of the House has been executed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ETC., AT PEORIA.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a bill making an appropriation to erect a building suitable for a court-house, post office, and custom-house, at the city of Peoria; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the granting of change of venue in cases pending for trial in the circuit and district courts of the United States, under such restrictions as may be fixed by law; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

FORT RIPLEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House if any portion of the military reservation at Fort Ripley, in Minnesota, has been sold; and if sold, to state at what price the same was sold, and to whom; and if such sale has been confirmed; and if not confirmed, if any reason exists which will prevent the confirmation of the same.

EXECUTIVE APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the heads of the Executive Departments be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to communicate to this House, at as early day as possible, the names of all persons appointed to office since the 4th of March, A. D. 1853, who may be connected officially or otherwise with their respective Departments, and the names of such persons, and their actual, bona fide place of residence at the dates of their said appointments.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, objected.

TERRA JAPONICA.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for the purpose of obtaining a supply of the seeds and cuttings of the terra japonica for cultivation in this country.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ILLINOIS AND INDIANA.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to furnish to this House a statement showing the amount of public lands in the States of Illinois and Indiana subject to entry at the sum of $1 25 per acre, or at any less price.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled an "Act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands," approved March 2, 1855; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. COBB. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; it belongs to that committee.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. It does not ask for any land.

Mr. COBB. If the bill be read, members will see it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I hope it will be read, for the gentleman will then see it ought to take the direction I propose to give it.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I object to the reading of the bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I understand that my colleague withdraws his objection to the bill which I introduced a few minutes ago. I am inclined to think that it is a bill we can agree on.

Mr. KEITT. What is the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. A bill to admit Kansas.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I object to going back.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 79.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Dean were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 59.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at twenty minutes to four, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. N. HANKS.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal will be read.

Mr. BIGLER. I learn from the Secretary that the Journal is not completed, in consequence of our night session. It has been found impossible to have it properly prepared; and I move, therefore, that by common consent the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. If desirable, it can be read hereafter, after the Presiding Officer shall have had a fair opportunity to examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By general consent the reading of the Journal may be dispensed with. The Chair hears no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, copies of all instructions from that Department to the United States marshal for the district of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FITCH rose subsequently, and said: Some information was received, I believe, from the Secretary of the Interior, a short time since, in response to a call made by the Senate on my motion. It is the last or written clause of the instructions only which refers to the resolution I offered. I understand that the report of the Secretary was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I desire the following resolution to take the same course:

Resolved, That all the expenses of holding United States courts in the Territory of Utah, during the continuance of the present disturbance therein, shall be chargeable to the United States, under the limitations contained in existing laws in respect to fees, and payable out of the judiciary fund: Provided, That upon the restoration of peace in said Territory, the expenses of said courts, while exercising jurisdiction under the territorial laws, shall be chargeable to the Territory, or to the proper counties therein, as in other Territories.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a joint resolution.

Mr. FITCH. I propose to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they can report a joint resolution.

Mr. STUART. I suggest that the Senator put his proposition in the shape of a resolution of inquiry. A resolution in this form, sent to the committee, I think would be valueless.

Mr. FITCH. I have no objection to putting it in that form, and probably it would be the better course. It anticipates a joint resolution of a somewhat similar character from the Committee on the Judiciary. Perhaps it had better be so shaped as to make it a resolution of inquiry as to the propriety of such a measure.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of defraying the expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah, during the continuance of the present disturbances therein, under the limitations contained in existing laws in respect to fees, out of the judiciary fund: Provided, That upon the restoration of peace in said Territory, the expenses of said courts, while exercising jurisdiction under the territorial laws, shall be chargeable to the Territory, or to the proper counties therein, as in other Territories.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the action of the Department in relation to the appropriation of five years' pay to the officers of the Navy in the late Republic of Texas; which, on motion of Mr. Houston, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARLAN presented a paper relating to the claim of Robert Hill to a certain tract of land in the Territory of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BARK ATTICA.

Mr. HAMLIN. If there be no further morning business, I ask the Senate to take up a bill which was reported by the Committee on Claims, for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the owners of the bark Attica the sum of $174 62, being the amount imposed on that vessel as tonnage duty by the collector of New York in the year 1855.

Mr. KING. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. HAMLIN. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury accompanies the bill, which contains all the facts.

Mr. KING. I ask that it may be read, that we may have some explanation or knowledge of the facts.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state to the Senator from New York the facts. The law provides a penalty in case the master of a vessel shall discharge his crew in a foreign country. In this case, the master sailed to Cuba or one of the other West India islands. The crew were in a mutinous condition. The American consul advised, under the state of things existing, that the crew should be discharged; and he so wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury. The master came home. He could not procure an American crew, as was required by law, and hence tonnage duties were imposed on him, not for any act of his, but from the state of facts arising from the mutinous condition of his crew. He came to New York; the matter was laid before the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury suggests that he has not the power, but that the money ought to be repaid to the person, as a case which was never contemplated by the spirit of the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does any Senator desire the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Several SENATORS. Oh no.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I made a motion yesterday that the Senate, hereafter, should meet at the hour of eleven o'clock. I wish to call up that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on taking up the following resolution:

Resolved, That after to-day the Senate will meet at eleven o'clock, and sit until five, p. m., and then take a recess of two hours, until the bill now before the Senate is disposed of.

Mr. HOUSTON. The latter part of that resolution is an amendment offered by some Senator, I presume. It is no part of my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think this subject had better be laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not desire, then, that that part shall remain in the resolution?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; I leave that to the Senate to determine.

Mr. BIGLER. With the permission of the Senator from Texas, I desire to state to him—and I make the statement with a great deal of pleasure—that I have learned this morning that an understanding has been, or is about to be, effected, by which the final vote on the Kansas question will be taken on Monday next. In that arrangement, the hours of the sessions, I understand, are also to be arranged; and I suggest to the Senator from Texas that he permit his resolution to lie over for the present.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that it lie over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be laid aside informally.

JAMES BAWDEN.

Mr. BIGLER. I now move, unless there be other morning business, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Kansas as a State.

Mr. STUART. I do not desire to interfere with that matter; but there is a small bill here which will not, I suppose, occupy more than five minutes. It is important to a constituent of mine. It is a bill for the relief of James Bawden, reported by me some days since from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER. I withdraw my motion, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Michigan to take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 194) for the relief of James Bawden was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SLIDELL. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. STUART. I can, perhaps, state the case to the Senator sooner than the report can be read. There was a large reservation at Eagle harbor, on Lake Superior, made by the Government, in the first place for a light-house, which covered a large number of acres. It has finally been reduced down to ten acres. It covered a preemption that embraced large improvements at the place. The bill proposes to still retain some four acres for the purpose of a light-house, and a highway from the land to the light-house, and to give the original occupant of the ground the right to enter the balance, some six and a quarter acres. He has a wharf upon it. That matter has been referred to the Treasury Department and the Light-House Board, and the Treasury Department concur in the propriety of the thing being done.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HALE. With the leave of the Senate, I desire to throw myself on their indulgence for a moment, to state a matter which may facilitate the business of the Senate, if Senators will be kind enough to give me their ear for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to make a statement. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HALE. Those friends with whom I act on this floor have had a consultation this morning for the purpose of avoiding such a scene as we had last night, and we have arrived at a conclusion which I have submitted to as many of the gentlemen on the other side as I could find, though I regret to see that the member of the Committee on Territories who has charge of the Kansas bill is not in his seat. I have reduced it to writing, so that there may be no caviling about it hereafter. We agree that the debate shall end, and the question be taken on Monday next; but if it shall appear to be necessary in the course of debate that the daily session be protracted beyond the usual hour in order to effect this, it may be done at such hour as we shall indicate on this side; that is, if we are not able, within the usual hours of session, to get in such speeches as we bona fide wish to put in, there may be an evening sitting, either by protraction of the session, or a recess, as may be agreed on. Every gentleman on the other side, to whom I have shown this proposition, has assented to it, and I have no doubt it will be carried out in good faith.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire to say on behalf of the Senators on this side of the Chamber, that so far as I have been able to ascertain their views there is a common acquiescence in the proposition. The understanding will be, therefore, that on Monday next we shall vote on this question fairly.

Mr. CLAY. I would suggest that some hour had better be designated; because it is known that there are several gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who are sick, who wish to vote, but cannot come here during the night. They will come here in the day.

Mr. HALE. I appreciate that suggestion, but I would suggest to the Senator that it is necessary to repose some confidence. We found it impracticable to go into every detail to be submitted. I will tell him there is an earnest and sincere purpose to carry out this arrangement in good faith, and it will be so carried out that the time will be fairly divided between the two sides.

Mr. GREEN. What is the proposition?

Mr. BIGLER. Let it be understood.

Mr. HALE. When I made the suggestion, I said I was sorry not to see the Senator from Missouri in his seat. We agree that the question shall be taken on Monday next; but if it shall appear to be necessary, in the course of debate, that the daily session be protracted beyond the usual hour in order to effect this, it may be done at such an hour as we shall indicate.

Mr. GREEN. But no vote to be taken at night.

Mr. HALE. No vote to be taken until Monday. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, I will say that while we were desirous to make this agreement explicit and plain, we found it impracticable to put every detail in writing.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly. All I wish to have understood on both sides is that the vote will be taken at an hour in the day when those who are invalids may safely come here.

Mr. HALE. Of course.

Mr. CLAY. Say before sundown, or sometime during the day; four o'clock, for example.

Mr. SLIDELL and others. That will do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say to gentlemen, on the other side, that the difficulty about fixing an hour was this: we supposed the debate might possibly close—we could not tell how long it would be—on Saturday, and that on Monday a portion of the day might be devoted to the several amendments proposed, in order to perfect the bill; and that being the case, it would be impossible to indicate at what exact hour the vote could be taken. Senators may rely upon it that there is no disposition, and will be none, on this side of the Chamber, to protract it into the evening, but to take the vote in time.

Mr. SLIDELL and others. That is enough.

Here the conversation ended.

Mr. GREEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to say a few words with reference to personal matters between myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. GREEN. Something unpleasant occurred last night. I thought I was right; doubtless he thought he was right. A mutual friend has informed me that he is prepared to do me justice, if I will withdraw what he understands as a threat against him. I do not desire to threaten any one. If I did so, I will withdraw it, and wait for any explanation he may see fit to make.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I regret, as I always do, that anything should occur in the Senate, in which I was a participant; that was unpleasant to myself or anybody here. We were last night engaged in a protracted session, and I came into the Senate under some wrong impression, I imagine, in regard to the course of the Senator from Missouri, and he supposed that I intended to be personal. I desire to say most distinctly that I meant no disrespectful personal allusion to the Senator from Missouri at all, and could have meant none; for, in common with all Senators here, I have the highest respect for him personally. If I did say anything more, it was misconstrued; and I only repeat that it was not intended to be disrespectful to him.

Mr. GREEN. It was with reference to questions of fact that the Senator was mistaken, as his own friends afterwards testified before the Senate last night. I thought he was mistaken at the time. I knew it, and I thought when he heard of his error, he would put his statement in a shape in which it would not be offensive to me. Simply to say that he intended no disrespect is not quite enough. If he will say he misunderstood, and therefore did not present it as I had presented it, it will be satisfactory; but, while he persists in his statement, to say that it is not offensive, is not satisfactory to me.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not remember what the offensive words were. I think the Senator and myself disagreed as to the words used.

Mr. GREEN. I will repeat them. ["No!" "No!"] I do not want any argument between us.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say that I have no unkind and disrespectful feelings; and I do not think anything was said by me last night at which the Senator, if he had understood it as I did, could have taken offense. I can only repeat that I intended nothing of the kind. It is right that I should say, that whilst I am always anxious to repair an injury if I have done one, I could not have done so if the Senator from Missouri had not, in the handsome manner in which he has done it, withdrawn what I was told was a threat.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Revolution, charters were granted to the colonies by the Crown. Since then, up to this time, the people of the States of the Union have made their constitutions for themselves. Now, for the first time since the Continental Congress declared the colonies free and independent States, the question is raised of the right of the people to adopt or reject the constitution which is to create them a State qualified to come into the Union, one of the equal States of our Confederacy.

Kansas, brought to the door of the Senate for the purpose of having the Lecompton constitution imposed upon her people by the authority of an act of Congress, presents that question to us.

Benjamin Franklin, contemplating his country when her independence had been acknowledged and the Republic was established, is said to have expressed the wish that he might be permitted to look upon this country after the lapse of a hundred years. If the shade of that venerable man could appear here, and listen to these debates upon the proposition to add a new State from beyond the Mississippi to the Union, he would hear from the Government side calls for more troops, and arguments to show the necessity of an increase of the standing Army; he would hear that the people of the State proposed to be added to the Union are a factious people; that they claim the right to vote on the adoption of their constitution; to have the charter that defines their rights and their form of government submitted by the convention that made it to themselves, and to express their opinion of it; that in this new State the people are unwilling to have slavery established as one of their institutions; that, although the President declares the constitution prepared for them by the Lecompton convention to be a good one, they contumaciously reply that it is not their constitution; that they complain of fraud and corruption in the officials appointed and sustained by the central Government; that they refuse to pay the taxes levied by the Legislature, alleging that they had no voice in its election, and were not represented in it; that they agitate and annoy the Government and disturb the quiet of the country by their turbulent and disorderly conduct; that they remonstrate against stuffed ballot-boxes, spurious votes, forged certificates, and false returns at their elections, and demand of the Government investigation and punishment of these offenses; that they insist upon the right to decide for themselves the character of their State institutions, and refuse to accept the constitution which the Government offers to them; that they complain of the intrusion of regular troops belonging to the standing Army of the Federal Government, sent to maintain law and order in their Territory; that they are seditious; that they are rebels; that they have been permitted to occupy the attention of the Government and the country too long; that they must have a local government instituted over them by Congress, and be subdued by the Army. He would hear some uncertain and mystical suggestions that the people of the State, when reduced to order, might possibly, at some future time, be allowed to alter their obnoxious constitution in some legal manner. I think, after listening so far, Franklin would inquire, "is this the American Congress, and have you established a consolidated Government? Or is this the British Parliament, and have the United States been reunited to the Crown?" Upon being told that this is one of the Chambers of the American Congress, that the United States are still an independent nation, and that the words of the Federal Constitution remain unchanged, he would say, "then these honorable gentlemen, who occupy the seats of legislators here, have not inherited the republicanism of my day and generation; this is not the democracy that thundered at Bunker Hill, at Saratoga, and at Yorktown, and rang out their battle-cry of liberty and independence through all the colonies until the royal charters were abolished, and the right of the people to institute their forms of government and to make their constitutions for themselves was acknowledged."

Mr. President, the convention held at Lecompton framed a State constitution for Kansas, and refused to submit it to the people.

The convention submitted a single provision of the constitution to the people—the question whether slaves might hereafter be imported or brought into the State; and required, as a preliminary to the right of any elector to vote for or against this single partial provision on the subject of slavery, that he should first vote for the obnoxious constitution, which contained, separate and distinct from the provision submitted, an article perpetuating slavery in the State of Kansas in the persons of those now held as slaves in the Territory, and in their posterity forever.

A very large majority of the people were opposed to the obnoxious constitution, and refused to vote for it. Without voting for the constitution, no elector could vote for or against the single provision submitted.

It is notorious that the Lecompton convention knew the constitution it framed was repugnant to the sentiments, the opinions, and the consciences of a large majority of the people; that they condemned the instrument and the institution of slavery which it proposed to establish and perpetuate among them.

It is known to every Senator and to every Representative in Congress that a very large majority of all the qualified voters in Kansas have expressed their opinion against the Lecompton constitution at an election held under the authority of an act of their Territorial Legislature on the 4th day of January last, when the constitution was submitted, and the people rejected it by their votes.

This is the case of Kansas, as presented to the Senate by the majority of the Committee on Territories in their report and bill, which assumed that the first Territorial Legislature in Kansas was fairly and legally elected by the people, and organized, and that the Lecompton convention was fairly elected by the people in pursuance of the law of their Territorial Legislature.

In the case thus made by the majority of the committee, the fundamental question of the right of the people of a Territory to adopt for themselves the constitution which creates them a State, preparatory to admission into the Union, is presented. The sovereign right of the people is denied, and the sovereign right of a convention of delegates affirmed. The question raised in the case of Kansas is not a question for Kansas alone. It is for every Territory hereafter to be organized, and for every Territory hereafter to be admitted into the Union, as well as for Kansas. It is a question of constitutional and political right of the first magnitude. Indeed, it is the question of the inherent sovereignty of the people, vital to the people inhabiting the territory now belonging to the United States, and to all which may hereafter be acquired or come within our ever-expanding borders.

It is no less vital to the people of every State now in the Union, because it is the question where sovereignty resides, whether in representatives and representative bodies, in the Federal Government, or in the people. Our existence as a republican Government rests upon the principle involved in this question.

When the sovereignty of the people is subverted or successfully denied by any representative body, or by any other power, the rights and the liberties of the people are in the hands and at the mercy of that power. The Government of the United States, inaugurated upon the principles of the Revolution of 1776, recognized the sovereignty of the States, and the sovereign right of the people of the States to frame and adopt their forms of government, and to make and adopt their constitutions. It is a constitutional right of the people of a State, essential to its equality as one of the States of the Union, and necessary to the republican character of its constitution—a right never before denied or questioned. If those who now, in the case of the people of Kansas, deny this right, had, before the day of election in November, 1856, only whispered their design to subvert this sovereign right of the people, the Administration which is now pressing upon Congress the proposition to subvert the rights of the people of Kansas, would never have come into power to make such a question. No State has ever been brought into the Union where it was denied, questioned, or doubted, that the people of the State to be admitted approved their constitution. The enabling acts, the forms of law, and the modes of proceeding on the part of the people preparatory to their admission as States into the Union, have widely varied. I do not know that they have been exactly alike in the cases of any two States. But observance of the vital principle that all just government derives its authority from the consent of the governed, has been the one essential thing required in all. Are the President and Congress prepared to go back to the reign of the Georges in England, and assume the prerogatives of the Crown and the unlimited power of Parliament? And are they ready to renew in this country the controversies of those days between the prerogative and power of the central Government, and the constitutional power and political rights of the people—questions supposed to have been forever settled in America by the success of the Revolution, and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States? Whatever the President may be willing to do, is Congress prepared to deny the absolute and sovereign right of the people of a new State to form and adopt their own constitution? And is Congress prepared to assume the sovereign power to impose a constitution upon the people of a new State? Congress has the power to admit new States into the Union, but it has not the constitutional power to make a constitution for a State, or to adopt one made by others, and impose it upon the people of a State.

The President possesses no such constitutional power, and cannot be invested with such authority by an act of Congress. The President, who recommends such a measure to Congress, and proposes to enforce such an act upon the unwilling people of a State, is false to the high trust reposed in him by the people of all the States in the Union. It is a subversion of the rights of the States. It is consolidation. When the Federal Government shall exercise the power to impose a constitution upon the people of a State, who shall say what limitations to its power remain; what shall stay its arbitrary will; and how and where shall its tyranny be arrested? But, Mr. President, monstrous and utterly indefensible as the proposition to bring Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution stands upon the case as made by the majority of the committee, dark colors are yet to be added to the true picture of violence to the constitutional principles of republican government, and of outrage against the rights of the people of Kansas.

The report of the majority of the committee does not state the facts of the case correctly. The assumption that the first Territorial Legislature of Kansas was fairly elected, and valid in law, is contradicted by record evidence. The assumption that the Lecompton convention was fairly elected by the people of Kansas, is contradicted by evidence that can be neither contradicted nor controverted. Upon these two assumptions the majority of the committee maintain the sovereignty of a convention, and deny the sovereignty of the people.

The history of Kansas, from the beginning to the end of it, is one of fraud and violence, of wrong and outrage. Although the majority here have refused to authorize any inquiry or investigation that would bring the facts officially before the Senate, yet they are notorious to the whole country, and they cannot be excluded from our sight. The act of Congress that organized the Territory repealed the eighth section of the act for the admission of Missouri into the Union, commonly called the Missouri compromise law—a law which excluded slavery from the Territory of Kansas. This was a breach of that faith and honor among men which statutes can neither create nor destroy; a breach of that faith and honor between communities which is their only strong bond of peace and friendship. Successive statutes are monuments that mark the existence and decay of faith and honor in the men who make them, and in the nations which accept them.

Under a charter for a territorial government, instituted by such a statute, the President appointed a Governor, Secretary, judges, marshals, and other officers, and the day was appointed for an election of members of a Legislature by the people, which would complete the organization of their territorial government. As the time for the election of members of the Legislature approached, four thousand nine hundred armed men, not residing in Kansas, organized for that purpose by secret lodges in the State of Missouri, passed over from that State into the Territory of Kansas, and on the day fixed for the election of the first Territorial Legislature, seized, by force, the control at most of the precincts in the Territory, displaced by violence the judges of the election, took possession of the ballot-boxes, and excluding the citizens residing in Kansas from the polls, proceeded to stuff the ballot-boxes, and in that way to designate and appoint persons to be legislators for Kansas. Incontrovertible evidence of these facts stands on record in the proceedings of the House of Representatives of the last Congress.

The invasion from Missouri was successful and complete, and the invaders, having accomplished their purpose, returned in organized bands to Missouri. The persons thus created legislators for Kansas, assembled, organized, and, assuming to be the Legislature, proceeded to pass laws for the government of the Territory, and to levy taxes upon the people. Their enactments were arbitrary and oppressive, designed to drive the people from the settlements they had made, and compel them to abandon the Territory. The people of Kansas denied the authority of this Legislature. In an evil hour, the President of the United States recognized this usurpation as the government of Kansas, and large bodies of Federal troops have been stationed in the Territory to overawe the people by their presence and to enforce the authority thus nefariously imposed upon them.

The call for the Lecompton convention was made by this usurpation, and upon its submission to the people less than twenty-three hundred persons responded. The large majority of the people denied its authority and refused to vote on the call for the convention, or at the subsequent election for delegates. Sufficient reasons existed for their refusal to vote; they would not acknowledge the authority of the usurpation. For the election of delegates, an act for the registry of voters had been passed, and the people in many of the counties were disfranchised by the omission on the part of the registry officers to register the voters. In these counties no places were appointed for holding the elections, and none could be held, and no delegates could be elected. In the counties where registries were made, they were partial, omitting large numbers of the qualified voters. The people of the Territory reasonably apprehended that, without regard to the number of votes which might be deposited in the ballot-boxes by the electors, the inspectors and returning officers of the election would, by false certificates, return, as elected, men for their own purposes, and not the men who would receive the votes of the electors.

The origin and proceedings of the territorial authorities fully justified this apprehension. At the election under their authority in October last, to continue the Missouri usurpation, in the election of a new Legislature, although the original invaders did not reappear, sixteen hundred spurious and fictitious votes were returned by the inspectors of election upon false certificates, from a single poll, the Oxford precinct, in Johnson county. One of the officers of the election at the Oxford precinct—the very man, it is said, who manufactured the false certificate returning the sixteen hundred fraudulent votes—was one of the secretaries of the Lecompton convention. One thousand fraudulent votes at the same election were returned from McGee county, and more or less from various precincts, sufficient to decide the elections without regard to the votes of the electors. The returns of the election were in accordance with the wishes of the usurpation, and not in accordance with the votes of the electors. President Buchanan, with the concurrence of his Cabinet, in their official instructions to Governor Walker gave express and positive assurances to the people of Kansas that the constitution, preparatory to their becoming a State, should be submitted to a fair vote of the people, to be adopted or rejected by them.

Governor Walker, in his official communications to the people, repeated and affirmed these assurances. The candidates proposed for delegates to the Lecompton convention—afterwards returned as delegates—before the election voluntarily pledged themselves to the public, verbally and in writing, that the constitution the convention might frame for Kansas should be submitted to a vote of the people. The Governor of the Territory, invested with authority by the President of the United States, proclaimed to the people of Kansas that at an election, to be held with security against fraud or violence at the polls, and against false certificates by the returning officers, a fair opportunity should be afforded to all the qualified voters to vote; and that a majority of the votes of the people should determine the adoption or rejection of the constitution; that his official reports to the President and Congress, and his action for or against the constitution should be governed by the vote of the majority at such an election. Governor Walker adhered to his declarations; he rejected the false certificates returning the spurious and fictitious votes in Johnson and McGee counties for members of the Legislature, and persisted in requiring that the constitution of the Lecompton convention should be submitted to a vote of the people. For this he fell under the displeasure of the President, and repaired to Washington to make explanations and represent the condition of affairs in the Territory. He failed to satisfy the President and his Cabinet, or to induce them to fulfill the assurances which had been given to the people of Kansas, that they should have an opportunity to vote on the adoption of their State constitution. Governor Walker is reported to have said that he went with the Administration to the gates of the penitentiary in this business, and he would go no further. He had left the Territory; he declined to return to it, and resigned his commission.

Secretary Stanton, who went to the Territory by the appointment and as a friend of President Buchanan, became acting Governor by the resignation of Governor Walker. Upon assuming the executive power, Mr. Stanton refused to sustain the frauds by which the usurpation designed to perpetuate its power, and persisted, as Governor Walker had done, in requiring that the constitution of the Lecompton convention should be submitted, for adoption or rejection, to a vote of the people; whereupon, he was summarily removed by the President, and General Denver, a bureau officer of the Administration in Washington, was appointed, first Secretary and then Governor. It is this last Governor of Kansas, General Denver, who has certified the votes of the people of Kansas at the election authorized by the law of their new Territorial Legislature, and held on the 4th day of January last, in which the vote of the people is nearly unanimous, and the majority more than ten thousand against the Lecompton constitution. The Lecompton constitution is not the constitution of the people of Kansas. It is an instrument of the Lecompton convention and the Federal Administration, and is stained with false pretenses and fraud from the beginning to the end. To impose this instrument upon the people of Kansas as their constitution, by an act of Congress, would outrage justice and truth. It would be a violation of the Federal Constitution by the exercise of power neither granted to the Federal Government nor remotely hinted at in the Constitution. It would be an act of tyranny. It is a mockery of State sovereignty, in the report of the majority of the Committee on Territories, to call the proposition they make to the Senate "An act for the admission of the State of Kansas."

The question is not that of the admission of Kansas; an act of admission implies, at the least, the concurrence of the party to be admitted. The proposition before the Senate, whatever may be the name and style given by the majority of the Committee on Territories to their bill, is no question of the admission of Kansas. It is the monstrous proposition to impose upon the people of the Territory of Kansas a constitution and form of government known to be obnoxious to a very large majority of that people, accompanied by every indication on the part of the Federal Administration of a disposition to compel the submission of the people of the State by the power of the Federal Government. To call such attempted coercion an admission of the State of Kansas, is to deride the sovereignty of the people of the State. I repeat, this is no question of the admission of a State. It is one of a series of acts in the scheme conceived by the nullifiers who have obtained thorough control of the organization of the Democratic party, to change the Constitution of the United States by the judicial construction and decisions of the Federal courts, and to subvert our free form of government. Whether a settled plan and a combination exist to provoke disturbances with a view to a dissolution of the Union, time will fully disclose. There should be no fear of the full development of any such scheme, no matter by whom the idea may be entertained, and no matter who may be concerned in it. The American citizen who would fear it has little of the spirit which animated the men who fought the battles of the Revolution, and established the independence, the liberties, and the union of our common country.

The wild schemes of men long accustomed to wield the power of a disciplined party organization are not always guided by reason. To inquire into the desperate conceits of mad ambition, and to direct the public attention to them, is to dissipate them. The Hartford convention, held under the auspices of the Federal party, was suspected of entertaining the idea of dissolving the Union in certain contingencies. This suspicion, whether well or ill founded, excited the jealousy of all the friends of this country. It exasperated the prejudices and hostility of the Republicans of that day, and completed the full weight of accusation against the Federal party, already loaded with the alien law, the sedition act, the stamp act, the midnight judges, and the standing Army. The power of that once proud and patriotic party, which, at an early day, had borne the heat and burden of the political contest that adopted the Constitution and established the Union of the States, gave way, and was destroyed forever. The word "Federal," as the name of a party, became so odious in the popular ear that no party, for a great many years, has claimed, or would accept it. The Nashville convention, held under the auspices of the Democratic party, at a more recent day, flaunted its proclamations and purposes of a dissolution of the Union; but the Nashville convention was believed to be a humbug. I remember to have heard a distinguished citizen of Tennessee, at the time, speak of that body. He said that but very few of the citizens of Tennessee had anything to do with it; its members were mostly from a distance, and strangers in that State; "and," said he, "if the convention should do any act by which the people of Tennessee should come to believe it menaced the safety of the Union, it would become so weak that its members could be driven out of the city of Nashville by the women of that town with no other weapons than their broomsticks." This convention, although held only eight years ago, has less lodgment in the memory of the country than the Hartford convention, which was held more than forty years ago.

All remember the abortive treason of Burr; and the movements for nullification in South Carolina, in 1832, dissipated by the pen of General Jackson, whose proclamation at the time invoked a demonstration of devotion to the Union from the people of every one of the United States.

Recollections of the conventions at Hartford and at Nashville remind us that the idea of dissolving the Union has been imputed to some and entertained by others in this country. I have never believed that the people of any State of the Union favored it; although it has become too common to talk of it in the Halls of Congress, and to pass resolutions on that subject in party conventions and State Legislatures.

For the purpose of extending slavery into Kansas, a great wrong has been committed against the principles of republican government, and against the rights of the people of that Territory. Let the Federal Government retrace its steps; restore the Administration to the principles and practices of Washington and Jefferson; abandon the Lecompton constitution; withdraw the troops from Kansas; permit the people to make a constitution for themselves; admit the State into the Union as every other State has been admitted, in the constitutional manner in which her people desire to come—and the wrong which has been done, great as it is, may be forgiven. The country would be at peace; and, in rejoicing over the return of the Government to reason, might forget the past.

Persist in accomplishing the object for which so much has been ventured by the present Administration and the one which last preceded it—attempt to force the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas by the authority of an act of Congress, and the power of the Federal Army—and you will have insubordination, resistance, bloodshed, civil war. The people of Kansas will never consent to have slavery established among them; they will never accept the Lecompton constitution; they have already rejected it. In such an issue of blood between the Federal Army and the people of Kansas, the Government will be wrong, and the people of Kansas will be right. Will the people of the States remain spectators of the conflict? They will not. The people of Kansas are the countrymen and the kindred of the people of the States. Your law opening the Territory for settlement invited them to go there. Let the Federal Army spill American blood in Kansas, and you kindle a fire which the Federal Government and its Army cannot extinguish.

Who, Mr. President, is responsible for the long series of wrongs out of which these troubles come? And who can be held accountable to the country for pernicious acts occurring during so large a space of time, performed in so many places, and participated in by so many and various persons, for two successive Administrations of the Government?

Plan, system, design, moving and directing the action of all the varied agencies to a common end and object, are now plainly visible, from the act repealing the Missouri compromise to the bill before us, which proposes to impose the slave constitution of the Lecompton convention upon the people of Kansas.

The act of the Congress that repealed the Missouri compromise; the course of President Pierce, stimulated to be a candidate for renomination, and persuaded to rely upon the authors of this scheme for his success; the institution of the blue lodges in the State of Missouri; the resignation of office by the President of this Senate, who went straight from the Capitol in Washington to organize in those lodges, on the borders of Missouri, the armed invasion of Kansas; the march from that State of forty-nine hundred armed men, not residents of Kansas, organized in companies and detachments, to the places for holding the elections in that Territory; their seizure of the polls on the day of the election, and their appointment of legislators for Kansas by force and usurpation; the recognition of that usurpation as the government of Kansas by the Administration of General Pierce; the odious and oppressive laws they enacted; the indictments for treason against the usurpation in the Federal courts of the Territory, which were never tried; the total prostration of the rights of franchise in elections; the repeated removal of Governors who refused or failed to sustain the proceedings of the usurpers; the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott; the Lecompton convention and its constitution, with the faithless assurances to the people of Kansas that the constitution for their State should be submitted to their vote for adoption or rejection; the quartering large bodies of Federal troops in Kansas; the election of State officers ordered by the Lecompton convention, appointing the president of the convention (Mr. Calhoun) sole judge of the elections; the false and fraudulent returns of votes at that election, now and for nearly three months in the possession of Mr. Calhoun, and his refusal to decide who were elected until Congress shall have acted on the constitution; and the bill now here to impose the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas—are all parts of one continued plan and design. Those who have performed the various parts are responsible and accountable in their several degrees for what they have done; but they have been mere agencies of the power that controlled and directed their action. That power is the national organization of the Democratic party, and it is responsible for the long series of outrage, and for the great wrong which the bill before us proposes to consummate. The organization of the Democratic party has fallen irretrievably under the control of nullifiers and slave propagandists, many of whom, in all the States, but especially in the slave States, were, until very recently, the open enemies of the Democratic party, virulent denouncers of General Jackson and the measures of his administration; men who have not now, and never did have, a drop of Democratic blood in their veins. The organization of the Democratic party, controlled by the counsels of such advisers, has abandoned its principles and its trust. Public meetings and conventions of veteran Democrats remonstrate in vain. Why is there any apprehension that the Lecompton constitution will be adopted by Congress, and the attempt be made to force it upon the people of Kansas? Many of the Democratic members of the Senate and House of Representatives abhor the Lecompton constitution and detest its frauds.

Is there a man in or out of Congress who doubts for a moment that the Lecompton constitution would be rejected by Congress if the Democratic party did not demand its adoption? The severest discipline of party, the most indecent dispensation of executive patronage, are made use of to influence the action and control the independence of Congress.

In this dark hour, when the Republic is in danger, I hail the coming day of emancipation from servile obedience to party, heralded in this Chamber by the independence of the distinguished and fearless Senators on the Democratic side of the Senate from Illinois, from Michigan, and from California, upon whose limbs the bands of the Democratic party that would bind them to Lecompton are like the green withes of Deliah upon the limbs of the unshorn Samson. I hail, too, the hosts of thousands and tens of thousands of honest Democrats, who, all over the country, at this moment are renouncing the long-cherished party name of Democrat because it has become tainted with treason to the rights of the people, and are rallying under anti-Lecompton banners to resist the Administration and the faithless organization of the Democratic party. Let us all be anti-Lecompton men; let us all be Republicans; let us fraternize and overcome the enemies of public liberty.

The Whig party is gone forever, because, in the hour of its responsibility, it failed in the courage and firmness required for the high trust committed to its charge.

Noble as have been the achievements of the Democratic party while it adhered to its principles; when it has become faithless to the rights and liberties of the people its organization must be dissolved.

The honest Democracy of the country—its real Democracy—buried deep the name of the Federal party. They will consign the tainted party name of Democrat to the same grave; and they will make the grave deep and large enough to hold all the treason that dare show itself within the boundaries of the Union.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not suppose, Mr. President, after the exhibition we have just had, in which the history of Federalism, the Hartford convention, and "modern Democracy," are so singularly mixed up with "border ruffianism" and the doings in Kansas, that any effort on this side of the Chamber, without a revelation from heaven itself, could produce the slightest impression on the mind of the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. KING,] or those who think with him. If apology were needed for speaking upon so trite a subject, and one on which speaking is so unprofitable for myself, it would be found in the fact that from the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska measure to the present time, neither upon that, nor upon any of the kindred measures legitimately flowing from it, have I ever opened my lips in the Senate. Nor would I do so now, but for the fact that some little pains are being taken by persons in my own State to misrepresent me there, and to say that I, with other Democrats, was going off on this question of Kansas.

Mr. President, it was my intention, after having heard the speech of the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] on this question, to have reviewed, briefly at least, what I considered a most extraordinary production; but during my absence from this body I find it has been done so ably and so thoroughly by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] that any effort of mine would but weaken the effect of what they have said, or mar its beauty; but I must be permitted to remark, that if I were called upon to designate what speech I have heard since I have occupied a seat on this floor, which was most calculated to awaken and to cherish sectional excitement, and to produce discord throughout this Confederacy, I should have to point to the speech of the honorable Senator from New York. If it was not expressly designed for this, if it was not cunningly designed for it, it is exceedingly well calculated for it. It is not a broad, large, comprehensive view of facts, argued out to their legitimate conclusions and logical deductions without regard to where they may lead; but it is a cunning scheme of fact and error—a web skillfully devised to bolster up the preconclusion at which the Senator's mind and the Senator's party had already arrived.

But, sir, the feature that struck me as most disagreeable in listening to the honorable Senator was the perfect barrenness of the whole production, the want of light and life throughout. It reminded me of the cold northern blasts, telling of their icy origin. It was like the treacherous guide to the traveler, which takes us through a vast desert; and, after pointing us to every error on the road, leaves us without a spark of light to emerge from it. Nothing but the subjugation of the southern States seemed to be the conclusions of the honorable Senator's efforts. And he told us, in a manner half complaisant and half triumphant, in effect, that if we submitted gracefully to our fate, we might, perhaps, die easily, but die we should. Sir, it was altogether a remarkable production; and in what I say of that honorable Senator I speak with great respect for him personally, for I have no reason to speak otherwise of him; but I must say of his speech, that whatever in it was new, in my judgment was not true; and whatever in it was true was not new. It was not an effort of statesmanship, such as he usually treats this body to; but it hovered more upon the regions of special pleading. It was my purpose, on hearing it, briefly to express my own impressions, hastily conceived at the time. I suppose the manner of its delivery produced its impression, but a subsequent reading of the production has confirmed it, and with these remarks I leave it.

I expect, Mr. President, in the few remarks I shall make, to confine myself to the question before the Senate. The 23d day of January, 1854, I think, inaugurated a period of political excitement throughout a large portion of this Confederacy, which, still progressing and undetermined, has thus far been characterized by such bitterness, such a spirit of rancor toward the southern States of the Confederacy, as, in the judgment of judicious men everywhere, not only to weaken the bonds of our social, but to have a direct tendency to destroy the bonds of our political, Union. On that day the obliteration of the Missouri compromise line, so called, was made a feature of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. A great national wrong had been done to the southern portion of this Confederacy by the act admitting Missouri into the Union in 1820, the eighth section of which provided for the prohibition of involuntary servitude, except for crime; or, in other words, the exclusion of southern institutions from all that portion of the territory acquired by the treaty with France in 1803, which lay north of 36° 30'.

When we were called upon to form a government for this Territory, the South demanded, as a recognition of her political equality, the repeal of a measure, the unconstitutionality and injustice of which time had made as apparent to her judgment as it was offensive to her pride. Standing where she has ever stood, and where I trust she will always be found, by the Constitution, she demanded nothing from the fraternal feeling, from the forbearance of her sister States; but she did demand, as a recognition of the political equality of the States, the right to go with her property into the common domain of the Confederacy. Upon this demand we went before the country; and after a heated and excited contest, the offensive statute was wiped from the statute-book. This was followed by such a political storm throughout the non-slaveholding States, as none but a free government, resting upon the enlightened judgment of a free people, can ever withstand.

Under the guidance of leaders, in many instances as reckless and ambitious as they were able, every element of political discord and sectional strife was invoked and brought into activity; and while the bench, the bar, the hustings, and the press, entered upon a crusade against the people of the southern States, the pulpit, no less impious than the rest, invoked upon them the curses and denunciations of Heaven itself. But, sir, the South threw herself into the contest; she knew her rights, and determined to maintain them. She appealed to the enlightened judgment of the people, and there she met a vindication as unequivocal as it was triumphant—a vindication which has since received the indorsement and support of the highest tribunal in the country.

In addition to the repeal of the eighth section of the Missouri act, the Kansas-Nebraska bill contained a clause which, in my judgment, was as unequivocal as it was totally and absolutely unnecessary; but which has been facetiously termed a "stump speech injected into the bill," declaring that it was the true and bona fide intent and meaning of the bill not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. I say, I deemed this perfectly unnecessary at the time, but it may perhaps aid us in interpreting the whole measure. Under this great enabling act, (for it was nothing more than an enabling act authorizing the people of Kansas and Nebraska to form their State governments,) the people of Kansas did enter upon the formation of a State government, following the legitimate precedents of their country. They held elections, chose their members of the General Assembly, sent their Delegate to Congress, and then, proceeding in the legitimate steps pointed out by the history of their country, their Legislature passed an act for taking the sense of the people for calling a convention to form a State constitution at the general election to be held in October, 1856. The sense of the people was taken at the time designated, and their decision was in favor of calling a convention.

In obedience to this indication of the will of the people, the Territorial Legislature passed an act on the 27th of February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates on the third Monday of June, to form a State convention; and under this act, which was singularly fair and just, providing, as it did, for the registration of every legal voter within the Territory, for the purpose of excluding outside influence, members of the convention were elected, and nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one qualified voters were registered. In conformity to the provisions of this act, the delegates to form a State constitution were legally elected in June, 1857. They assembled at Lecompton, and proceeded legitimately to perform the duty for which they had assembled—the formation of a State constitution—and terminated their labors and adjourned on the 7th of November, 1857.

The honorable Senator from New York, who last addressed the Senate, [Mr. KING,] has chosen to say that every one of those acts which I have recited is characterized by illegality. I deny it in toto. I affirm—and I have no doubt whatever that it will be sustained by the voice of the American people—that neither one of those acts is tainted with illegality. That there may have been illegal voting, I will not deny; but that the acts of the bona fide voters in these elections are to be affected by the illegality of others, I deny.

The convention, justly regarding the question of slavery as the lion in the path of the progress of Kansas, as the question which had created all the difficulty, turmoil, and civil war in Kansas, provided—though I by no means acknowledge that the convention was bound to do so—for the submission of the slavery question to the popular vote; and, on the day so fixed, it was submitted to the people of Kansas; who, by their popular vote, did decide in favor of the constitution with the slavery clause.

I have thus far traced, step by step, the action of the people of Kansas, the bona fide, law-abiding people of Kansas in the formation of their State government, from the passage of the enabling act here in 1854, to the time when the President of the United States informs us that he has received a copy of a constitution from the president of the convention; and that she stands here to receive her robes of State sovereignty at our hands. In doing so, I have chosen to ignore and totally disregard all those violations of election laws which have been alleged; all acts of "border ruffianism," come from whatever quarter they may; because they can no more affect the bona fide legal acts, legally done by the people of Kansas, than can the illegal acts of your mobs tend to affect the legal action of your proper authorities.

I have also chosen to ignore and totally disregard the illegal assemblage at Topeka—a mob, an assemblage of people without the authority or the pretense of law, and in direct violation of, and in opposition to, the laws of their country. If the steps which I have narrated as the steps of the bona fide people of Kansas were legal and proper; to say that the acts of those Topeka people are illegal, is to characterize them by the mildest terms known to our language. I have chosen also to ignore the alleged violations of election laws. No great political change in the condition of any people, I presume, has or can ever take place without violations of law to some extent; but I do not conceive that such considerations affect this application of Kansas. We have no power to punish violations of the ballot-box in Kansas directly; and I trust that the Senate of the United States will never be called upon to resort to measures to do it indirectly.

Now, Mr. President, it is not denied that the Lecompton constitution is republican in form. It is not denied that the steps which I have traced have been legally taken. Why, then, should Kansas be rejected? The evils which must in my judgment inevitably flow from such rejection, may present themselves to my mind in an exaggerated form. I may misconceive the times; I may misapprehend the temper of the people to whose sense of right such a rejection would be an outrage; I may magnify the feeling of deep but silent scorn and indignation with which they now view this whole programme of opposition; and I may miscalculate the resort which they may take to correct the wrong which it contemplates; but if I do not, if I am not mistaken, then the rejection of the State of Kansas will be fraught with evils which it will require all of human wisdom here to avert.

I am aware that it is alleged that the South is pursuing an abstraction; that the majority of the people of Kansas are in favor of a free State; and that, when admitted, they will take the legitimate steps to let their power be felt. Sir, I admit the power of a majority; but that does not affect us, for we cannot ignore the great fact that the shib-boleth, the war-cry, which this party, warring against the South, have inscribed on their banner under which they are now rallying, is, "no more slave States to be admitted into the Union;" and that this is here this day receiving a practical test; and if Kansas shall be rejected, it will be because of the slavery clause in her constitution. Our opponents on this measure, invigorated by the temporary alliance of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] have assailed, and are assailing, the unanswerable arguments, as I conceive, of the Executive, with equal ingenuity and power; but if they were to rise, and speak with the lips of an angel, the South has too much at stake not to see the utter hollowness and want of truth of this opposition, not to feel that similar pretexts will ever be found when similar occasions may demand them.

Sir, the vital principle of the Kansas bill, non-intervention, was carefully considered by some of the purest and best men from every section of the country, and by some of the prominent men of its leading political parties. It was brought forward by the honorable Senator from Illinois, to whom it had been intrusted as chairman of the Committee on Territories; and throughout the three years' history, in which its enemies have so bitterly assailed it, so nobly and firmly has he stood forth as its champion, under all circumstances, at all times, and in all places, showing its right, wisdom, and justice, that he has been understood popularly to be its sole and exclusive author. So well had he borne himself in this intellectual fight, that he had carved out for himself a place in the hearts of his countrymen rarely accorded to a living public man. In this position he was nobly sustained by a united South, and by nearly every national Democrat in both Houses of Congress. He was sustained by the people in their conventions, in their Legislatures, and finally by the supreme judicial tribunal of the country itself. Thus did he stand then; but now, when the battle has been fought, and when the legitimate fruits of victory—the admission of a sovereign State into the Confederacy—are within our grasp, we see the honorable Senator, not only withdrawing himself from his old companions in arms, but, with a bitterness hitherto unlooked for, opposing them in gaining the legitimate fruits of their victory. In this extraordinary attitude, we see him surrounded by strange allies, the leaders of those with whom hitherto he has fought hand to hand in every phase of the fight; the leaders of those who have been the unrelenting enemies of the Kansas-Nebraska bill and himself; and who, failing in every agency of human evil, have invoked upon both the curse of Heaven itself. These are the allies with whom he is now associated. I trust the honorable Senator from Illinois will understand that, in reciting these facts, showing his position in this case, I do it in all kindness to himself. My past relations to him it is unnecessary to allude to to show that fact.

I concede that an attitude so extraordinary has only been assumed on the most conscientious convictions of right, though we are all liable to error; and his position, therefore, will not be readily surrendered. His efforts to sustain it are worthy of his fame; but depend upon it, sir, that like a strong man struggling in a morass, every effort that he may make will but show the unstable ground on which he stands. Those who may oppose this measure may succeed, or they may fail; Kansas may be admitted with her Lecompton constitution, and every element of her legitimate prosperity may be developed, or she may be rejected, and discord and civil war may continue, just as wisdom and prudence, or folly, may control their counsels; but whether we admit her, or whether we do not, whatever may be our efforts here, if I am right in my conclusions of the policy which governs the Opposition, there will be but one effort for the South.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me, as an act of kindness to himself, to say that his speech is a very interesting one, and I am listening to him with great pleasure; but I am sure he speaks so low that he is not doing justice to himself. If he will raise his voice a little louder, he will be heard more distinctly across the Chamber.

Mr. MALLORY. Thank you, sir. I cannot expect to overcome any noise that may be made in the Chamber, but I will endeavor to make myself heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART.) The Chair will endeavor to preserve as good order as can be maintained in the Chamber; and he submits to Senators that it is important, on account of the evident condition of the health of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MALLORY. I was going on to observe that whatever may be the effect of our efforts here from this vexed question of Kansas, the South, looking boldly out on the dangers which are before her, surveying with calm resolve her darkening political skies, will, in my judgment, take a new departure. She will be warned, nerved, invigorated, saddened perhaps, but un intimidated by the past. That must inevitably be the position of the South. She cannot ignore the fact that her enemies are gathering in strength around her; every day shows it; and whether the war-cry against her life be uttered by some wretched village fanatic, whose insane ravings and mad ambition rise no higher than to induce the slave to cut the master's throat, or whether it be uttered by some higher intellect here, in large and philosophic phrase, who, with the Union upon his lips, but with treason to its best interests nestling in his heart, tells us of the coming dawn which is to welcome the last footprint of African slavery upon this continent—whether the war-cry be uttered by the one or the other, it is opposition to her that forms their common bond of union. Nor, sir, let her any longer underrate the strength of her enemies. I have before me some notes, which are very brief, but they are instructive. I refer to a well-known book, recently published, in which political facts are collected. In speaking of the anti-slavery party, the author says:

"It first made its appearance in national politics in the presidential contest of 1840, when its ticket, with James G. Birney, of Michigan, as its candidate for the Presidency, and Francis J. Pickens, of Pennsylvania, as its vice presidential candidate, polled 7,000 votes. In 1844, with Mr. Birney again as its candidate, it polled 62,140 votes. In 1848, with Martin Van Buren as the presidential candidate of the Buffalo Convention, and Gerrit Smith as that of the more ultra anti-slavery men, it polled 296,232 votes. In 1852, with John P. Hale as its nominee for the Presidency, it polled 157,298 votes. In 1855, with John C. Fremont as its presidential candidate, it polled 1,341,812 votes."—Chase's Political Text Book, page 1.

With these facts before us, and they are succinctly summed up, I do not pretend to ignore the coming fate of the South. I do not pretend any disguise on the subject. Who doubts that he is yet to see one of this sectional party in your chair, sir; this Government administered by its behests, and the South in a doomed minority, still appealing to the Constitution? No man here can doubt it, and it is useless to preach otherwise. One by one the gallant and patriotic band of northern men, who, valuing the Union beyond the behests and commands of party, struggled here, struggled everywhere to maintain the common rights of their whole country, have been crushed out; and here, in this forum of equal States, we are yet to see the Constitution interpreted by that dreaded antagonism which is founded upon geographical distinctions alone.

The constitutional rights of the South, Mr. President, never have depended, and I trust they never will depend, on an equality of slave and free States in this Confederacy. If they depend on such an equality, their rights are gone now, for that day has passed. This political equality cannot be maintained. It can neither be maintained by expansion, by acquisition, nor by division of territory; for these are resources equally open to both parties. Had the South, in days gone by, been united on the expediency of adding Cuba, and, when the apple was ripe, plucked it, and made it a southern State—nay, sir, were she to adopt a wise policy now, and resolve to take it and talk about it afterwards—friendly and contiguous Canada, fast gravitating towards the North, would come in to establish northern political supremacy. Therefore, in my judgment, we must look inevitably to a preponderance of free States in this Confederacy. If I believed that the rights of the South were to depend on an equality, I would use every human effort of which I am capable to induce the South to go out of the Union to-morrow. It is folly for a man, when he sees his doom ahead of him, to wait hour after hour until the stern reality is upon him.

Much has been said by the Senator from New York, in his remarkable address, about the white man's occupying this continent on the doctrine of expansion; but I did expect to hear a gentleman, who is evidently a statesman, who always takes enlarged views—I did expect him, in this rhetorical, epigrammatic production of his, to define under what circumstances the white man was to occupy this continent. My friend from Virginia, I find on reading his speech, has referred to this part of the address of the Senator from New York, and leaves me but little to say; but on this doctrine of expansion, let me remark that the hour has come when judicious minds begin to doubt the propriety, the wisdom of the expansion on this continent of our Government, and judicious minds begin to doubt the applicability of our system of government to a widely-expanded territory. Sir, the surface of our territory now is more than double that of Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Turkey in Europe, Poland, Prussia, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, whose united populations exceed two hundred and fifty million. With a soil teeming with everything adapted for the usefulness of man, with a sparse population compelled to cultivate neighborly affections, with wealth almost at the command of every industrious man, with every inhabitant almost having stakes deeply driven into the soil, identified with the country, and making the laws which he himself is to administer, our Government has reflected more blessings on the human race than any other which the mind of man has ever conceived.

But let our country once be as populous as France, Belgium, or Prussia, and let trouble arise in a part of it distant from the seat of Government, and then see where the doctrine of expansion will lead you. Judicious minds, as I say already, point to San Francisco, ruled by a vigilance committee; to Utah, ruled by a priestly despotism; to Kansas, whose laws are enforced only at the point of the bayonet; to the large mobs in your cities, overawing the peaceable inhabitants, and going abroad unpunished; and to the powerful cries of "bread or blood," raised in open daylight by agrarians; and when this doctrine of expansion shall be carried out, and the elective franchise shall be given into the hands of men of this character, it will be a most fearful engine of wrong, as it has been heretofore a fruitful engine of right.

But, Mr. President, I will not digress on this subject longer; I desire to keep to the point before us, which is the question of the admission of Kansas. I will not go into all the objections, the technical objections which have been urged by gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber, because I think it will be fair to meet the objections of our friends on this side, and I will treat them as made in all fairness. I understand that the objections of the honorable Senator from Illinois, made in his opening speech immediately after the presentation of the President's annual message, have been surrendered one by one, or tacitly so, and that they are all now to be summed up in this: that the constitution framed at Lecompton was not submitted to the vote of the people, and that it does not reflect the will of the people of Kansas.

Who are the people of Kansas? The honorable Senator from New York, if I did not mistake him, the other day said the people meant the majority. I deny any such doctrine in this country. I deny that "the people" necessarily mean a majority, politically, or in any other sense. The only people of Kansas known to us are the law-abiding inhabitants thereof, who, under the shadow and by the power of law alone, have made their wishes and their wants known to us. They are the people of Kansas, whether they be the majority or the minority. States have conferred, and may at any time confer, their whole political power upon a minority. They may make disqualifications dependent upon the tenure of freehold estate, upon the payment of tax, upon militia duty, or upon the color of the skin; but whoever the State chooses to confer her political authority upon, and whoever she confers the right to exercise political power upon, are the people.

Politically speaking, they are the people. It is said the majority are to rule. Sir, as the people are represented in the House of Representatives, do a majority always rule there? Is not a quorum of the House sufficient to transact its business? And is not a majority of that quorum, who represent only a small number, comparatively, of the people of this country, enough? Do they not transact business? Do not some seventeen members of this body, a minority of it, transact its business? It is the political people we speak of; and when I speak of the people of Kansas, I refer alone to those people who come within the definition of law, and who, clothed with the mantle and authority of law, come here to make their manifestations known.

I do not pretend to investigate whether the convention which formed the Lecompton constitution was in fact elected by a minority or a majority of all the persons in Kansas who had a right to vote. That convention may, in fact, have been created by a less number than a majority—by a minority of the actual voters of Kansas; but if we suffer ourselves to go behind the proper exhibition of political power by the ballot-box, we may perhaps come upon the fact that those who refused to vote did so from no pure motive; they did so for the sole purpose of defeating the rights of those who did choose to exercise them; and I ask, where the elective franchise has been permitted at all, has it ever been heard that those who refrained from voting can thereby defeat the just rights of those who choose to exercise them? There is scarcely a town, scarcely a city, scarcely a State, in which elections occur, year after year, where you cannot point to candidates elected by a minority of the whole number of bona fide voters.

In reply to the objection that the constitution should have been submitted to the popular vote, I must say that it is becoming on those who claim this to show that any necessity existed for such a submission. The people of Kansas did not provide for it through their Legislature; they did not provide for it through their convention; and so far as Congress could, they expressly left it to the people of Kansas to decide for themselves; for they said they should be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution." That was the only limitation. There was nothing there, I apprehend, commanding them to submit their constitution to a vote of the people of Kansas. If, therefore, we are to keep our pledge to the people of Kansas, we cannot interfere with their rights; and it is to me exceedingly strange that those who set up this doctrine that the non-submission of the constitution is fatal to it, cannot put their hand on the authority for their doctrine. The precedents teach us that the people of Kansas have followed in the safe path of custom in refusing to submit their constitution. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. Thomson] has shown this in a close analysis of all the constitutions of the States of this Union; and there are but two constitutions that I know of, formed by the States of this Union, which were submitted by convention. His statement is as follows:

"The constitutions, now in force, of the following named States, were not submitted for ratification to the people, but adopted in convention:

"Vermont adopted her constitution July 4, 1793, in convention at Windsor. (Compiled Statutes of Vermont, page 15.)

"Connecticut, by convention, in 1818. (See Compilation of Statutes of Connecticut, 1854, pages 29 and 45.)

"Delaware, by convention, in 1831. (See Acts of 1831, page 49; and Revised Code, page 43.)

"Pennsylvania, by convention, in 1838, with a provision for future amendments to be ratified by the people. (See Purdon's Digest, page 17, section 10.)

"North Carolina adopted her present constitution in 1776, by convention; amendments in 1835.

"South Carolina, in 1790, by convention.

"Georgia, by convention, on the 23d of May, 1793.

"Alabama, in 1819, by convention under enabling act. (See Code of Alabama, page 26, section 5, page 28.)

"Mississippi, by convention, in 1817; and revised in like manner in 1832.

"Tennessee, by convention, in 1835.

"Kentucky, by convention, in 1799.

"Arkansas, by convention, without enabling act. (See Revised Statutes of Arkansas, pages 17-48.)

"Missouri, by convention, in 1820; and not submitted to the people.

"Illinois, by convention, in 1818; also appears not to have been submitted to the people.

"The following were compelled by statute to submit the constitutions framed by the conventions to the people:

"New York, constitution adopted in 1846. (Section 9, act of 1845, providing for the convention, required its ratification by the people.)

"New Jersey, act of 1844, approved February 23. Section 9 required its submission to the people. It was submitted and ratified in 1844.

"Maryland, formed in 1851, and ratified by the people, in accordance with previous act of Legislature. (See Act of 1849, chapter 346, section 8.)

"Virginia, formed in 1851. Act March 13, 1851, required its ratification by the people.

"Indiana, formed in 1851, ratified by the people, as required by the law authorizing the convention. (See Act of 1851, approved January 18, sections 14 and 15.) The section relative to the exclusion and colonization of negroes was submitted as a distinct proposition. (See Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 72.)

"Wisconsin, 1848. Section nine of schedule required its ratification by the people. (Revised Statutes, 1849.) In April, 1847, the constitution was defeated by over seven thousand majority. (Niles's Register, volume 72, page 114.) A new constitution was then formed, and the State admitted under it May 29, 1848.

"Iowa, formed in 1846. Previous laws of June 10, 1845, (over the veto of the Governor,) and of January 17, 1846, required ratification by the people.

"Ohio, the first constitution, formed under an enabling act of Congress, adopted 29th October, 1802, was not submitted to the people; that of the 10th March, 1857, was submitted to the people and approved by them.

"Louisiana, formed 1852. The constitution was, by previous enactment, required to be submitted, and was ratified by the people.

"Michigan, formed 1850. Act of March 9, 1850, required it to be submitted to the people. (See Laws of 1850, No. 78, section 6, on page 66.)

"Maine, formed in 1819, by convention, (page 432 Hickey's Constitution;) amendments submitted to the people 1834, 1837, 1839.

"New Hampshire, formed 1792. (See Compiled Statutes, page 15.) Approved by the two third vote of the people, and established by convention September 5, 1792.

"Rhode Island, formed 1842. Ratified by vote of the people, in pursuance of act of the Legislature.

"Massachusetts, formed 1780. Convention adjourned till constitution was ratified by two third vote.

"Texas, formed 1845. Submitted to and ratified by the people.

"The constitutions of the following States were submitted by conventions to the people, without their being required by law to do so:

"Florida, formed in 1838. Territorial act of 1838 (see Act of 1838, page 5) did not require the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress. The convention (see Digest of Laws of Florida, page 9) required ratification by the people.

"California, formed in 1849. Convention required the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress or legislative act to frame a constitution. (See Statutes of California, page 24, sections 5, 6, and 7.)"

But, sir, if this argument really had any strength in it, it comes, perhaps, with less force from the honorable Senator from Illinois, than it would from any of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. Anything which the distinguished Senator may say on this subject has peculiar pertinence and significance, because, from first to last, he has been identified with the measure. It will be remembered that, to expedite the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, the Senator from Illinois reported a bill from the Committee on Territories on the 17th of March, 1856, entitled, "A bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union, when they have the requisite population." After providing for a convention, this bill continues, and contains the following clause. It is the third section of the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention and ratified by the people, at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory on the United States, and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:"

This bill was not immediately acted upon; and on the 25th of June a substitute was introduced by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] of which he gave due notice. In the twelfth section of this amendment—for the substitute was introduced as an amendment—the precise words of the third section of the bill of the Senator from Illinois were retained, giving the power to the convention to adopt, and to the people of Kansas to ratify, the constitution. Here, then, were two bills before the Senate; one reported by the Senator from Illinois, containing a clause requiring ratification by the people; and the other introduced by the Senator from Georgia, incorporating this identical clause. Subsequently the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] introduced a substitute, ignoring equally the people and the convention, providing for the immediate admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, on the acceptance of certain conditions by her Legislature.

These substitutes, together with the original bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Illinois, were referred back; and seven days after this, on the 30th of June, the Senator from Illinois brought forward from the committee a new bill, which, though it embraced many of the provisions of the bill introduced as a substitute by the Senator from Georgia, omitted this very important provision, which his own bill and the substitute itself of the Senator from Georgia had contained. It left out totally the provision requiring the ratification of the constitution by the people of Kansas. In fact it recognized in that manner, unequivocally, the right of the convention over the whole subject. I think that is a legitimate conclusion. The right of the people to ratify the constitution was therefore abandoned; and it was abandoned when the Senator from Illinois himself reported the bill. I say, with great respect, that when the opposition comes from him, on the ground that it is a fatal objection to the constitution that it was not submitted to the popular vote, it comes with less force from him than it would from any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. His bill contained, instead of the clause before quoted, these words:

"Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:"

This bill passed the Senate, but it will be remembered that it failed in the House of Representatives. In this body, with the clause requiring popular ratification abandoned, after it had been twice reported to the Senate, it received the vote of every Democratic Senator, including the Senator from Illinois. He recognized the principle, in the first place, by reporting the bill; he recognized the principle by having it referred to his committee; he recognized the principle by reporting this back; and he recognized the principle of leaving the matter entirely with the convention by voting for the passage of the bill himself.

It was my purpose, Mr. President, to have pursued somewhat the line of argument which has been indicated and pointed out by the opponents of this measure, connecting itself with the subject of slavery in Kansas; but feeling as I do on that subject, feeling as I did last night when I heard gentlemen going back two hundred years to show the tenure of slave property, as if the opinions of all the benchers of England could affect the right to a single slave in any of our States, or induce a master to surrender it, I see the labyrinth of discussion into which gentlemen are led when they touch that subject—I do not come here to discuss the abstract question of slavery. I am willing to meet gentlemen on the other side upon the practical workings of the institution in this country. I am willing to take it up as a practical issue, and to show to those who here maintain the controversy, that even in their own States, in their own towns, and in their own homesteads, the practice belies the theory; that the negro there, with all the privileges which their enlarged philanthropy has thrown around him, is in a more wretched condition than that from which they seek to relieve him in our States.

We might go further, and show that wherever he is found on the face of this earth, he is never found in a condition so beneficial to himself, so useful to others, so progressive to whatever the Deity has destined him to, as he is in the southern States of this Union; but I will not go into that discussion now. I will merely observe that as long ago as we know anything of the southern coast of Africa, when the creeping commerce along the shores of the Mediterranean unfolded the habits and customs of the tribes of Africa, they were a savage set of cut-throats, knowing no law but might, intractable, showing no mercy to age, sex, or condition; and the very usages and customs which existed then exist up to the very latest hour of our researches in Africa; the African is not changed one iota; and in fifty years of attempt by British philanthropy to Christianize a single African on the coast of Africa, they have not yet got one to point to—not one African Christian. The only one that British philanthropy could point to, on Cape Coast Castle, died a short time ago, over fifty years of age, and then, in his dying hour, relapsed back again into infidelity. The southern States of this Confederacy, training them in the light of Christianity, can point to hundreds of thousands of devoted Christians among them. I might, on this practical issue, take these gentlemen who oppose us at their own homesteads, and they cannot point me to a single one of their cities where you do not find its negro quarter; where you do not find its place for colored people; where you do not find evident marks of their being treated as an inferior race; and no gentlemen are more ready to recognize and practice on this condition of things than those who preach a contrary doctrine here; but I am not disposed to pursue that issue now.

Mr. President, we have been told by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] that the South has governed the Confederacy, but that the reins of power are falling from her grasp, and that to other hands are our destinies to be committed. I concede it. The genius, the knowledge of government, the constitutional, conservative spirit of southern men, have as unequivocally stamped the policy of this Government in the Cabinet and in the Senate, as their valor has led their banners in the field. Seven of your Presidents have been themselves slaveholders; and whenever the country has demanded the intellect, the genius, or the courage of her sons, they have found no more brilliant illustrations than amongst slaveholders. Under the guidance of their policy, with their hand upon the helm of the ship of State, her onward progress in all that ennobles, and all that elevates our race, has been the marvel of mankind. I do not deny that domestic discords, family jars, have from time to time intruded themselves upon the pathway of the progress of our country. But while they are as inseparable from it as is the dust from the wheel of the locomotive, they have impeded it as little. Under the guidance of those same southern men, national policies, national purposes, and national men, lending their cheering influence, like the gentle dews of heaven, shedding them over every hill and valley of their country equally, have combined to awaken and cherish in our hearts obedience to the Constitution, and through it a love for the Union. Under their policy sectional discords have from time to time brought here sectional extremes and their common grievances, laid them on this common altar, and renewed a common vow to sustain it. If the South has governed, such has been the spirit and such are the results of her government.

Sir, we are told by the Senator from New York, in a tone half complaisant and half exultant, that she is to rule no more. Well, sir, be it so. I foresee the time when she shall stand in a minority here. We ought not to ignore it. The sooner we come up to a knowledge of it the better; but, in parting with the good old ship of State, we can at least look back with pride upon the track which she has traced under our guidance, with the Constitution as her only chart, upon the pathway of nations, illustrated as that is by the imperishable monuments of man's hopeful progress; and we may point to the discords, to the storms of faction, to the open assaults of foreign and domestic enemies, to the treacherous deceits of pretended friends, which she has nobly weathered. In withdrawing from her now, with all her banners aloft, with her fame established and her name unsullied, with placid seas beneath and smiling skies above her, freighted with the hearts, the hopes, and the liberties of mankind—if we surrender her, we surrender the noblest trust that ever passed from the hands of man; and, in the language of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] if we do surrender her, great will be your responsibility, and great will be our honor. I only wish to remind you, that when we demand her back, as demand her we shall, let us see that no stripe of the glorious banner is erased, that no star of it is dimmed.

In speaking of this departure of power from the South, I neither deplore it nor do I fear its consequences to the South. It will but wake her up. It will but make her more watchful of her rights, and more resolved and determined to maintain them. If the South has shown from time to time a high degree of excitement, a high degree of sensitiveness on the agitation of the slavery question in Congress, when that agitation was dwarfed by the consideration that the balance of power here rendered it almost an abstraction, what will she feel and what will be her degree of watchfulness when she finds her voice smothered in this forum, whea she recalls the threat of her enemies, when she understands the threat of the Senator from New York, who speaks of the conquest of the southern States, and when she sees every department of this Government in their hands to enable them to execute it?

Mr. President, it is a painful subject, but, in my judgment, the continuance of this Union is soon to be in the hands of this very sectional party. It is to depend upon the conservation and constitutional action of that party; and as successful aggression never yet paused in its career, it becomes the South now, while time for counsel and reflection still exists, to know what place she is to occupy in this Confederacy. Conservative and hopeful as I am, hoping, and I may say believing, as I do, that our political skies are brightening, believing that we shall illustrate politically the axiom that the darkest hour is just before the dawn, I yet trust, nay, sir, I know, that the people of the southern States will never submit to that last degradation of a free people—a voluntary acquiescence under a violated constitution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If there be no disposition to pursue the debate further by other gentlemen, I wish to make some remarks to the Senate on the subject. I am not prepared to go on at this moment. If no gentleman desires to speak further on this subject now, the motion I propose to make is to adjourn.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I wish to say a few words on the amendment I have offered, and then he can move to adjourn.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very well.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, it was not my purpose originally to speak to the question at large. The vote I should otherwise have given, in accordance with my own opinions, has been taken from under my control by the instruction of the General Assembly of Ohio, in which the political party to which I belong has a decided majority. I will say, however, individually, that I regard the act passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, on the 19th February, 1857, a true and substantial copy, in every material provision, of the bill which passed the Senate of the United States on the 2d of July, 1856. That bill, at the time, after the most thorough discussion, and the most careful and anxious consideration, received my vote and unqualified approval. Afterwards, before the people of my State, in their primary assemblies, it was my duty and my pleasure to explain, as fully as I was able, the purposes, the principles, and the details of that bill; and, at all events, the party to which I belong, and with which I have always been associated, gave the bill a like approval.

Nor, sir, do I regard it material whether that bill was passed by the Congress of the United States, or by the Territorial Legislature. I know some distinction has been attempted in that regard; but after a thorough examination of the history of all the cases of the admission of States into the Union, my own judgment is, that the most regular manner, and, originally, the only regular manner, for the application of a new State, is through a convention called by the Territorial Legislature. The first three of the States admitted, after the formation of the Constitution, had no enabling act. Vermont and Kentucky were not authorized by Congress to take any steps toward the formation of State governments. They proceeded under the authority of the States from which they were separated. Tennessee, the third State, proceeded under the sole authority of her territorial government.

The first enabling act ever passed was in the case of my own State, and the reasons for it were peculiar and imperative. Under the ordinance of July 13, 1787, the people did not elect the Council or Senate of the Territory. The Councilors were nominated by the House of Representatives, and chosen by Congress. No man could be a representative, even in the most numerous branch of the Territorial Legislature, unless he owned a fee-simple estate in two hundred acres of land, nor could any man be a voter for a representative unless he owned a freehold estate in fifty acres. As a consequence, the Federal party, although a minority of the people, controlled the Territorial Legislature. Without going at large into the circumstances which, in some other form, I shall lay before my constituents, it is enough to say that this Federal control of the Legislature, with the assistance of an absolute veto in the hands of the Governor, was so exercised as to prevent the admission of Ohio into the Union at the proper time, and exercised for merely partisan purposes. It was to redress this usurpation on the part of the Territorial Legislature that Congress, for the first time in our history, passed an enabling act. It was not based on the ground that the Territorial Legislature lacked the power. It was based on the ground that the Legislature had the power and refused to exercise it.

The next case was that of the State of Louisiana. In the petition of the Territorial Legislature of Orleans, which will be found in the American State Papers, it appears that the people of that Territory, through their Legislature, had at one time endeavored to form a State government, and Congress had refused to recognize their proceedings; and, therefore, at a subsequent period, the Legislature petitioned Congress for an enabling act, and that enabling act was passed in response to the petition. These two cases, although special in their circumstances, were followed without any question in the instances of Indiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Illinois, and Missouri, over all of which States the ordinance of 1787, with or without the restriction of slavery, extended.

The difficulty in the case of Missouri was this: she had complied with every condition in the act of Congress; she was entitled to have her Senators and Representative sworn upon the presentation of their credentials. When the first enabling act for the State of Ohio was before Congress, when the Federal party denounced it as usurpation by Congress, the Democratic Republican party defended it on the ground that it was a conditional act of admission; that whenever the Territorial Legislature had taken steps for the assembling of a convention, and the constitution of the new State had been formed, then Congress had merely to admit the State; but whenever no convention had been called, and no constitution had been formed, that then Congress might pass the act of admission beforehand, defining the boundaries and prescribing the conditions; so that I take an enabling act to be, as I said some time since on this floor, a conditional act of admission. Missouri had complied with the condition; she was, therefore, entitled to have her Senators and Representative sworn, for it is literally true, as has been stated several times on this floor, that the State of Ohio, in which case the first enabling act was passed, never had any other admission into the Union. Her constitution was presented here; it was referred to a committee with special instructions to inquire what more was necessary to enable the State to enter the Union. The committee reported that nothing more was necessary, that as soon as the laws of the United States had been extended over the State, and a district court established with a judge, marshal, and attorney, the State was as completely one of the United States of America as any of the original thirteen. I say the outrage in the case of Missouri, was, that her Senators and Representative were not sworn. The Republican members contended at the time that Missouri was a State of the Union, unjustly deprived of her representation in Congress, as will appear from an examination of the reported debates. Finally, however, it resulted in the famous compromise of May 2, 1821, by which, under a joint resolution, the Senators and Representative were admitted.

After the case of Missouri, more than quarter of a century elapsed without another enabling act by Congress; and during that time Maine, Michigan, Arkansas, Iowa, Florida, and Texas, entered the Union. The next enabling act was in the case of Wisconsin, August 6, 1846. That would have been sufficient, when complied with, to entitle her Senators and Representatives to be sworn; but the convention of Wisconsin altered the boundaries of the State, and therefore it was necessary to apply to Congress for a consent to this alteration. This appears by the joint resolution for her admission, March 3, 1847. The next case was that of California, which was admitted in September, 1850—a State received not only without an enabling act, but without any previous territorial organization.

Of the eighteen new States, eight had enabling acts, and ten had not. The majority of instances is against an enabling act; the history of the question is against it. Where do Senators find a power in the Congress of the United States to prescribe the assembling of a convention and the formation of a State constitution? It is not given in the Constitution of the United States. Our power is to admit new States; and we can as well admit them with a constitution already formed as upon a constitution formed at our express instance. The justification for an enabling act, when first proposed during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, was, that Congress admitted the State upon a condition to be complied with afterwards. I therefore repeat that the convention act of February 19, 1857, passed by the Legislature of Kansas, is as regular, as authoritative, as perfect in every respect, as if the other House of Congress had agreed to the Toombs bill, which we passed in July, 1856. The convention originated, then, under an act to which I, in common with all my political friends in this body, gave unqualified approbation.

Now, sir, it seems to me individually, speaking for no one else, meaning no imputation on any one else, that two questions remain to those who voted for the pacification bill, as we called it in 1856, namely: First, has the act of the Territorial Legislature of February 19, 1857, been substantially pursued? Second, has anything since transpired in the history of Kansas which ought to require some additional provision, some special provision, before her full admission into the Union?

Under the first of these questions arose the difficulty to which I adverted on almost the first day of the session, to wit, an allegation that nineteen counties of the Territory were not represented in the convention which formed this constitution. I am free to say, that if such an omission had been even the result of accident, I should have considered it a fatal objection; I should have considered that the convention did not comply with the charter of its organization; but, with all the information which I can derive, I am brought to this conclusion: that, with the exception, I think, of four of those counties, they were merely nominal districts of country laid off, with names given, but with practically no population. As to the four counties which had population, it was by the fault of the inhabitants, not by the fault of the officers that the census was not taken, resulting from the fact that those inhabitants had given their adhesion to what was known as the Topeka constitution and form of government—a constitution and form of government which Congress had rejected, but in which they persevered.

A remarkable fact occurs with reference to one of those counties—the county of Anderson. It was alleged that the people of the county proceeded to take a census therein, and to elect a delegate, at their own instance. This delegate attended the constitutional convention. To be sure, he was supernumerary, the full number of sixty having been apportioned, by Mr. Stanton, to the other counties. However, he petitioned to be admitted as a delegate. His petition was referred to a committee. The committee reported in favor of his admission, and the moment this report was made, the petition was withdrawn. I know it will be said that the delegate could not legally sit there. Suppose that to be true, the people of Anderson county could not complain of his admission; none could complain but the people of the other counties; but the people of the other counties did not complain. The people of the other counties, through their delegates, offered to admit him; he himself withdrew. My inference, from this fact, is, that the delegate never wished to be admitted; that, supposing his application would be rejected, he preferred it; but as soon as he discovered it would not be rejected, he withdrew it. Here is a key to the whole case. There was no good faith in this transaction.

Would it have injured the constitutional convention, or the constitution of Kansas, if the delegate from Anderson had been admitted? Why, let us turn to the Minnesota case. Congress passed an act authorizing a convention to be called in Minnesota, to consist of twice as many delegates as there were Representatives in the Territorial Legislature. Our Committee on Territories, through the honorable Senator from Illinois, inform us that the people of Minnesota construed that to mean twice as many delegates as there were Councilors and Representatives in the Legislature, and accordingly they elected that number. The act of Congress required this convention to assemble on a given day in one chamber, and there, by united councils, with opportunity for personal conference and mutual debate, as the deliberation and judgment of all the delegates together, to form a constitution and State government. The fact is, there never was any such convention. There were two conventions on that day, neither of them consisting of all the delegates, both of them together consisting of more delegates than even the extraordinary construction placed on the act of Congress would authorize, consisting of men who were merely claimants for seats on each side; and the constitution was formed by a committee of conference between these two bodies.

It is said that this irregularity was cured by the subsequent vote of the people ratifying the constitution. I can discover no reason why Minnesota was at liberty to dispense with the convention more than with the vote of the people. They were both required by law. But, sir, be it so; then we come to inquire what was this vote of the people of Minnesota, which is said to have healed all the former irregularities? I have heard Senators complain bitterly that no man was allowed to vote in Kansas on the 21st of December, for or against slavery, unless he would vote for the constitution. That has been said again and again. It has been said that every elector was compelled to vote for "constitution with slavery," or "constitution with no slavery;" and therefore a man who was opposed to some provision of the constitution, or who did not wish to vote on the constitution, could not vote either for or against slavery; and that has been a constant theme of declamation in this Chamber since the 9th of December last. Now, sir, let us turn to the case of Minnesota.

I shall read three sections from the constitution of Minnesota, by which it is provided not only that the vote upon the constitution shall be held on the same day and at the same polls with the vote for all the officers to be chosen under the constitution, thus electing men to offices not in existence at the time, but that no man should vote for or against the constitution unless he would vote for officers under it. He that runs may read:

"SEC. 16. Upon the second Tuesday, the 13th day of October, 1857, an election shall be held for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, Governor, Lieutenant Governor, supreme and district judges, members of the Legislature, and all other officers designated in this constitution, and also for the submission of this constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection.

"SEC. 17. Upon the day so designated as aforesaid, every free white male inhabitant over the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided within the limits of the State for ten days previous to the day of said election, may vote for all officers to be elected under this constitution, at such election, and also, for or against the adoption of the constitution.

"SEC. 18. In voting for or against the adoption of this constitution, the words 'for constitution' or 'against constitution,' may be written or printed on the ticket of each voter; but no voter shall vote for or against this constitution on a separate ballot from that cast by him for officers to be elected at said election under this constitution."

If the form of submission on the 21st of December, 1857, in Kansas, was fraudulent, what will become of the ratification of the constitution of Minnesota by the people? It is admitted that her convention was irregular, or rather there was no convention at all; it is admitted that, from the very initiation of the proceedings the act of Congress was not observed; but Senators stand here to-day insisting on the admission of the State by the sole virtue of a popular vote. Here is the vote. Is it valid or invalid? If it be valid, so was the vote in Kansas on the 21st of December. If it be invalid, Minnesota has no more title than Kansas to be admitted into the Union. But, sir, in my judgment, in neither case, are the objections material.

I might give another illustration. If we are to look into the constitutions of States applying for admission, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] proposed last night, to pass upon the wisdom or the justice of their provisions, to decide whether the State should admit or exclude African servitude, should admit or exclude free negroes, what shall we say of this constitution for Minnesota, under which the Representatives chosen in October, 1857, are elected for life? There is absolutely no provision of the constitution of Minnesota limiting the terms of the Representatives already chosen. I grant it is a mere omission; I have no doubt the convention intended to make such a provision; but none appears. There would be no limitation of the terms of the Senators in that Legislature but for a provision, that whenever a census shall be taken by the United States, or by the authority of the State Legislature, then the seats of all the Senators shall become vacant. If it were not for that, the Senators in the Legislature of Minnesota would be chosen for life as well as the Representatives. But, I repeat, these objections are wholly immaterial, just as were all the arguments addressed to us in reference to the provisions of the constitution of Kansas.

My honorable friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who is not now in his seat, as a minority of the Committee on Territories, urges this proposition: that the convention in Kansas derived its whole power from the Territorial Legislature, and, therefore, the vote ordered to be taken on the 4th of January, 1858, by the Territorial Legislature, was a proper vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution. It is said, furthermore, that Kansas presents herself to us now with a simple petition in her hands. In my judgment, the convention of Kansas derived no authority from the Territorial Legislature; it received all its authority from the people in the election of the delegates. What has the Territorial Legislature done? It has prescribed, in the act of February, 1857, the time, place, and manner of electing delegates, and the time when they shall assemble in convention; that is all. Does that constitute the Legislature the source of the power to be exercised by the delegates when assembled? Then let us turn to the case of Minnesota. Congress passed an act prescribing the time, place, and manner for the election of delegates in Minnesota, and prescribing the day when those delegates should assemble in convention. Did the convention of Minnesota derive its power to make a constitution for that people from the Congress of the United States? Are we the source of authority from which the constitution of Minnesota is derived? If so, the constitutions of the States, instead of being an expression of the will of the people to be governed by them, are merely the acts of Congress through its agents and delegates assembled in the various States and Territories. No, sir; in the act of electing a delegate, the people have clothed him with power, and, from the hour of his election, he is a representative of the people, not of the Legislature, and those delegates proceed, when assembled, in the exercise of a power which the Legislature never had, and never could confer—the power to make a constitution, which is above all Legislatures. And therefore, in my opinion the attempted interference of the last Territorial Legislature of Kansas, at the special session called by Mr. Secretary Stanton, was unauthorized, factious, and void. The Legislature had no more right to interfere with the constitution, to alter the mode of its submission, to touch any provision in it, than we have this day to revise the constitution of Minnesota.

It is true, sir, Kansas presents herself to us with a petition in her hand; but what are the contents of that petition? Honorable Senators seem to imagine that Kansas petitions us to approve her constitution; to pass our judgment upon its provisions; to say, "this is wise, that is unwise." Why, sir, Minnesota is also a petitioner with a constitution in her hand. What is the petition? To approve the constitution? No, sir; it is to admit the State. It is not necessary that a State should have any written constitution. Many of the original States had no written constitutions, or none reduced to an exact form, until years after the Constitution of the United States had been ratified and was in operation. The State of Rhode Island was received into the Union in May, 1790, with a form of government organized under the royal charter of Charles II., and modified by mere usage; and I believe she did not change that for a written constitution until within about fifteen years. The Constitution of the United States does not require the States to have written constitutions. It only requires them to have republican forms of government; and those forms may rest on parol or usage. That is the reason why the States of the Union have an unlimited power to alter their own constitutions, their forms of government, without the consent of Congress, provided they still continue to be republican. It is only requisite that a new State, as an old one, should have a form of government.

Well, sir, let us look as well at the case of Kansas as of Minnesota. I looked far enough to see that, in each, provision is made for a Governor and a Legislature, to be chosen by the people, to exercise the authority of the State, to make the laws, and to execute the laws; a government responsible to the people; a government over which, by the clearest principles of constitutional law, the people have complete power of revision. There, I am satisfied, is a republican form of government. If there be any mistake in the constitutions, any omissions, if there be unwise provisions in them, or provisions which, upon experience, prove not satisfactory, the people of these States, like the people of the old States, can reform their institutions so as to suit themselves. Such being the case, I attach no serious importance to any of the objections I have shown in the constitution of Minnesota, and none to those which others have made against the constitution of Kansas. Each has a form of government—a republican form of government. In the case of Minnesota, she has the requisite population. In the case of Kansas, all parties here, and all parties in Kansas, the friends of Topeka, the friends of Leecompton, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, have agreed to waive that question.

It is next said that Kansas cannot be allowed admission into the Union, because she never submitted her constitution to a direct vote of the people. I have already said that, in my judgment, we have nothing to do with her constitution except to inquire whether it provides for a republican form of government; and we have no right to specify how, or in what manner, or by what solemnities she shall form or adopt her constitution. She has formed it by a convention of delegates. That is the old form. That is the form under which the original States acted. That is the form under which nearly all the new States have acted. I think only six of the constitutions of the new States were ever submitted to the people, and none of the first constitutions of the old States. Governor Walker, in his letter of resignation, says that no constitution can ever be legitimate, or rightly enforced, until it has been submitted to the people; because, he says, sovereignty can only act directly and never through delegates. If this be so, Senators, we are the sheerest usurpers in the world; for the Constitution of the United States, under which we assume to act, never was submitted to the people of any State. It is in force to-day by the ratification of conventions in the original States, and by the adoption of conventions in the new States. I have stated that the original States neither submitted their own constitutions nor the Constitution of the United States to a vote of the people, and only six of the eighteen new States thus submitted their constitutions.

Does Governor Walker mean seriously to assert that sovereignty can never be exercised through delegates or representatives? Is it not in virtue of a delegation of sovereign power by the people, that a Legislature defines every offense and fixes the punishment; that the judiciary examines into every accusation, and in the proper case inflicts the punishment? Sir, is there a higher act of sovereignty than to take the life of a citizen? And that is taken by an executive officer in obedience to a mandate of the judiciary. Sovereignty, forsooth, is so exalted and omnipotent, quoth Governor Walker, that it can make and unmake constitutions, dynasties, and all forms of government whatsoever; but so restrained withal, so humble, so helpless, that it cannot even choose its own instruments, its forms of expression, its modes of operation. We know, from the history and received opinion of all past time, that the people can as well authorize delegates to make a constitution as make it themselves. They do this because it is inconvenient for the people to assemble in one place, as they did in the ancient democracies; and on account of this inconvenience, they choose representatives, and instruct those representatives as to their wishes; and the representatives, assembled in due form of law, are the people by substitution. They act for the people, and in the name of the people, and by the authority of the people. If they choose to take the advice of their constituents, if they choose, in a question of doubt or of difficulty, to remit the whole question, or any part of the question, to the people in primary assemblies, nobody can object to it; but if they feel sufficiently assured of the will and the wishes of their constituents, they have the power to proceed without any further sanction. In the present case of Kansas, I admit that the people might have prescribed a charter for their delegates. They might have said to the delegates, "we will authorize you simply to form and propose a constitution, but we reserve to ourselves a right, on appeal or submission, to revise, to accept, or to reject your proposition;" but the convention act of 1857 contained no such reservation. On the contrary, when it was returned to the Legislature by Governor Geary, without his approval, on the distinct ground that it contained no such provision, it was passed over the veto by a two-thirds vote of each House. Therefore, the question, whether such should be the charter of the delegates, was considered and decided in the proper mode. Whatever might have been the question, if the convention act had required submission, or if there had been no discussion of the subject, in this case the authority of the convention is as absolute as if the act had said to the delegates, "you may submit it or not, as you please."

Now, sir, it is argued that Congress must substitute its discretion for the discretion of the delegates; and because, (some say,) the delegates abused their powers, broke their promises, deceived their constituents. It would not be singular if this were so. I think every honorable Senator will admit that he has never completed, during the period of his official life, one tenth of what he proposed; and probably not one tenth of what he promised in good faith. Some have altered their opinions; some have found their designs impracticable. I doubt whether there is a Legislature assembled in any State of the Union, with regard to which it could not be proved that one half or more of the members, in their various exhortations to the people, had promised a great many things that they never even attempted to perform. That, however, is not the question. The question is, whether we shall substitute our discretion for that of the delegates chosen by the people?

I do not say there might not be a gross case of usurpation, of fraud, and outrage, where some interposition, but very little, would not be pardonable. The allegation is here that the delegates did not submit the constitution as they promised; that they did not keep certain pledges, published in the newspapers, or in the speeches which they made to the people. Well, sir, unless we assume a right to revise the proceedings of every convention and every Legislature in every State, I see no cause for interference. If the agents of the people have violated their trust, let the people call them to account. We are not the people. We do not make the constitution; we do not ratify the constitution; we do not approve the constitution; we have no right to pass judgment upon the constitution. It is submitted to us, as I said, merely to show that Kansas has a constitution republican in form, and upon that instrument the petition is to admit her as a State. I say you can admit her without a constitution; and wherever you have passed an enabling act for any State, you have admitted that State without a written constitution; you have admitted her by anticipation; you have prescribed her boundaries, and you have said to her, "proceed to the election of your delegates, the assembling of your convention, and the formation of your government; and upon compliance with these requisites you shall become a State;" for so, and not otherwise, the State of Ohio entered this Union.

Where will this course of objection to the provisions of a State constitution end? In the State which I have the honor to represent, the first constitution established annual sessions of the Legislature. The present constitution establishes biennial sessions. I have a very decided opinion as to this question. I consider frequent sessions of the Legislature essential to the liberties of the people, and I have never hesitated to denounce the system of biennial sessions as dangerous, as a delegation of authority for too long a period to mere executive officers. Therefore, sir, if I had such a latitude as the Senator from New Hampshire claimed last night, I should refuse to admit a State whose constitution provided for biennial sessions of the Legislature. But I have no latitude of the sort—no right to say, in the case of a new State, "unless every provision made for your internal affairs corresponds with my judgment, you shall not be received into the Union." If we could say this to the new States, why not to the old ones? New States are to be admitted on the same footing with the old ones; and if we have any such power, it applies to the old States as well as to the new, and the manifest duty of Congress would be to call for the constitution of Ohio, adopted in September, 1851, and examine its provisions.

Sir, it is another development of that difference which began with the organization of our Federal Government. The claim is, in substance, that the end will always justify the means; that if we dislike the local institutions of any people we must alter them; that the Congress of the United States, instead of restraining itself within its own charter, shall regulate the affairs of the people in all the States of the Union. I think the people of the States can take better care of themselves than we can.

These observations lead to the amendment which I propose. The minority of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Illinois, uses language of this character:

"Inasmuch as the Lecompton constitution provides a mode of amendment after the year 1864, and thereby excludes the possibility of any lawful change until that period, the President suggests that Congress may remove this obstacle by inserting a clause in the act of admission annulling so much of the constitution as prohibits any change until after the year 1864, and requires two thirds of each House of the Legislature to authorize the people to vote for a convention, and declaring the right of the Legislature already elected to call a convention, by a majority vote, in violation of the constitution under which its members were elected, and which they were sworn to support."

In the first place, is it true that the constitution of Kansas "thereby"—that is, by the provision of a method of amendment after 1864—"excludes the possibility of any lawful change until that period?" Suppose the constitution had no provision at all on the subject of an amendment at any time; suppose it was perfectly silent, as many of the constitutions of the original States were—for our good, honest, republican ancestors, in the days of the Revolution, proceeded on the idea that there were some principles which it was not necessary to declare, which every man of ordinary comprehension, imbued with the principles of civil liberty, would at once acknowledge. Among these was the principle that any power which could do an act could undo it; that, inasmuch as the constitution of a State was formed by a convention of delegates, authorized to be elected and assembled by the Legislature, and that convention of delegates so elected and assembled had made a constitution, another convention, elected in the same manner and assembled in the same manner, by like authority, could undo it in whole or in part. That is the ground on which the earliest constitutions of the States, or many of them, were formed. Nothing was said about the right of amendment; it was considered a matter of course.

The doctrine is indisputable. It is a universal maxim that any compact—I hear gentlemen call a constitution a compact; be it so—any compact, any covenant, any promise, any agreement, any law can be abrogated by the power which made it: in the case of a compact, by the consent of the parties; in the case of a law, by the Legislature. I grant that where a right has been vested under a constitution or a law, so as to have assumed the character of property, you cannot divest that right without compensation, because, as to that, all the faculties of the constitution or of the law are fully executed; but as to its future operation, as to a new case which may originate under it, the constitution or law is entirely revocable. I have, from curiosity, applied to the old common lawyers on this subject, since we have heard so much of them; and am rather amused at the number of forms in which they express the principle. Lord Chief Baron Gilbert is very terse:

"Solvitur eo ligamine quo ligatum est."

Speaking of covenants, of deeds, of agreements between parties, signed, sealed, and delivered, with all the solemnity which can bind man to man, here is Lord Coke:

"Nihil tam conveniens est naturali æquitati quam munus quodque dissolvi eo ligamine quo ligatum est."—2 Inst. 260.

Here is one sentence from Croke James, a very ancient book, and good authority:

"Unumquodque eodem modo quo colligatum est dissolvitur."—Cro. Jac. 63.

Tindal, Chief Justice, one of the lights of modern jurisprudence, says:

"Quodque dissolvitur eodem ligamine quo ligatur."—3 Scott's new Rep., 215.

That is the law. These famous judges have not thought it necessary to indulge in argumentation. They have done here as with the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence; they have resorted to brief, pungent maxims expressed in the Latin language. Let it be dissolved by the power which made it. The civilians are of the like opinion:

"Jura"—laws, constitutions, for a constitution is nothing but an organical law—"Jura eodem modo destituntur quo constituantur."—Bell's Digest of the Roman and Civil Law.

And so in the French law:

"Le pouvoir législatif a nonseulement la faculté de faire des lois, mais encore celle de les abroger."—Rogron, Les Cinq Codes expliqués, introduction, tit. 2.

"The legislative power has not only the faculty of making laws, but also that of abrogating them."

Since we have come to first principles, I will quote from the Institutes. I read now from Rutherford's Institutes of Natural Law, volume 2, chapter 3:

"The legislative power, as it is here defined, implies a power not only of making laws, but of altering and repealing them. As the circumstances, either of the State itself or of the several individuals which compose it, are changed, such claims and such duties as might once be beneficial may become useless, burdensome, or even hurtful. If, therefore, the legislative power could not change the rules which it prescribes, so as to suit them to the circumstances of the body politic, and of the members of that body, it could not answer the purposes for which it was established; it could not at all times settle their claims and their duties in such a manner as is most conducive to the good of the whole, and of the several individuals which make up that whole."

There is the rule and the reason of the rule. It stands on the most solid foundation. But, Mr. President, what need of books here: we have it in our own charter of liberty. As one of the truths declared to be self-evident, by the representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, on the 4th of July, 1776, I find this: "that governments are instituted to secure" certain inalienable rights there defined; "and that whenever any form of government becomes destructive to these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

This indeed, sir, is the principal element, the essential requisite, in every republican form of government—the right, namely, of the people, in some peaceable and definite manner, to reconstruct their government, and provide for the reformation of abuses. I hear Senators on this floor talk about constitutions in the States which are revolutionary. A revolution against whom? Who is the mighty sovereign offended by this? One would suppose, forgetting the old suggestion of the Scriptures that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, that governments are not formed for the people, but the people for the governments. What is the object of any government? It is to protect the rights and to secure the liberties of the people. There is no other just government. Every other is a usurpation. It may be maintained by arms; it may remain in power thousands of years; but a just government, an honest government, is organized to protect the rights and secure the liberties of the people.

Well, sir, suppose it fails—and I do not care whether it fails at the end of a century, or fails in the first half hour of its existence—if it fails in the very act of putting it in operation, as in the case of the constitution of Minnesota, where a Legislature has been elected for life—if, I say, the Government fails in the very act of attempting to put it into operation, the right of the people to form another government which will protect their rights and secure their liberties is as perfect and as absolute as if they had endured a thousand years of despotism. No convention can prevent it, for one convention is no higher than another. I go further, sir. The people who were in Minnesota in October, 1857, have no right to say to the people who may be there next year, or the year after, or twenty years hence, "we have, by a sort of testamentary disposition, provided a government for you in all time." Men can devise or bequeath their own property, but I never heard that they could make last wills and testaments of a political character, calling them constitutions, by which they could bind their children, and their children's children for a hundred years; and if they cannot do it for one hundred years, they cannot do it for ten years, as was provided in the Topeka constitution; no, sir, not for one week, for one day, for one hour. It is the same in principle.

What is the object of government? I come back to that again and again. It is to protect and secure the liberties of those who live under it; and when it fails of that object, the people have a right to another government. If they cannot obtain it peaceably, our fathers said they had a right to take it by force of arms; but the essence of a republican government is that they can get it peaceably and in regular form; that they need not resort to arms; that they need not resort to what Senators call revolution; but in pursuance of the great idea of all government, of the very authority which they conferred on their delegates at first, they may assume to themselves at any time, in a due legal and orderly manner, prescribed by law, the power of amendment. "Blessed," said Lord Coke, "be the amending hand."

Let me guard against misconception here. I do not say a constitution may not provide the manner of its amendment. I do not say that it may not interpose provisions calculated to require more thorough deliberation. I do not say that it may not require a majority of each House of the Legislature, or two thirds, or three fifths; because, after all, the Legislature is elected by the people, and what the people want they will compel the Legislature to grant. I do not say that the people may not require, to prevent hasty or improper action, that the question shall be submitted to them twice, or thrice, if you please; or that it shall remain so many months for consideration; or that notice of the intended amendment shall be published in this or that manner. I do not even complain of such provisions; but I say that when a constitution declares, as the Topeka constitution did, that in no manner, neither by a convention nor by the people, not by the unanimous vote of all those who live under it, and all those who exercise authority under it, whether as legislators or executive officers, can it be changed—whenver a constitution declares that, the declaration is merely void; it needs no abrogation; it never had any life.

It has been suggested that the people, unless restrained, will too frequently or too rashly change their government. To what does all that amount? To an impeachment of the wisdom of the people—nothing else; an assertion that it is necessary to provide some guardian for the people, to prevent them from doing an injury to themselves, and as there is no such guardian alive, that it shall be written down in somebody's last will and testament. No, sir; the danger is exactly the opposite. The danger is, and always has been, that the people will tolerate oppression and abuses from year to year, from generation to generation, rather than interrupt the ordinary course of public affairs by an appeal to their original, inalienable, and indefeasible right to form and reform their constitution and government. That, sir, was the opinion of Thomas Jefferson, and of all our illustrious ancestors who, with him, on the 4th of July, 1776, declared the causes which impelled them to separate from the dominion of the British Crown. "Prudence, indeed will dictate," you see it is a mere question of prudence. How prudent are the people? If they are not prudent, who is any more prudent? Where shall we find the appointed class which monopolizes all the wisdom of the world? "Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

And now, sir, do the apostles of popular sovereignty come hither at last to declare that some ninety thousand people for the present inhabiting a new State of this Union, or a new State about to be admitted, may chain the people of that State when they shall have grown to be two millions, when all who made the present constitution shall have passed away, when all the purposes which they had in view have been accomplished, and new schemes of ambition or views of life are opened to the popular apprehension—that these two millions of freemen, whose rights and whose liberties are as sacred as those of the first ninety thousand, are bound by an inexorable fate, which no human power can unbind, to the terms of a constitution made for them in ages past? Is that popular sovereignty? I should call it the sovereignty of dead men's bones.

One of the ablest, most learned, and purest judges of the Supreme Court, I mean Mr. Justice Campbell, has expressed his views on this subject in the judicial forum. It is admitted that the case of Kansas does not stand upon mere silence in her constitution; it is admitted that the Kansas bill of rights contains an unqualified declaration, to which I shall advert by and by—a declaration copied from the first constitution of the State of Ohio. Mr. Justice Campbell, in expounding those very words, not in a case of revolution, but in a case of peaceable amendment, spoke to this effect. I read now from his opinion in Dodge vs. Woolsey, 18th Howard, page 374:

"The inquiry arises, to what did the authority of the people extend? It was their right to ameliorate every vicious institution, and to do whatever an enlightened statesmanship might prescribe for the advancement of their own happiness; and for this end, persons and things in the State were submitted to their authority."

Again, page 375:

"If the powers of the people of a State are inadequate to this object, then their grave and solemn declarations of their rights and their authority over their governments, and of the ends for which their governments and the institutions of their governments were framed, and the responsibility of rulers and magistrates to themselves, are nothing but great swelling words of vanity."

Amen, Mr. Justice Campbell: you never spoke more truthfully in all your life. I next read what he said at page 379, on the next question whether the people could be trusted, or stood in need of somebody to hold their hands for five or six years:

"It may be that the people may abuse the powers with which they are invested; and, even in correcting the abuses of their Government, may not in every case act with wisdom and circumspection."

"But, for my part, when I consider the justice, moderation, the restraints upon arbitrary power, the stability of social order, the security of personal rights, and general harmony which existed in the country before the sovereignty of governments was asserted; and when the sovereignty of the people was a living and operative principle, and governments were administered subject to the limitations and with reference to the specific ends for which they were organized, and their members recognized their responsibility and dependence, I feel no anxiety nor apprehension in leaving to the people of Ohio a 'complete power' over their government, and all the institutions and establishments it has called into existence."

Sir, Mr. Justice Campbell has drawn the very distinction to which I adverted. Popular sovereignty, according to the new interpretation, means the sovereignty of a government. I prefer a sovereignty beyond the government. The same principle was recognized by Daniel Webster. I cite him because, certainly, as a constitutional lawyer, our opponents cannot except to him; and if gentlemen think these propositions too radical, although supported by the authority of Mr. Justice Campbell, and of Mr. Justice Catron, and Mr. Justice Daniel, who concurred with him, I will introduce the very apostle of conservatism. In his famous argument in the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7th Howard, 31, 32, Mr. Webster said:

"The opposite counsel have cited the examples of the different States in which constitutions have been altered. Only two provided for conventions, and yet conventions have been held in many of them. But how? Always these conventions were called together by the Legislature; and no single constitution has ever been altered by means of a convention gotten up by mass meetings."

It seems Mr. Webster had not much opinion of the Topeka business.

"There must be an authentic mode of ascertaining the public will somehow and somewhere. If not, it is a government of the strongest and most numerous."

How was that will to be found out? The Legislature chosen by the people—the same authority which first directed the people when, where, and in what manner to elect delegates to form a constitution, each member of the Legislature, speaking on the instruction from his constituents received in the act of his election—inquire of the people: "will you have a revision of your constitution?" If so, choose your delegates; let them assemble at such time and place as we have provided by law, so that the business may be rightful and orderly and peaceable; and when those delegates shall have assembled in convention and made a constitution, whether upon their own motion or a popular ratification, instead of being a petition, as we are told here, that constitution is the fundamental and organic law of the land.

I have argued thus far as if the constitution of Kansas had no provision at any time for any amendment. What, then, would have been the case? I think I may say, without the citation of more authority, or further argument—it is a proposition too plain to be disputed—that the power which made a constitution can unmake or amend it. But, sir, is it true, as stated by the minority of the Committee on Territories, that the constitution of Kansas forbids any amendment? The minority allege that "inasmuch as the Lecompton constitution provides a mode of amendment after the year 1864, it thereby excludes the possibility of any lawful change until that period."

That is an argal for you. What does the constitution say? If the specific method of amendment therein contained be of any force, it is in derogation of the general, the universal, the indubitable power of amendment which would exist if no method had been prescribed. It is in derogation of a fundamental principle. Let us read the clause:

"After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives."

"After the year 1864." What may be done before that? The constitution is simply silent. There is no negative word here. The whole clause is in derogation, as I have said, of a universal principle; and yet, contrary to all the canons of interpretation I have ever read, instead of being strictly construed, Senators enlarge it to a circumference which its language cannot possibly embrace. What is the case before 1864? What it would be if there had been nothing in the constitution—just exactly the same. But the case does not end there. The constitution of Kansas has carefully guarded the rights of the people. Having provided a special method of amendment after the year 1864, it has taken pains to prevent any false construction. There are two principles which I think can be taken for certain. One is, that all the parts of an instrument must be taken together: one shall not destroy the rest—but each, in its place and in its order, shall receive a construction compatible with the integrity of the other parts. In addition, whatever derogates from the rights of the people must be strictly construed. That is another universal maxim of the law. Accordingly, the people of Kansas, in this constitution, have declared in their bill of rights—in that which declares the great principles behind all constitutions and above all governments—

"That the great and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and established, we declare."

Declare what? Let us hear:

"all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority"—

Not the authority of somebody who lived a hundred years ago, but—

"on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore"— because political power is inherent in the people; inherent, so that it never can be separated from them by any wit of man, by any form of language, by any provision of any constitution; "and therefore," because all free governments are founded on the authority of the people, and instituted for the benefit of the people—

"—therefore they have at all times"— not after the year 1864, but—

"at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish, their form of government, in such manner as they think proper."

They must do it, as Mr. Webster says, in a peaceable and orderly manner. The will of the people must be ascertained according to law. You cannot have it according to the doctrine of Topeka. It must be by form of law. The Legislature must give assent to the form of the law.

This constitution has said, after the year 1864, the form of law shall be thus and so; before 1864, it shall be the very same form of law by which the constitution was made. What was that? An act of the Legislature, in the first instance, inquiring of the people whether they would have a convention; and when the people responded, another act of the Legislature, providing for the election of delegates, and the assembling of a convention; and thereupon the act of the people in choosing the delegates, and of the delegates in assembling in convention, and forming a State constitution and government.

What is the effect of that provision in the fourteenth section of the schedule? I can state my views on that point distinctly. This constitution is an experiment; it is untried in all its provisions; it may work well, it may work badly; and therefore the good people of Kansas have said, until 1864, this which is new, this which is untried, this which is a mere experiment, shall remain subject to the will of the people, by their proper authorities, in due form of law to amend and perfect it, just as we are allowed in the Senate, I believe, to perfect a clause before any motion to strike it out; but, after 1864, if the constitution should stand so long, if, on experience, it proves to be sufficient, you shall be subject, not to a prohibition of amendment, but you shall proceed with the utmost deliberation. It shall then require more than a majority in the Legislature to submit any question to the people.

For these reasons, sir, it is my opinion, carefully and deliberately formed, that the people of Kansas, under this constitution, have as ample powers of revision and amendment as they could desire. If there be anything improper in their constitution, if there be anything which the delegates have inserted without due regard to the wishes of the people, whether it be African slavery, or a railroad system, or a banking system, or the qualification of State officers, or what not, then the people, if they deem it material, if they find it of any consequence to the administration of their government, the protection of their rights, the security of their liberties, may amend that, and amend it in due form of law. That is my opinion of the constitution, given, as I have said, after the most thorough examination of it, and all the principles which relate to this subject.

If any State, applying for admission, were to present a constitution declaring that, for some indefinite period, there should be no power of revision or amendment by the people, I would turn to that clause of the Federal Constitution which declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government. It would not be republican; it would be a despotism of parchment; it would compel the people to revolution. I think the essence of republican government is, that the people need never resort to violence. What is this guarantee contained in the Constitution of the United States? It is not a guarantee to the State government; it is not a guarantee to the Governor and Legislature of the State, because they are the very persons to be guarded against. It is a guarantee to every citizen of the State against his own government; and it has been placed under the guardianship of the Federal Government representing all the States, in order to prevent any usurpation, by anarchy, by the lapse of time, by the accumulation of abuses, in any of the States.

This brings me to the language of my proposed amendment. Entertaining the views which I have expressed, that a provision such as the minority of the committee impute to this constitution would be void, and therefore of no consequence; and entertaining furthermore a deliberate opinion that the right to alter, reform, or abolish the constitution in due process of law, in a peaceable and orderly manner, is not only admitted, but is declared and guaranteed, some gentleman may ask me what need of any amendment? I offer the amendment to silence a false clamor—for no other purpose in the world. As to my own judgment, individually, I should be perfectly satisfied to vote for the bill without it; but the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] early in this session, commented on that paragraph, in answer to several pertinent suggestions. He was reminded of the fact that the State of New York had changed her constitution in disregard of the mode of amendment provided in it—not by a revolution, for it was peaceably done; the people voted for it. He was reminded that many other States had done likewise. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] told us that his State has determined to do it, I believe within the last ten days, and neither party in the Legislature dissented. I believe the State of Indiana altered her constitution without pursuing the form of amendment prescribed in it. But what was the answer of the Senator from Michigan to all this? He was fully possessed of the idea that the people of Kansas were under some sort of terror and disability; that there was a great hostile influence ready to seize upon them; and he said to us, suppose they do alter the constitution before 1864: it will never avail. Indeed? The Legislature submits the question to the people; the people vote for amendment; then the Legislature provides for the election of delegates; the delegates are chosen and assemble, and they form a constitution; that constitution, if you please, is submitted to the people and ratified by the people. Who can prevent that constitution from taking effect? Not the Legislature, because the Legislature consented; not the people, because they voted for it; not the Governor, for he signed the bill, or his veto was overruled; not the courts of the State, for they will stand or fall by the constitution, and their judges are chosen by the people, either directly or through an appointment of the Governor.

Who is to prevent it? Oh! said the Senator, the Governor, or the man who claims to have been Governor, and to be serving out the fragment of a term, with or without the assent of the Legislature, (it must be without the assent of the Legislature, for they have already committed themselves to the new organization); the Governor, pretending that the Legislature could not be convened, will apply to the President of the United States to subdue the people of Kansas, and overthrow their new constitution, and the President will use the Army of the United States to subdue them. I do not believe that James Buchanan will, for he has declared twice, in the most unqualified manner, that he admits this right of the people to amend their constitution. But suppose that James Buchanan has ceased to be in office; let the Senator have the utmost limit to his imagination; let us suppose he can find a Governor in Kansas, serving out a fragment of a term, to call on some President who is regardless of his duty, and the President should attempt to use the Army of the United States for the purpose of subverting a constitution established by the people: then I say to the Senator, although it is the most improbable suggestion I ever heard, the farthest possible from all our experience, yet still, that there may be no excuse left, I will give him in this bill a curb for the mouth of any future President of the United States.

I believe it was also suggested that the judiciary of the United States might make some decision. Suppose the judiciary did; of what effect would be their mandate? I believe the judiciary of the United States sent a mandate to the State of Georgia, once upon a time, reversing the conviction of a prisoner for murder. The mandate was that the prisoner should be discharged. How did the judiciary of the United States succeed? The Legislature of Georgia passed a joint resolution directing the sheriff to hang the man on a day certain, and he was hanged. The mandate was of no effect; and if ten thousand judiciaries of the United States were to attempt to say to the people of a State, acting through the forms of law, "we will make your constitution; we will say what your constitution shall be;" they will have as little satisfaction as from that mandate addressed to the State of Georgia.

But, sir, the Supreme Court of the United States never will entertain such a question. The court has solemnly decided upon argument of eminent counsel in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that it had no power to decide which of two instruments was the constitution of a State. The decision is here in the book to which I have referred. I will even guard that. The Senator shall have such a declaration in the act of admission that no President and no judiciary shall ever interfere with that construction of the constitution of Kansas which her own people and her own duly constituted authorities may place on it. I will protect the right of the State of Kansas to interpret her own constitution; for it is her right, through her judiciary, through her Legislature, and through her State officers. I will protect it against the Federal Government; and that is the sole purpose of my amendment—not that I think the amendment necessary—not that I think any such emergency as the Senator suggests will ever arise, for I have not the slightest expectation of that; but, as I said, to silence a false clamor, that it may not go forth to be asserted from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that the Congress of the United States has oppressed the people of Kansas—has forced on them a constitution (I believe that is the phrase now) which is unalterable for eight, ten, or twenty years. To be sure, sir, there is a paragraph at the end of that section of the schedule to this effect:

"But no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

Why, said the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] although the rest of the constitution may be altered, they cannot abolish the institution of slavery! Mr. President, I would answer to that, if it were true, just what I answered before: the constitution could no more provide that one part of it should not be altered than none of it should be. This very clause, this fourteenth article of the schedule to the constitution of Kansas, was copied from the first constitution of the State of Ohio, with the single exception that the unalterable condition, as Senators call it, at the end, is the converse of what was in the first constitution of Ohio, namely, that no alteration should be made to introduce slavery into the State.

We had a convention of delegates in the State of Ohio, in May, 1850, of which three of my honored colleagues in the other House were members. I propounded to one of them, in December last, the question, "What was your view, as one of the delegates of the people of Ohio, when you formed our present constitution; did you understand that slavery could not be tolerated in this, if the people wished it?" "No," he said; "certainly we thought our powers unlimited; we excluded slavery in the new constitution because we did not like it, not because we were prevented by the old constitution." But the difficulty with this provision in the constitution of Kansas is, that it has no reference to the institution of slavery at all; it is a mere protection of a vested right in property; it extends simply to the persons held as slaves at the time of the alteration. In that the clause is simply a repetition of the bill of rights, namely, the tenth section: "Nor shall any person's property be taken or applied to the public use, unless compensation be made therefor." That clause would have been sufficient without the proviso contained in the schedule.

In that connection permit me to say here, rather as an episode, a few words as to the unfairness said to have been practiced on the people by the submission of the 21st of December. At one time I thought the complaint might possibly have some foundation, not having examined thoroughly the constitution of Kansas. When I heard eloquent Senators on this floor declare that no man was allowed to vote for or against slavery without also voting for the constitution, it struck me as the interpolation of a test in the right of suffrage as obnoxious as the test laws passed by the first Territorial Legislature of Kansas. When, however, I came to look at the question further, I saw that the constitution at large was not submitted at all, but only the seventh article. The seventh article has a name prefixed to it in the constitution; a title given to it—"Article seven, Slavery." That is the name of the article. It is just as much known by that name as each of us is known by his name. That seventh article is a simple addition to the constitution. The constitution is perfect without it; it would have been just as good a constitution without the seventh article as with it, and might have gone into effect without it; and at one time when I thought of offering a proposition to the Senate for the settlement of this question, before we knew fairly what the vote had been on the 21st of December, I proposed to admit the State of Kansas, and allow her people to vote afterwards, whether they would add the seventh article to the constitution or not, for it was just as good without the seventh article as with it; and they could add that afterwards if they chose.

What was the question submitted? The constitution with slavery; that is, with the seventh article; or the constitution with no slavery; that is, without the seventh article. The whole question submitted was, will you have the seventh article, "slavery," added to the constitution or not? Of course, the form of words must be brief, and can never, in any such case, perfectly express the issue; but I do not think, after full consideration, it could have been more satisfactorily done.

But now follows a difficulty. The Senator from Michigan declares it a pro-slavery constitution without the seventh article; and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says: "I would rather have it with the seventh article than without it; it is a better anti-slavery constitution with the seventh article in than without it." On what is all this founded? Because the constitution does not confiscate a vested right of property. I am not going into Dred Scott's case. God forbid. We have had enough of that this session. I will take the broadest doctrine of squatter sovereignty ever proclaimed in the Senate by my venerable friend, General Cass, the late colleague of the Senator from Michigan. General Cass always claimed that the Territorial Legislature might either exclude or establish slavery. I think a great many denied that it could exclude, or, in strictness, establish. They said it could not forbid, but might regulate. But General Cass, who was said to be the father of all squatter sovereignty, uniformly proclaimed—I could not tell how many times I have heard him proclaim it in this Hall—that every Territorial Legislature could establish or prohibit slavery.

Well, sir, the first Legislature of Kansas established slavery. It is not material whether they were right or wrong in this, whether they acted wisely or unwisely; that is not the question. Nor is it material whether that Legislature was rightly chosen or was a usurpation. Let me grant all that is claimed in that regard; let me admit for the sake of the argument what otherwise I never have admitted and never will admit, for I consider it a mere bald assertion—that every man, or the majority, if you do not require so much, of that Legislature in both branches was a mere naked usurper. What then? It has been settled from the earliest time that the act of a man under color of office, actually in office, exercising the authority of the office, although it cannot advantage himself, although it cannot prevent him from punishment, although it cannot prevent him from being ousted by quo warranto, although it does not authorize him to recover the fees of the office, is nevertheless valid as to third persons.

Here was a body of men de facto the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas. They passed a law authorizing slaves to be taken into Kansas. Here was an honest citizen of your State, sir, or of the State of Tennessee, or of the State of Missouri, who did not know whether the Legislature had been rightfully chosen or not; he had not read this great Kansas book of the last Congress; he was in the same state of blissful ignorance in which our Republican friends say most of us are to this day, including the President. He had slaves which were his by the laws of Kentucky, Tennessee, or Missouri. The title was recognized by the laws of his own State. It was property, valid property, for which he had paid, and he read in the statutes of Kansas that he had a perfect liberty to take that slave into Kansas with him, and that he and his slave might live peaceably together, and till the soil, and he went thither. Now they come to make a constitution; and do Senators seriously pretend that the cause of human freedom or the cause of honesty as between man and man requires that one who has acted in good faith, against whom no imputation of being connected with any usurpation or outrage can be made, shall be punished by the loss of that which was declared to be property by the laws of Kansas, as well as by the laws of the State whence he emigrated? That would be the confiscation of private property.

I grant that property in a slave may be taken by due process of law, but you must make compensation for it, as for any other property. It can be done under the constitution of Kansas. It is expressly declared that any man's property may be taken for the public use by making compensation. Even the Government of Great Britain, thoroughly anti-slavery as she is, provided compensation for every slave she emancipated in Jamaica, St. Christopher, and the rest of her West Indian dominions. Now the complaint is, that this constitution has not divested a present right of property. It extends no further than a present right. It follows the principle of the emancipation acts of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and other States. It declares that a slave, now a slave in the Territory of Kansas, shall remain such for his life, subject to be enfranchised by an act of the Legislature or by the act of his master—by the act of the Legislature on compensation. But is has no relation beyond those who are there now. The emancipation acts provided that the slaves then held as such should remain slaves for life, and their issue should remain slaves until the age of twenty-five. The constitution of Kansas is a better emancipation act than that one which Dr. Franklin proposed in the State of Pennsylvania, for it enfranchises the child from its birth. It is a great deal better than Dunn's bill, about which we heard so much in the last Congress; for Dunn's bill did make slaves of all the children born in Kansas, within two years from its date. Let us see whether this be not so. The schedule provides:

"If upon such examination of said poll books, it shall appear that a majority of the legal votes cast at said election be in favor of the 'constitution with no slavery,' then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from this constitution by the president of this convention, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with."

The institution of slavery is excluded by the sovereign voice of the people: "slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." I believe the Senator from Michigan undertook to say the issue would be slaves; but the "issue" are not slaves—not a whit more than if they were already in being and residents of the State of Michigan. It is the plain distinction between a present vested right of property and a contingency which may never happen. A vested right partakes of the character of property. When you confiscate or condemn a vested right of property, you must pay for it; but a right which may never accrue, and therefore is not vested, may be barred in advance, as this constitution has done. It simply amounts, without the seventh article, to a declaration that those slaves which had been taken into Kansas under the solemn authority of the territorial law, and who were there held as property at the date of the constitution, shall remain such, and the right of property in them be protected, unless the Legislature should emancipate them and provide compensation to the owner. I believe the State of New Jersey is in that condition at present. Certainly I think as late as the last census quite a number of negroes in the State of New Jersey were slaves. They were slaves before her act of emancipation, and that act did not divest the right of the owner in them. The consequence is, that, although we call New Jersey a non-slaveholding State, because she has abolished the institution of slavery, there are slaves held within her limits.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I expected. My principal purpose was to speak to my own amendment. I think—I am frank on that point—that the president of the constitutional convention is bound to finish his trust before Kansas ought to be admitted. I have always thought so. I do not think he has a right to withdraw his trust from our examination. I style him the mere trustee of an express trust. And whatever the constitution might be, if it were one entire and perfect chrysolite, what difference if the people do not control it? If those who have been elected to the various offices by the people do not obtain them? But, passing by that objection, which I hope will be obviated by his action—if not before the bill comes to a vote in this branch, before it be passed in the other—it appears to me, that although the history of Kansas has been a history of conflict, of quarrels, of troubles, which appear almost interminable, an opportunity is now presented for better times. There cannot be an election, there cannot be a Legislature, there cannot be a convention, without dispute. If regular on its face, some say it is fraudulent behind its face; and if not regular on its face, then it is void. We, grown men, some of us men of mature judgment and ripe experience, are to sit here in the Chamber of the Senate of the United States, in our comfortable chairs, and imagine that a scattered population on the prairie, who have been hastily gathered there within the last three or four years, will transact all their business, take their censuses, register their votes, hold their elections, and pass their laws, with the absolute accuracy of a clerk of the red tape in one of our Government offices. We ought never to expect that.

Now, instead of relating the history of past controversies, let us behold what the future has in store. I have always approached the case of Kansas with a disposition to avoid recriminations, and an anxious desire that in some wise and timely measure, which could receive the approbation, if possible, not only of Senators from the North and the South together, but of Senators from every political organization, we might, as an offering of common patriotism and devotion to our common country, redeem Kansas from the anarchy which has been coeval with her existence. At the first term of my service in this body, that engaged our attention before all other subjects; but only, as at this session, to provoke apprehensions and animosities. Now, sir, I trust that by enfranchising Kansas as a sovereign State, by vesting in her people, in the most ample and perfect manner known to our Constitution and our laws, the power to conduct her own government, to alter, amend, and reform her institutions in whatever particular those institutions may be objectionable, we shall redeem that which thus far has constituted the most sorrowful page in all the history of our Republic.

Mr. STUART. I desire to say now simply that at an early day I shall take occasion to allude to the most remarkable argument of the Senator from Ohio; but my purpose at this time is to perform a small office for the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] who had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Ohio. He desired to leave the Senate before the Senator from Ohio concluded his speech, and he wished it could be understood in the Senate before the adjournment that he would like to occupy the floor in the morning, to which I thought I could assure him there would be no objection. ["Certainly."] With such an understanding I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. A. HARRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER announced that the business first in order was the continuation of the call of the States for bills and resolutions.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is a little matter of privilege which I would like for a moment to bring to the attention of the House. It will consume but a moment, and I think the Chair will see that it is a question of privilege as soon as I state it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that no question of privilege can intervene until the order of the House of yesterday has been executed—an order by which the rules were suspended, and the Chair directed to call the States for bills and resolutions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that that resolution makes the call a special order; but I think a question affecting the privileges of the House might come in even during the consideration of a special order. It is a matter I desire very much to bring to the consideration of the House.

Mr. GROW. I understand that the resolution of yesterday was only to apply to that day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My question of privilege grows up under the rule regulating the proceedings of the committees of the House, in regard to publishing their reports before they are submitted to the House. I see the reports of some of the committees of the House appear in the public prints before they are made to the House.

Mr. MORGAN. Let us have the question of order settled, before the gentleman proceeds.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the question cannot intervene until the order of the House of yesterday has been executed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the States for bills and resolutions, under the following order adopted yesterday:

Resolved, That the Secretary be called, beginning where the Speaker left off, and upon said call members may introduce bills for reference only, and of which previous notice has been given, and resolutions for reference to which no objection is made; and said bills shall not again be brought before the House by motions to reconsider.

GRANT OF LANDS TO THE STATE OF IOWA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the House the amount of land certified to the State of Iowa for the purpose of building a railroad "from the city of Dubuque to a point on the Mississippi river, near Sioux City, with a branch from the mouth of the Tête des Morts to the nearest point on the said road, to be completed as soon as the main branch is completed to that point;" whether the said branch has been completed, and, if not, whether he has certified to the said State any land for building the main line of the said road beyond the point of intersection of the said branch from the mouth of the Tête des Morts.

SHADE CALLOWAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill for the relief of Shade Calloway; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TERRA JAPONICA.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to call the attention of the House to a resolution I introduced yesterday in reference to seeds and cuttings of the terra japonica. I think the matter was not understood. The article referred to is used in the process of tanning leather. From what I learned after the resolution was introduced, I judge that the matter was not understood. I therefore ask unanimous consent to introduce the resolution now.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for the purpose of obtaining a supply of the seeds and cuttings of the terra japonica for cultivation in this country.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

DISTRICT COURTS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, introduced a bill providing for holding terms of the United States district court at Cairo, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST ROUTE IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post route from Golconda, Pope county, to Raleigh, in Saline county, Illinois, and that they be directed to report by bill or otherwise.

PAYMENT OF MONEY TO MISSOURI.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill to pay to the State of Missouri the amount expended by said State for repelling the invasion of the Osage Indians; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PHELPS also introduced a bill to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Louis to San Francisco, with certain branches thereto, and securing to the United States a perpetual right to the priority of use of the same for all Government transportation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTES.

Mr. PHELPS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing post roads in the State of Missouri, from Bolivar, via Pleasant Hope, to Marshfield; from Fremont, via Wheatland, to Lamar; from Pilot Knob to Houston; and from Marshfield, via St. Luke, to Buffalo.

KANSAS BOUNDARY SURVEYS.

Mr. PHELPS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be hereby requested to communicate to the House a copy of the report of the survey of the southern boundary line of the Territory of Kansas, and the map accompanying the same; also, the report of Lieutenant Colonel Johnston, of the practicability of the country explored by him last summer, for a railroad; and that he also communicate to this House a copy of the report and of the map of the survey of the Creek Indian boundary line made by Captains Sargeant and Woodruff.

SHEPHERD AND CALDWELL.

Mr. ANDERSON introduced a bill for the relief of John H. Shepherd, and Walter K. Caldwell, of Pike county, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

POST ROADS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. ANDERSON also introduced a bill to establish certain post roads in the State of Missouri, namely: from Florida, in Monroe county, via Santa Fe, to Mexico, in Audrain county; and from High Hill, in Montgomery county, on the North Missouri railroad, by Price's Branch and Tiviot, in said county, and Truxton, Lost Branch, and Louisville, in Lincoln county, to Ashley, in Pike county; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LAND OFFICES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, introduced a bill to continue, temporarily, certain land offices in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MAIL ROUTES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a tri-weekly mail route from the town of Fayette, Howard county, via Bunker's Hill to Sturgeon, in Boone county, Missouri, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

ACCOUNTS OF LATE JOHN G. MILLER.

Mr. WOODSON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to adjust and settle the accounts of Hon. John G. Miller, deceased, late a member of the House, in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, from the State of Missouri, under the provisions of the compensation act passed at the first session of the said Congress, and on the same terms as the accounts of other members of said Congress were settled; estimating his salary from the 3d of March, 1855, when said Congress commenced, to the 11th day of May, 1856, the day of said Miller's decease; and deducting from said salary any amounts heretofore paid on account of said Miller's per diem during the said Congress; and that the remainder be paid to his legal representative.

RAILROADS IN KANSAS.

Mr. WOODSON introduced a bill granting the right of way to the Kansas City, Galveston and Lake Superior Railroad Company; and a portion of the public lands to the Territory of Kansas, to aid in the construction of the Kansas City, Galveston and Lake Superior railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

POST ROADS IN KANSAS.

Mr. WOODSON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post roads, to wit: from Waynesburg, in the State of Missouri, via Harrisonville, to Minnesota, in Kansas Territory; and from Independence, Missouri, via Hickman's Mill and New Santa Fe, to Fort Scott, in Kansas Territory; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

KANSAS VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. WOODSON introduced a bill granting the right of way to the Kansas Valley Railroad Company, and a portion of the public lands to the Territory of Kansas, to aid in building the Kansas valley railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ST. JOSEPH AND TOPEKA RAILROAD.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, introduced a bill granting the right of way to the St. Joseph and Topeka Railroad Company, and a portion of the public lands in the Territory of Kansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of St. Joseph in the State of Missouri, via Topeka, to the boundary of Kansas, in the direction of Santa Fe, in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ST. JOSEPH MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a marine hospital at the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, also introduced a bill to amend the existing laws in relation to bounty lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND TRIBUTARIES.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers by contract; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSOURI RESOLUTION.

Mr. BLAIR presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri in relation to additional townships for seminary lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

IMMIGRATION OF FREE NEGROES.

Mr. BLAIR asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to prohibit the importation or immigration of free persons from Africa under indentures of apprenticeship, or stipulations for service, into any port of the United States, and to make the same punishable with the same penalties inflicted upon persons engaged in the African slave trade in the act prohibiting that inhuman traffic.

Mr. LETCHER. That resolution gives absolute instructions; does it not?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to it.

CHOCTAW LANDS.

Mr. SINGLETON by unanimous consent introduced a bill for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I ask the consent of the House to present a resolution which was not ready when the State of Illinois was called.

Mr. LEACH. I object, until the call shall have been gone through with.

NEGRO STEALING IN THE INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. GREENWOOD introduced a bill to punish negro stealing in the Indian country; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. GREENWOOD asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be printed for the use of the Indian office.

Mr. LOVEJOY objected.

INSPECTORS DISTRICT AT NAPOLEON.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill providing for the establishment of an inspectors district at Napoleon, Arkansas.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has previous notice been given?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOWARD introduced a joint resolution respecting the distribution of certain public documents; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOWARD. This resolution is merely to supply a deficiency in the Department of the Interior for distributing some seven, eight, or ten copies of the public documents which have been furnished to the Territories and the District of Columbia, instead of going to the congressional districts. I suppose, if there be no objection, it may be put on its passage.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt that, upon a minute's explanation, members will see that the resolution is right. At the close of the last session of Congress, a law was passed requiring two hundred and thirty-five sets of the public documents, formerly lodged in the hands of the Secretary of State, and since placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, to be distributed in the several congressional districts. The Secretary of the Interior sent seven of those sets into the Territories; and the consequence is, that some of the congressional districts have not been supplied with them. This resolution is to supply the deficiency, and to enable the members of the several districts to designate the libraries to which they shall be sent, instead of the Secretary of the Interior. I understand the Secretary of the Interior desires it. The resolution makes no appropriation; and I hope it may be passed without delay.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if the object is not covered by the resolution introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina yesterday?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; the bill introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina does not relate to this at all. These books are on hand to be distributed, and the Secretary of the Interior would like to have the order passed.

The joint resolution was read in extenso.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected to its passage.

The resolution was then referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

INDIAN RESERVES IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. LEACH introduced a bill for the relief of the settlers upon certain Indian reserved lands in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT THUNDER BAY RIVER.

Mr. LEACH introduced a bill making an appropriation for the construction of a pier and light-house at the mouth of Thunder Bay river, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBORS AT MACKINAW CITY.

Mr. LEACH introduced a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbors at Mackinaw City, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT APPALACHICOLA.

Mr. HAWKINS introduced a bill for the erection of a marine hospital at Appalachicola, Florida; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRICT JUDGE OF FLORIDA.

Mr. HAWKINS introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the salary of the judge of the northern district of Florida; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

FORTIFICATIONS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. HAWKINS introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire as to the propriety and necessity of fortifying the mouth of the river St. John and the harbors of Tampa and Appalachicola, in the State of Florida; and that they report thereupon by bill or otherwise.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT POINT ISABEL.

Mr. BRYAN introduced a bill to provide for the erection of a custom-house at Point Isabel, in the collection district of Brazos Santiago, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FORTIFICATIONS IN TEXAS.

Mr. BRYAN introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report by bill or otherwise, a provision for the erection of suitable fortifications at the mouth of Brazos river, San Luis Pass, and Pasa Cabello, in Texas.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS LEGISLATURE.

Mr. BRYAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in relation to the payment of the public debt of Texas; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, a joint resolution of the same body in relation to Kansas; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN IOWA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, introduced a bill to establish an additional land district in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JOHN R. NOURSE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, also introduced a bill for the relief of John R. Nourse; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRANTS OF LAND TO IOWA RAILROADS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, also introduced a bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from McGregor, on the Mississippi river, to the west line of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, also introduced an act making a grant of land to aid in building a railroad in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS OF IOWA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, presented the following joint resolutions and memorials of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

A memorial for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Lansing and Northern Iowa and Southern Minnesota railroad;

A memorial asking Congress to appropriate a sum sufficient to the State of Iowa to indemnify the said State for all necessary expenses incurred in an expedition raised under authority of the Governor of the State of Iowa, to relieve the settlements on Spirit Lake, in March, 1857;

A joint resolution asking for bounty land warrants for the volunteers of the Spirit Lake expedition;

A joint resolution asking Congress for a grant of land to aid in the construction of certain railroads;

A memorial to Congress in favor of restricting the sale of public lands to actual settlers; and

A memorial for the relief of James B. Thomas and family.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

Mr. CURTIS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, be made the special order of the day for to-day, and each succeeding day for three days, or until the same be disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BILLINGHURST offered a joint resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses of Congress sine die on the first Monday in June next, at twelve o'clock, m., of that day.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If there be no objection I ask to have the resolution put upon its passage.

Mr. MILLSON. I object.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. POTTER offered the following resolution:

Whereas, the true policy of government requires that the legislative power shall not intervene between the legitimate objects of individual enterprise and competition; and whereas, the purity of government requires that its patronage shall be reduced and kept at its lowest possible limit; and whereas, the patronage dispensed by the Government of the United States through the Post Office Department is rapidly increasing, thereby extending and enlarging the influence and power of the central Government; and whereas, the Federal Government, while monopolizing the transportation of the mail matter of the country, and assuming the business of a common carrier, refuses to hold itself responsible to her citizens for losses which may occur through the negligence or default of its agents:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and they are hereby, requested to report to this House as to the expediency of abolishing the present postal system of the United States, and "leaving the people thereof perfectly free" to transmit and receive their letters and other mail matter "in their own way."

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to that resolution.

Mr. POTTER. It is merely a resolution for reference to a committee.

Mr. CLEMENS. Strike out the last two lines, or add "subject to the Constitution of the United States," and I will withdraw objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I object to the resolution.

LIGHT-HOUSE MATTERS.

Mr. POTTER offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House a report, in detail, of the disbursements made by the engineer, officer in charge, and the inspector of light-houses in district No. 11 on the northwestern lakes, stating how many, and at what points, lights have been exhibited during the season of 1857; also, what new works have been commenced and what completed, the repairs made, and at what points, the amount expended at each point; also the cost for material and subsistence, and the amount required to complete the work at each point where the work is unfinished; also how many, and what vessels, steamboats, tugs, or other water craft, have been chartered, purchased, or employed for the light-house service in the tenth and eleventh districts, and the tonnage of, and the nature of the service performed by, and the cost of each of said vessels, boats, or other water craft so chartered, purchased, or employed; also the cost of repairs of said vessels, boats, &c., and the cost of running the same up to the close of navigation of the year 1857; also the amount, in detail, of any outstanding claims against the Department for the use of any of said vessels, boats, tugs, &c., or for any work, labor, or materials, performed or furnished on any contract made and entered into on behalf of the board in district No. 11, and also the names of the claimants.

EXPLORATION OF AMOOR RIVER.

Mr. SCOTT offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House, as soon as practicable, if not incompatible with the public interest, all information that may be on file in the State Department relative to the exploration of the Amoor river.

HARBORS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SCOTT also offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the protection and preservation of the harbors of San Diego and San Pedro, in California; and to report by bill or otherwise.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. McKIBBIN introduced a bill to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the construction of military roads, and for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by said roads, from points on or near the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, and ordered to be printed.

CALIFORNIA BONDS AND CERTIFICATES.

Mr. McKIBBIN also introduced a bill making an appropriation for the payment of bonds and certificates issued by the State of California, for the payment of expenses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities in that State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. W. HOLLODAY.

Mr. McKIBBIN also introduced a bill for the relief of S. W. Holloday; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. KINGSBURY. I ask the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House take up Senate bills lying on the Speaker's table, and refer them to their appropriate committees, immediately after the House shall have completed its present order of business.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

MAIL ROUTES IN OREGON.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route by way of the military road from Salem, Oregon, to Astoria in said Territory, and also from Roseburg via the Coquill valley to Empire City, at Coos bay; also from Salem to Tillamook bay.

TERRITORY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, introduced a bill to extend the provisions of an act to amend an act to establish a territorial government in Oregon, and of an act to establish a territorial government in Minnesota to the Territory of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

MISSOURI AND COLUMBIA RIVERS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill for the construction of a wagon road connecting the navigable waters of the Missouri and Columbia rivers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC LAND SURVEYS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill to authorize augmented rates for surveying the public lands in the Territory of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CHARLES H. MASON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill for the relief of Charles H. Mason; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, presented joint resolutions of the Territorial Legislature of Washington relative to making Vancouver a port of delivery; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, joint resolutions of the Territorial Legislature of Washington relative to the erection of a marine hospital in that Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, joint resolutions of the Territorial Legislature of Washington asking a donation of the public lands for the erection of a lunatic asylum; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT introduced a bill to donate portions of the public lands to actual settlers in Kansas Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RAILROADS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT introduced a bill to aid the Territory of Kansas in the construction of certain railroads, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. PARROTT, also introduced a bill to amend the act of 4th September, 1841, entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preëemption rights;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SURVEYOR GENERAL, ETC.

Mr. PARROTT also introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor general in New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations of lands to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MILITARY ROADS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT also introduced a bill making appropriations for the repair of certain military roads in Kansas Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRISON FOR KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT also introduced a bill making appropriations for the erection of a public prison in Kansas Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. KINGSBURY asked leave again to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House take up the Senate bills lying on the Speaker's table, and refer them to their appropriate committees, immediately after the House shall have completed its present order of business.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, objected.

BILLS IN REFERENCE TO NEBRASKA.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. The Delegate from Nebraska is unable to be in his seat, being sick at his hotel. He has sent me four bills and joint resolutions, which he requests me to present for him, all referring to territorial matters.

No objection being made,

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, introduced the following bills and joint resolution for Mr. Ferguson, of Nebraska; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

A bill to complete the capitol buildings of Nebraska Territory. Referred to the Committee on Territories.

A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust the expenses incurred in defending the frontier settlements of Nebraska against the Indians in the year 1855. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill for the relief of Monroe D. Downs. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the expenses of the board of commissioners appointed under a joint resolution of the Territorial Assembly of Nebraska to prepare a code of laws for the government of said Territory. Referred to the Committee on Territories.

CAPTAIN HIRAM PAULDING.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Hiram Paulding; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Has notice of that resolution been given?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it has.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it in order to fix a day for the consideration of that resolution?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Is this a proper time to move a substitute for the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House for amendment.

COST OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. CRAGIN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be requested to report to this House the aggregate cost of the public printing, including cost of paper, binding, engraving, lithographing, and electrotyping, ordered by the Thirty-Third Congress; and also the aggregate cost of the same ordered by the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

PREVENTION OF THE COOLY TRADE.

Mr. WALTON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill more effectually to prevent the slave trade, under guise of the "cooly trade," so-called, or of "apprentices," or of "African labor importation companies," or under any other name, or in any other words, the real purpose or effect of which may be, directly or indirectly, immediately or ultimately, to make slaves of the persons so procured and transported.

Mr. HOUSTON objected.

CHANGE IN NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. COMINS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the number of vessels the names of which have been changed under the act of March 5, 1856, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases;" also, by whom such vessels were owned at the time of the change of names, and how many of such vessels have been lost or foundered at sea; and, also, the reasons assigned for changing the name of the late United States mail steamship George Law, to that of Central America.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT BOSTON.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and pay the balance due on a tract of land heretofore ceded for the purpose of a marine hospital for the district of Boston and Charles-town, to the credit of the naval hospital fund; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

Mr. KELSEY presented concurrent resolutions of the State of New York, in favor of granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of Indian wars, from 1791 to 1795; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, concurrent resolutions of the same body, in reference to the distribution of arms to the militia of the several States; which were referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the same joint resolution, respecting the distribution of certain public documents, which was presented just now by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD.] Objection is withdrawn.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I would like to inquire what will be the effect of that joint resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. In reply to the gentleman's inquiry, I will say this: by resolution of the last Congress, two hundred and thirty-five copies of public documents were placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior for distribution among the congressional districts. The Secretary of the Interior sent seven copies to the seven Territories, and gave two to the District of Columbia, taking out, in all, nine copies. The consequence was, that nine congressional districts have been left without copies, and this joint resolution is to supply the deficiency. The books are all on hand, and have not to be published.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAY OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, also introduced a bill to regulate and equalize the pay of the Navy and Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INSTITUTION FOR PROMOTION OF SCIENCE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, also introduced a bill for the relief of the National Institute for the Promotion of Science; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT OF 1857.

Mr. RUSSELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to report to this House the proper number of copies of the mechanical branch of the Patent Office report of 1857 to be printed for the use of this House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

NEW YORK BARGE OFFICE.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE introduced a bill making an appropriation for strengthening and securing the foundations of the United States barge office in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LANDS FOR AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE also presented resolutions of the State Agricultural Society of the State of New York, for the distribution of certain portions of the public lands to the States and Territories, for the benefit of agricultural colleges therein; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONVENTION OF ARTISTS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE also offered the following resolution:

Whereas, a convention of delegates from the different art institutions of the United States is to be held in the city of Washington on the 20th day of March, 1858: Therefore,

Resolved, That the convention be allowed the use of the old Hall of Representatives for its meetings.

Mr. BURNETT objected.

NEW YORK AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Mr. HATCH. I hold in my hand resolutions of the Agricultural Society of the State of New York, and I desire to have them read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

NIAGARA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. BURROUGHS introduced a bill granting land to the Niagara ship canal in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time. He moved that it be referred to a select committee of nine to be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. COBB. This is an important bill proposing to give away a large quantity of lands. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LETCHER. Out of regard to my friend, who sits by me, [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee,] I move its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals, as that committee has nothing to do.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it would be a good thing for the country if many of these committees had less to do.

Mr. BURROUGHS called for tellers on Mr. LETCHER's motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURROUGHS and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, nays 67.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee have always had charge of such subjects.

Mr. COBB. I moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands, because the bill makes an appropriation of the public lands.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I ask for tellers on the motion to refer to the Committee on Commerce. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WINSLOW and BUFFINTON were appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COBB. As my friends around me wish to indulge the gentleman from New York in having his bill referred to a select committee, I will withdraw my motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. COVODE. Is it in order to move to lay the bill on the table in this stage of the proceedings? I thought the order of the House provided that a bill should only be introduced for reference.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is in order, I imagine, if a majority choose to send it there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some doubt whether the motion is in order.

Mr. GROW. The same point arose yesterday, and the Chair decided it was not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I think the motion is not in order. The order of the House does not contemplate that any action shall be taken on bills introduced. Now, sir, to lay a bill on the table is direct action on its merits, and I think is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The language of the order is, that "the States be called, beginning where the Speaker left off; upon such call members may introduce bills for reference only, and of which previous notice has been given."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. "For reference only" is the object of the member who introduces the bill; but the House has power to dispose of what is introduced. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I object to debate.

Mr. STANTON. If you may lay it upon the table you may engross and pass it.

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably the bill could not be put upon its passage.

Mr. STANTON. Then I submit that you cannot lay it upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the Chair decide that my motion is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I make another motion. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays; and ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-five; (a sufficient number.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, Cocke, Cox, Burton Craig, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gregg, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, McClay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Warren, Watkins, Winslow, and John V. Wright—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Arnold, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Granger, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Poule, Ricard, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Searing, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—101.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Pending the call,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, stated that had he been in the Hall when his name was called he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. GROW stated that Mr. FENTON had been called home by urgent business, and had paired off with Mr. KELLY.

Mr. FAULKNER stated that Mr. GOODE was absent from indisposition.

The question recurred upon the motion to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BURROUGHS. That motion has been once made.

The SPEAKER. It was withdrawn. The House did not vote on it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cocke, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Watkins, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Arnold, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Gilman, Goodwin, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Ritchie, Ricard, Roberts, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Searing, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—94.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the bill to a select committee of nine; and it was agreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT SAG HARBOR.

Mr. SEARING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a custom-house and post office in the village of Sag Harbor, New York; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN POSTMASTERS.

Mr. SPINNER, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas, by a joint resolution of Congress, approved April 27th, 1816, the Secretary of State is required to compile and print, once in two years, a register which shall contain "correct lists of the officers and agents, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States, and which shall exhibit the amount of compensation, pay, and emoluments allowed to each officer;" and whereas, it appears from the register lately published by the present Secretary of State that the postmasters of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and other principal cities, receive $2,000 per annum, only; and whereas, it is the generally received opinion that in addition to a compensation of $2,000 per annum, postmasters in all cities receive large emoluments in the shape of box-rents; and whereas, postmasters are required by law to report to the Postmaster General, under oath, the amounts collected at their respective offices for box-rents: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement showing the amount collected for box-rent at the principal post offices for the year ending June 30, 1857; and that he be also directed to inform the House of Representatives whether the respective amounts set opposite the names of postmasters in the biennial register, include all emoluments retained by said postmasters, or whether said amounts exhibit the compensation alone, exclusive of emoluments.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ANDREWS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thomas Duer, of Monroe county, State of New York, have leave to withdraw his petition and the accompanying papers, a copy thereof being retained on the files of this House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. ANDREWS. It is proposed to leave copies on the files of the House. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman can take copies, and leave the originals here.

ELECTION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HOARD offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the election of postmasters by the legal voters doing business at the several post offices of the United States.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT PLATTSBURG.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a marine hospital at Plattsburg, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BREAKWATER, ETC., AT PLATTSBURG.

Mr. PALMER also introduced a bill for the completion of the breakwater at Plattsburg, New York, and the erection of light-houses thereon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOB STAFFORD.

Mr. PALMER submitted the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Job Stafford, of the State of New York, who was a soldier in the war of 1812, one hundred and sixty acres of land, in consideration of his having been engaged in an action with the enemy, and totally disabled by a cannon-ball from a British war-brig or gunboat, at the mouth of the river Boquet, on the 13th of May, 1814.

DUTY ON COAL AND IRON.

Mr. DEWART offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the revenue laws as to increase the duty on coal and iron.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT CAMDEN.

Mr. CLAWSON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a site and constructing a building for a post office and custom-house at Camden, New Jersey.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. CLAWSON also introduced a bill to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," to the officers and soldiers of the companies of Captains John Scull and Robert Smith, of Gloucester county, New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY introduced a bill to provide for the admission of Kansas into the Union; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PHELPS. Has notice of that bill been given?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It has been given. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read the bill.

The bill was read. It provides for the calling of an extra session of the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas, which shall apportion the Territory into sixty districts, from which delegates shall be elected, to whom shall be referred the Lecompton constitution, with power to amend the same. The amendments to be referred to a vote of the people.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I move that the bill be referred to the select committee having charge of the subject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Georgia on the table.

Mr. PHELPS. That will carry the bill with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a motion to lay on the table a motion to refer.

Mr. HUGHES. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Booneck, Bowick, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Cackie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochran, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Hoyer, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, McClay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Rubin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Frippe, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Aldrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lurwence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mattoon, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Israel Washburn—105.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. McQUEEN stated that his colleague, Mr. KEITT, had paired off with Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE.

Mr. CLAWSON stated that his colleague, Mr. ROBBINS, had paired off with Mr. WHITELEY.

Mr. COVODE stated that Mr. MILLER had paired off with Mr. EDIE.

Mr. BONHAM stated that his colleague, Mr. MILES, was detained from the House by indisposition; and that he [Mr. BONHAM] should have voted "ay" if he had been within the bar when his name was called.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, stated that Mr.

Wood was detained from the House by indisposition.

The bill was then referred to the select committee on Kansas Affairs.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. PURVANCE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill changing the duties on imports, so as to give increased and adequate protection to American manufactures; to abolish the warehousing system; establish a home valuation, and provide additional securities against defalcations of officers connected with the collection of the public revenue.

Mr. McQUEEN objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act for the relief of the owners of the brig Attica, of Portland, Maine; and

An act for the relief of James Rawden.

BANK OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas, the commissioners appointed by the Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to investigate into the condition and affairs of the Bank of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, in their report recently made, referring to certain expenditures, have stated that "to one of these accounts $25,000 is charged, which was given as a compensation to one individual, for services rendered in effecting the sale of the banking house to the Government for a post office;" and rumor having connected these transactions with persons holding high official position under the General Government, it becomes important to ascertain the truth thereof: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the matter, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will strike out that part of the resolution which provides for a select committee, and insert Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I will not object. We already have nine select committees, and we shall soon all be on select committees if we go on at this rate.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope that will not be done. I think the whole matter will be disposed of by the examination of three witnesses.

Mr. LETCHER. What objection is there to sending it to the Post Office Committee?

Mr. FLORENCE. Because the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have already more business on hand than they can dispose of, and it is important that we should have immediate action on the subject. I trust my friend from Virginia will not interpose an objection.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLEMENS. I believe we have five or six select committees now. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust the gentleman from Virginia will accede at least to this proposition?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Here are high officials [cries of "Order!"] charged with misfeasance, and the gentleman objects to an—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his motion and his objection.

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not understand that any officers—

Mr. FLORENCE. I was about to state that the objection came too late, as the question was about being propounded, all objection having been withdrawn.

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not understand that any officer of the Government, either now or in the past, is included in the subject-matter of that resolution.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. This charge was made in an official report to the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLEMENS. Against whom?

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Against certain persons connected with the Government.

Mr. CLEMENS. I withdraw my objection then.

The resolution was then agreed to.

PENSION ACTS.

Mr. FLORENCE introduced a joint resolution declaratory of the pension acts granting pensions to widows for the revolutionary services of their husbands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FLORENCE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the consent of the House is given to the withdrawal of the petition and papers of Rebecca J. Birdsell from the Court of Claims, to be referred to a standing committee of this body; and also to the withdrawal of the petition and papers of the heirs of General Harry Miller, from the files of this House, to be referred to a committee in the Senate.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to the last part of that resolution, but I have to the first.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I will take the first part out, and leave the second standing.

The resolution was modified accordingly; and, as modified, agreed to.

COLONEL CRABB.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had the honor, some time since, to present a resolution to the House, which was adopted, calling upon the President for information in regard to the massacre of Colonel Crabb and his men, upon the limits of the Republic of Mexico. I have in my hand the response which has been made by the President to that call. I have not yet had time to read it entirely. It contains, however, very important information which requires, to some extent, the action of the Government. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

No objection was made, and it was so referred.

PAY OF BOOK-FOLDERS.

Mr. FLORENCE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to the eight book-folders in the folding-room, the rate of three dollars each per diem, beginning with the present session: Provided, That no greater number be employed, unless under the direction and by order of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RUFFIN objected.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. COVODE introduced the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on the first Monday of June next, at twelve o'clock, meridian.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INFORMATION CONCERNING KANSAS.

Mr. GROW asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House copies of all instructions, by himself or any head of Department, to the Governor or other executive officer in the Territory of Kansas, and all correspondence with the same, together with a copy of the executive minutes of said Territory not already communicated to the House. Also, a copy of the constitution formed at Lecompton, together with a copy of the census and returns of the votes in the election of delegates to said convention in each election precinct in said Territory; and the returns of the election held in said Territory on the 21st of December last and 4th of January last, with the number of votes then polled respectively in each election precinct in said Territory, and copies of any other official papers in possession of the Secretary of State relative to Kansas affairs, not already communicated to Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS—AGAIN.

Mr. REILLY offered to introduce a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Several MEMBERS. Read the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. No good can grow out of the introduction of so many bills on this subject, and I object.

Mr. GROW. Has notice of that bill been given?

Mr. REILLY. It has not been.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object.

MARYLAND HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, presented a memorial of the Historical Society of Maryland; which was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

HARBOR OF ANNAPOLIS.

Mr. BOWIE introduced a bill to improve the harbor at Annapolis, in the State of Maryland; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DUTIES OF THE UNITED STATES CONSULS.

Mr. BOWIE, also introduced a bill further to define and prescribe the duties of the consuls of the United States, in foreign ports; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NATIONAL FOUNDERIES.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested, and he is hereby authorized, to direct examinations to be made by a board of competent officers, selected from the Army and Navy, of suitable locations for three national foundries, for the manufacture of cannon, projectiles, and other munitions of war, and castings for the service of the United States; and that the report of said board of examiners, when made, be communicated to Congress as soon as practicable.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

CAPTORS OF TENDER OF THE DAUNTLESS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the bounty land laws to the gallant captors of the tender, with eighteen men, from the British ship of-war Dauntless, in the war of 1812, in the waters of Choptank river; with power to report by bill or otherwise.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, also offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That permission be granted to Doctor Bernard M. Byrne to withdraw his petition and accompanying papers as to losses in the Florida war, from the files of the House, for the purpose of transmitting the same to a committee of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Patents, a bill to amend the several acts now in force in reference to the Patent Office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] was referred to the select committee; and I also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not necessary. The bill cannot be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

NATIONAL FOUNDERIES.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I desire to move instructions to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that they inquire into the expediency of constructing three national foundries. I hope gentlemen will not object to that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Maryland can offer a resolution like this: "Resolved, that the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of proposing the following joint resolution."

Mr. DEAN. I object.

MEMORIAL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial from the members and officers of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah to the President and Congress of the United States. [Calls of "Read! read!"]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to its being read. I move that it be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; or that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER submitted the question, "Shall the paper be read?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

The memorial was read, as follows:

Memorial from the members and officers of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, to the President and Congress of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: Your memorialists beg leave to represent that, at the last session of the Legislative Assembly of this Territory, resolutions and a memorial to the President of the United States were adopted, and presented to him, which partially set forth our grievances, and made known to the Government at Washington our desires and wishes in regard to the appointment of the Federal officers for Utah. We have received no response to these documents, unless it is to be understood that the appointment of a full set of officers for this Territory, backed by an army to enforce them upon us—as reported by common rumor to have been ordered and fitted out, and sent to this Territory by the President—is to be deemed an answer. Certain it is that such an army is now invading our Territory, claiming to have been sent by the authority of the President of the United States.

We now forward to you, respectively, to wit: the President and each House of Congress, a printed copy of those resolutions and memorial; and if it is true that the army now menacing this Territory is at the instance of the President, and by the authority of the Government, we request to be informed of the fact, and why it is so; for what reasons our resolutions and memorial are treated with silent contempt, and a hostile course pursued towards an unoffending people; why it is that our eastern mails have been stopped, and the communication between this Territory and the General Government cut off?

If officers had been appointed and sent in accordance with the voice of the people, as ever should be the only course in a republican government, there would have been no need of an army being sent here. Were the resolutions and memorial disrespectful or defiant? Read them again, and see. There is not a word or sentiment in them that can fairly be construed to throw obstacles of any kind in the way of good men that might be appointed to rule over us; they simply express a fixed determination not to submit to the misrule of corrupt demagogues who are a disgrace to the Government, and who, as subsequent events have proved, expended their time in endeavoring to create a disturbance between us and the General Government. Cannot American citizens, upon American soil, be heard in their own defense? Can they not petition the parent Government without incurring its hot displeasure? Are we to be sacrificed because lying officials and anonymous letter-writers wish it so? And does the Government rely upon their false statements to base its action—and such action; to send an army compromising the constitutional rights, the liberties, of freemen? Are the horrid scenes of Missouri and Illinois to be reenacted by the General Government? Are we to be robbed and plundered, our best men slain, and the residue again driven from their homes by a merciless and infuriated soldiery under authority usurped by the General Government? Do you not know, gentlemen, that when Government ceases to perform its legitimate functions to the people, and to protect them in their inalienable rights, among which, as our fathers declared, are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and seeks to oppress and destroy; it becomes an object of dread, of terror, a foul disgrace to its name, and cannot expect the support, respect, and esteem which should be its pride, and is its duty to inspire? We appeal to you as American citizens who have been wronged, insulted, abused, and persecuted; driven before our relentless foes from city to city, from State to State, until we were finally expelled from the confines of civilization, to seek a shelter in a barren, inhospitable clime, amid the wild and savage tribes of the desert plain. We claim to be a portion of the people, and as such have rights which must be respected, and which we have a right to demand. We claim that in a republican form of government, such as our fathers established, and such as ours still professes to be, the officers are and should be the servants of the people, and not their masters, dictators, or tyrants.

To the numerous charges of our enemies we plead not guilty, and challenge the world, before any just tribunal, to the proof. Are we mistaken in our views in regard to the policy and intention of Government? We hope that you will prove to us that we are. We ask you to reconsider the course that has been taken; to censure by some act of returning justice, that you respect our constitutional rights, and see whether it will not lighten the burden of oppression which you have inflicted; and that the people may have just cause to rejoice in and applaud—not condemn—your acts, withdraw your troops, and give us a voice in the selection of our officers; thus proving to us your willingness to extend peace, rather than to continue this Territory is a part of the public domain of the United States; but how was it acquired? Did not the people of Utah furnish, at the call of the Government, an altogether unprecedented quota of troops to aid in the war then raging with Mexico; and that, too, under the most adverse circumstances? And did not the people settle that Territory while it was still under the dominion of Mexico? And did not the Government discharge the Mormon battalion in an enemy's country, after a most toilsome march of over two thousand miles, without furnishing them the means to return? Your present acts would deprive of life and liberty those very men who so gallantly periled their lives for the common good. We do not charge the acts of his predecessors upon the present incumbent; but now restore unto us our rights in Missouri and other States, of which we were most inhumanly robbed; reinstate and guarantee unto us the peaceful possession of lands, for which you have taken and yet retain our money; bring to justice the murderers of Joseph and Hyram Smith, who were massacred while in the custody of the law, under the pledged faith of a sovereign State; punish the assassins of Parley P. Pratt, who slew their unresisting victim beneath the portals of the court which had pronounced him guiltless; restore unto us our political, religious, and inalienable rights, that we may have reason to believe that you are our friends, and not our enemies; execute justice and judgment upon the guilty, and spare the innocent; let truth, honesty, industry, love of right and liberty, stand unmoled and protected by your acts, as they are by the very genius of our loved institutions. Do that, and you will do more towards rescuing our beloved country from its foul pollution and its fearful doom, than can be accomplished by endeavoring to destroy a people who, under the broad folds of the Constitution, deem it no sin to unite in worshipping God according to the dictates of their own consciences. Pay us a few hundred thousand dollars, which the Government honestly owe us for suppressing Indian hostilities, and maintaining peaceful relations with the native tribes, instead of expending millions to deprive a portion of your citizens of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Try on the plaster of friendly intercourse and honorable dealing, instead of foul aggression and war. Treat us as friends—as citizens entitled to and possessing equal rights with our fellows—and not as "alien enemies," lest you make us such.

You have never cherished nor fostered this as you have other Territories, though having more claim to your generosity, forbearance, and protection. In 1856, we adopted a republican constitution and form of government, and forwarded those documents, a census report, and a petition to be admitted into the Union as a free, sovereign, and independent State, but an unhallowed prejudice was so strong against us that our Delegate found no member of Congress willing to present and advocate our position. Why not grant us admission, and thereby, at the same time, act justly and peacefully and wisely dispose of a vexed question? You have appointed, the newspapers state, a full set of officials for Utah from among entire strangers, and to do so were obliged to hawk about the offices from State to State, every honorable and principled man indignantly declining your appointments, until at length you succeeded in finding the requisite number from among the reckless, the drunken, the unprincipled, the dissolute, the houseless, and penniless, who alone feel the need of the backing afforded by bayonets, and for this reason had far better remain where society is more congenial to their depraved and corrupt tastes. No doubt such is the character of the present appointees, for what other class would accept offices among a people where they well knew they were not wanted, and hence had no right officially to be? All we have further to say of them is, they had better tarry with their friends, if they really have any.

We claim that we should have the privilege, as we have the constitutional right, to choose our own rulers and make our own laws, without let or hindrance. Examine our reports, our laws, our acts, they have ever been before the public—they speak for themselves. All we want is the truth and fair play. The Administration have been imposed upon by false and designing men; their acts have been precipitate and hasty, perhaps through lack of due consideration. Please to let us know what you want of us before you prepare your halts to hang, or "apply the knife to cut out the loathsome and disgusting ulcer?" Do you wish us to deny our God and renounce our religion? That we shall not do. We are at the defiance of earth and hell to prove that we have done aught to offend the ood. You have not extended to Utah so much as the customary usage of investigation, which would have placed in your possession the facts in the case. Do you wish us to permit a hurling soldiery to come into our settlements? If so, for what object? Is it to protect the citizens in their rights? That is needless, because those rights have never been the least infringed upon in Utah; and we are far better prepared to protect ourselves than when we first settled in this Territory, while our young and healthy men were in the United States Army in Mexico. United States troops, acting in their legitimate capacity, are only sent to protect the citizens or suppress insurrection, and never, in any case, to make war upon the people. We feel as competent to protect ourselves as we have hitherto, and there is no insurrection to quell.

That "white heap" within our borders contains something besides meat; there are the deadly fangs to hold the innocent prisoners still, while assassins kill them. We shall not again hold still, while fetters are being forged to bind us. We have no confidence to believe the present armies, which claim to have been sent by the Government, have openly said, from the time they have left the Missouri river, and even before, that they were coming to destroy the leaders of our people, and that that was their object. That has been their constant speech by day, and the burden of their songs by night. They have threatened to take our lives, and to sport at pleasure with our wives and daughters. That is their openly avowed object, but woe to all who undertake to accomplish it. We trust, therefore, that you will excuse us if we do not entertain a very exalted idea of your humane (?) intentions, in sending armies hither. Give us our constitutional rights; they are all we ask, and then we have a right to expect. For them we contend, and feel alone justified in so doing.

We are aware that we have many enemies, and that they make a strong party against us. From them we expect no mercy. A large portion of them know that, if justice had its due, they would either be pulling hemp by the neck, or learning a trade in the confines of a prison. They roam at large in your community, are boon companions in your halls of business and of pleasure, adorn your circles of fashion, and participate in your festivities; but there is a chord of right, of honesty, integrity to the institutions of our country, of a love of freedom, and a respect for the rights of the weak and comparatively defenseless, that will yet thrill with emotion, vibrate through the honest heart, and respond to the cry of usurpation, tyranny and oppression exercised upon an innocent people. To that we appeal, and trust that a stern sense of justice yet remaining among the worthy sons of patriotic sires will stay the suicidal hand of crawling sycophants and corrupt rulers, and that American liberty may not be immolated upon her own altars, nor strangled in the halls of her own citadel, by those whose sworn duty it is to be her protectors.

Withdraw your troops; give us our CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS; and we are at home.

Pending the reading of the above paper,
Mr. JOHN COCHRANE and Mr. COX severally made motions to suspend the reading; which motions were not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair felt it his duty to lay this communication before the House, inasmuch as it purports to be from the Territorial Assembly of Utah, and appears to be signed by all the members of that body.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, moved to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. MILLSON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. A. HARRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with resolutions of the Senate of February 15 and March 8, a copy of Captain T. J. Cram's military and topographical memoir, report, and maps, on the department of the Pacific, together with a letter from the Hon. I. I. STEVENS and a report of Captain A. A. Humphrey on the character of that memoir; which, on motion of Mr. BIGLER, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a memorial from the members and officers of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, addressed to the Congress of the United States, in which they set forth their grievances, and desire the withdrawal of the troops of the United States from the Territory.

Mr. STUART. I suppose it is hardly necessary to read that document. I move its reference to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HAMLIN. It should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING. Had it not better be printed?

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us have it read.

Mr. STUART. I think it should go to the Committee on Territories, although it asks for a withdrawal of the troops. It is a statement of the internal affairs of the Territory, if it is anything. I think it ought to be printed, but it certainly ought to go to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BIGLER. I think it ought to be printed. The motion to print was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless some motion to a different effect be made, it will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

It was so referred.

Mr. BIGLER. I have been requested to present to the Senate the memorial of James C. Chisty, Edward Wickersham, William M. Armstrong, C. McAllister, and others, citizens of the city of Philadelphia, who are creditors of the State of Texas. The memorialists express their surprise that the Legislature of Texas should have passed resolutions claiming for the State of Texas the balance of the appropriation now in the Treasury, made on the 28th day of February, 1855, for the creditors of that State. They remonstrate against the purpose of that resolution. They claim the balance of that appropriation for the benefit of the creditors, and pray Congress to pass a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the balance now remaining in the Treasury among the creditors who have filed their claims in pursuance of law. I ask its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Eliza E. Ogden, praying to be allowed a commission on certain disbursements made by her late husband, Major Edmund A. Ogden, while acting as assistant quartermaster in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of Lawrence Kearny, a captain in the United States Navy, praying compensation for certain expenses incurred and services rendered; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and a motion by him, to print the memorial, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented papers in support of the claim of Catharine Kellar to a pension, for the services of her husband, Conrad Kellar, in the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. GREEN presented the petition of James H. Birch, Jr., for himself and others, praying to be protected in their location of certain lands in the Plattsburg land district; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a petition of residents of Klamath county, California, praying that the Pacific mail steamship company may be required to land the mails at Trinidad; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WADE presented resolutions of the board of trade of Cleveland, Ohio, in favor of an appropriation of public lands to aid in the construction of a ship canal around the falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying for a donation of land for the establishment of a scientific agricultural school in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GWIN presented petitions of citizens of California in favor of the establishment of the following post routes: From Sacramento City by Davis's Ranch, Putah, Vacaville, Suisun City, Sonoma, to Petaluma in Sonoma county; from Belmont to Purcell's Store, Piscadary and William's Landing, to Santa Cruz, in Santa Cruz county; from Oroville by Bidwell's Bar, Peaville, Brush Creek, Meadow Valley, to Quincy in Plumas county; from Jackson to Volcano, in Amadore county; from Sacramento City, by Washington, Cashville, Cache Creek, Yolo City, and Cañon, to Clear Lake, Napa county; from Sacramento City by Onisleo and Walnut Grove, to Georgian Slough in Sacramento county; from Mokelumne Hill by Rich Gulch, to West Point, in Calaveras county; from Knight's Ferry by La Grange, to Honilas, Mariposa county; from Nevada City by Alpha, to Washington, in Nevada county.

They were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Brown, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Court of Claims.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Joshua Barney have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

NATIONAL FOUNDERIES.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of selecting three sites for national foundries for the manufacture of cannon, projectiles, and other castings, for the service of the United States; one of the said sites to be east and one west of the Alleghany range of mountains, and the third in the State of California.

SENATORS' DESKS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the use of desks for members ought to be dispensed with in the new Senate Chamber.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 204) to provide for issuing patents in certain cases where grants of the public lands have been made by Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in relation to indemnity for expenses of the State in the Sioux outbreak in 1857, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Susannah Hayne Pinckney, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 205) for the relief of Susannah Hayne Pinckney, sole heir of Captain Richard Shubrick. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Colonel Samuel Hammond, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Jane M. Kean, Mary A. Reynolds, and Catharine E. Kean, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Smith Stafford, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of lieutenants in the United States revenue marine service, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 206) increasing the pay of certain officers of revenue cutters, while serving in the Navy of the United States. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Douglass Ottinger, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the papers relating to the application of Commander Thomas J. Page, and other naval officers of the La Platte exploring expedition, for extra pay, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a resolution (H. R. No. 19) respecting the distribution of certain public documents; and a resolution for the adjournment of Congress; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. STUART. It is understood that to-day the Senator from Kentucky intends to speak upon the Kansas question, and inasmuch as there seems to be no further morning business, I wish to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar, and so continue until one o'clock, unless the Senator from Kentucky should desire to go on before that hour. There is nothing

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 73.

on the table, I think, in the shape of resolutions, that we shall profit by the discussion of.

Mr. BIGGS. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan the impropriety of taking up business of that character in the absence of so many Senators. It may be that many of them have objections to some of these private bills, and it seems to me to be very improper to take them up for consideration with so few Senators in their seats.

Mr. STUART. If any bill be objected to, it will go over of course. I only wish to take up such business as there can be no objection to.

Mr. BIGGS. It may be that those very Senators who are absent would interpose an objection if they were here. Some of those bills are important.

Mr. STUART. What are we to do?

Mr. BIGGS. Go on with the debate.

Mr. STUART. We cannot go on with the debate, for the Senator from Kentucky is not here. I think we can take up the Private Calendar and dispose of much of that class of business without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the motion to the Senate. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was declared to be agreed to.

Mr. BIGGS. I suggest the propriety of ascertaining whether there is a quorum present, because I certainly shall object to the transaction of any business, whether on the Private Calendar, or any other business, without a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present. There are twenty-five Senators in the Chamber. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. BIGGS. (Mr. CRITTENDEN having arrived.) I hope, if the honorable Senator from Kentucky is prepared, he will proceed with the discussion of the special order.

Mr. STUART. There is evidently a quorum about the Senate Chamber. Senators are rarely ever in their seats at this hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair counted every Senator within the walls of the room.

Mr. HALE. I have come in since.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is still not a quorum.

Mr. HALE. Send down to the Committee on Naval Affairs. There are three or four Senators there.

A pause ensued.

Mr. STUART. I think there is a quorum of the Senate present now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. STUART. I will ask for the yeas and nays on my motion. I think that will determine whether there is a quorum here or not. My motion is that we now proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. You cannot call the yeas and nays on the motion, when there is not a quorum.

Mr. STUART. I submit that that is the real and true way of ascertaining whether there is a quorum. Senators are all about here; and, on a call of the yeas and nays, will answer to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will direct the yeas and nays to be taken; but it is not in order if anybody objects.

Mr. BIGGS. I shall certainly object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senate been called to order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; and the Senate has transacted some business; but there is not a quorum here at present.

Mr. HALE. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I wish to make a little speech, about five minutes long, in answer to a suggestion made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] a short time since; and I would as lief do it to a minority as to a quorum. If there be no objection, I will make it now. ["Go on."]

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator from Louisiana, in a speech which he made on Thursday, the 11th instant, used this language in reference to the Toombs bill:

"Every Senator on this side suggested amendments; and when the bill finally passed the Senate, it extorted from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] the admission that it was fair, that it was unexceptionable: 'Give us that, and we are content.'"

The latter part has quotation marks.

During the last presidential campaign, in the State of Pennsylvania, one of the leading papers of that State had, I do not know for how long, but, I believe, nearly throughout the whole campaign, this same quotation: "Be it remembered, that Senator Hale said that the Toombs bill was unexceptionable." Now, I have not the slightest idea that the Senator from Louisiana supposed he was quoting anything else but exactly what I said; and he was only saying what a great many other people have declared, who put any sort of confidence in what I do say; but as an issue is attempted to be made out of that, I wish to state, for the benefit of the truth, what I did say. I have the Globe before me, and I will read the extract:

"But, sir, I do not want to dwell on that subject, but to speak a very few words in reference to this bill, which has been introduced by the Senator from Georgia. I take this occasion to say that the bill, [that is, the Toombs bill,] as a whole, does great credit to the magnanimity, to the patriotism, and to the sense of justice of the honorable Senator who introduced it. It is a much fairer bill than I expected from that latitude. I say so because I am always willing and determined, when I have occasion to speak anything, to do ample justice. I think the bill is almost unexceptionable; and if it could be put in the hands of agents who would carry it out faithfully, I think it would be less exceptionable than it now appears to be; but you will perceive that it is committed to the present Administration to carry it out; and the action of that Administration in the affairs of Kansas, whatever else may be said of it, I can say, and nobody can deny it, has not been such as to inspire any confidence in me. I have no confidence at all in them; and that is one of the objections to the bill."

I then went on to point out several objections to the bill, and proposed to remedy them by amendment, and in the close of my remarks, I said, "I have stated my objections to this bill;" and to show you that it was not so understood during the pendency of the bill, when the gentleman who introduced it [Mr. Toombs] spoke in reference to what I said, he declared:

"My convictions are confirmed by the honorable contrast to these gentlemen presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who though he may differ from me—and I doubt not we shall differ in the end on this matter—presents his objections in a manly and patriotic manner. Though we disagree, I respond to the spirit with which he offers his amendments, and makes his objections."

That is what he said. I desired at that time, as I always desire, to be perfectly candid; but I find it is getting to be dangerous to be candid, because the qualified commendation which I gave to it was stripped of the qualification I put on it, and it was trumpeted through the papers as an endorsement by me of the whole bill. I believe that the bill in its terms and upon its face was a fair bill, and if we could have had honest men to administer it, it would have done well. I had faith that we should get a better set of men after the 4th of March than we had before, but that faith has not ripened into reality. I have no such idea now. Having made this explanation, I leave the subject.

Mr. BENJAMIN. One word, and one word only, sir. The Senator from New Hampshire does me no more than justice when he says that I would not willingly misconstrue or pervert anything he may have said on the occasion referred to. I cannot help the fact that in the report of my speech in the Globe, quotation marks may have been put to the phrase to which he refers. I desire to say simply that I did not refer to his speech when, in the course of the remarks I made in the Senate the other day, I made allusion to his statements at the time the Senator from Georgia introduced his bill. What I stated was from memory. I heard the Senator at the time, and the impression was made on my mind very distinctly that he considered the Toombs bill as a fair and just bill. I do now, from his statement, recall distinctly to mind that he said, at the time, his principal objection was the want of confidence in those who were to administer it. What the Senator has just said, I think, as a whole, confirms what I stated in my speech; that is, the intimation that he had no objection to the bill, but that he was afraid it would not be executed fairly. He had not confidence in the public officers to whom its execution would be intrusted. I say this in a spirit of entire kindness to the Senator, and disclaim any desire to pervert or misconstrue anything he declared.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. STUART. I move to proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky would prefer to go on at one o'clock, and I wish to consume the intervening time—that is all.

The motion was not agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN KANSAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is a resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois, calling for information in reference to the elections in Kansas.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the consideration of that resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. MEADE'S INSTRUCTIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts, in reference to the instructions of the Minister at Brazil.

Mr. WILSON. I move that it be passed over until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF CLERKS.

Mr. BROWN. The Senate seems to find some difficulty in finding a subject to act upon. I have been very much importuned by parties interested to call up the bill (S. No. 151) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the civil Departments of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia." It is not likely that it will lead to any debate. It is a private bill which will put the Government to no expense. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BIGGS. I understand by that bill that some section of a former act is proposed to be repealed. I should like to understand what is the object of the repeal.

Mr. BROWN. I will explain in a single word. There has for a long time existed here a society known as the Provident Association of Clerks, of Washington City. They propose to surrender their franchise and divide whatever money there may be on hand. The scheme has not worked according to the expectation of the parties engaged in it, and they want to get clear of it—that is all. They desire that any money that is left may be returned to the parties.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILSON. I learn that the Senator from Kentucky is ready to proceed with his remarks, and I move that the Senate take up the special order.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I feel how inadequate I am, Mr. President, to add anything to the various arguments that have been employed on this subject during the long discussion through which we have passed; and yet I should not perform my duty, according to my views, if I omitted to express my sentiments and feelings on the subject before the Senate. I do not intend to occupy your time with exordiums, sir. The right of the people to govern themselves is the great principle upon which our Government and our institutions all depend. It seems to me that this great principle is not inapplicable to the present subject.

The President of the United States communicated to us an instrument called the constitution of the people of the Territory of Kansas, and he has, with unusual earnestness, advised and recommended to us to admit Kansas under that constitution, as a State, into this Union. The question, as it has presented itself to my mind, involves an inquiry as to the matters of fact bearing upon this instrument of writing, and whether these authorize us to regard this instrument as the constitution of the people of Kansas. Is it their constitution? Does it embody their will? Does it come here under such sanctions that we are obliged to regard it, or ought to regard it, as the permanent, fundamental law and constitution of this new State? I do not think it comes with such a sanction, or ought to be regarded as the constitution of the people of Kansas. Sir, I shall not occupy your time long on this point.

What are the evidences that it is so? It is made by a convention, to be sure, called under the authority of an act of the Legislature of Kansas. It is made by delegates regularly elected by this people, and prima facie it would appear that it had the sanction of the people of Kansas; but I think there are evidences of a higher character to show that it is not so, that it is but in appearance a constitution, and not in reality.

In the first place, the fact is established beyond all controversy that an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to this instrument as their constitution. The two highest officers of the Federal Government lately there under appointment from the President of the United States, Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, both assure us of that fact upon their personal knowledge. That is high evidence to establish the fact that it is against the will of an overwhelming majority of the people upon whom it is to be imposed as a constitution.

That constitution in part was submitted to the people. I shall not stop now to inquire how it was submitted, whether fairly or not. A part of it was submitted, however, to the people, and, upon a vote taken by the people on the clause thus submitted, it received six thousand votes, and a little more. These are the sanctions with which it comes to us. To this extent, it would seem to have the popular approbation. But, sir, when you come to look a little further into the investigations which have taken place in that Territory, it appears that of those six thousand votes, about three thousand were fictitious and fraudulent. That is reported to us by the minority reports of our Committee on Territories; that is verified to us by the proclamation issued by the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas. These high officials, who were invited by Mr. Calhoun to witness the counting of the votes which were returned to him, certify from their personal knowledge that more than two thousand of the three thousand votes which were given at three precincts in the counties of Johnson and Leavenworth were fictitious votes. I only call your attention to this in order that it may appear truthfully who it was that approved of this constitution.

That vote was taken on the 21st of December. Before that vote was taken, however, a Legislature, which was elected in October last, and which met on the call of the acting Governor, Mr. Stanton, in December, passed an act postponing that vote from the 21st of December to the 4th of January. On the 4th of January, under the provisions of that act, a question was taken upon the constitution itself broadly. It provided that the question should be taken upon the Lecompton constitution with slavery, upon the Lecompton constitution without slavery, and generally upon the constitution itself. Upon that occasion, over ten thousand voted against the constitution; and the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas have passed resolutions unanimously protesting against the reception by Congress of this instrument as the constitution of the State, declaring that it was obtained by fraud, and that it has not the sanction or concurrence of any, except a small minority of the people. This is the substance of their resolutions.

Now, I ask you, sir, upon this evidence, as a judge, to say whether this is the constitution of the people of Kansas or not? whether the evidence before you is that it is an instrument signifying their will and declaring that general and permanent law upon which they wish their government to be founded? Unless you shut your eyes to the vote taken on the 4th of January, here is a direct popular evidence and protest against the constitution; and, even supposing the whole of the six thousand votes which were given for it on the 21st of December to be true and real votes, fairly expressed, it shows that there were ten thousand other people in the Territory of Kansas who are opposed to this instrument and who have legitimately declared their opposition. Here is the solemn act of the Legislature of the Territory protesting against it. These are recorded evidences, as much so as the constitution itself is a record, having the same legal sanctions and the same legal title to our faith and our confidence. How are you, in law, to make any difference between these testimonials; to say that you will give effect to one and will reject the other; that you will give effect to that which testifies for the minority of the people, and will reject that which testifies for the majority of the people; that you will accept that which was first given, and reject the last expressions of the popular will?

It is these last expressions of the popular will that ought to govern on every principle, just as much as that a former law must yield to a subsequent law in any point of conflict between them. The last evidence, then, is the vote of the people on the 4th of January, of ten thousand against it; and the evidence nearly cotemporaneous with that is the resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, protesting and imploring you not to accept this instrument, that it is a fraud and an imposition upon them. I want to know why it is that this evidence is not entitled to our consideration and to have effect? The President, it seems to me, has given us a most unsatisfactory reason. The President says that in recommending the adoption of this constitution to us, as implied in the admission of the State, he has not overlooked the vote of ten thousand against the constitution given upon the 4th of January; he has considered it; but he holds it, and he holds the law of the Territorial Legislature under which that vote was taken, to be mere nullities. Why? The law was passed by the regularly elected Legislature of the Territory providing that a vote should be taken on that day; and why not? Is there anything in the organic law, is there anything anywhere that forbids it—that more forbids it than the passage of the act for calling a convention by a previous Legislature?

The President had anticipated that the constitution itself, in whole, and not in part, was to be submitted to the people. The Governor had so contemplated, and had so assured and promised the people. The President regrets that it was only submitted in part. He regrets that the entire constitution was not submitted. Though he accepts as an equivalent the partial submission, he regrets that it was not submitted as a whole. The Territorial Legislature, after this constitution was published, immediately afterwards passed a law to have a vote taken upon the entire constitution, which the President had preferred, and which Mr. Walker, the Governor, had preferred. What do they do but carry out and act in perfect accordance with the wishes and opinions of the President and Governor? And yet the President, who was for a general submission, and would have preferred it, says the act of the Legislature, in accordance with his opinion, is a mere nullity. Why? Because, he says, by the previous acts of the people and of the territorial government the Territory was so far prepared for admission into the Union as a State. That is the reason. He gives no application of it, but announces as a reason that it was so far prepared because the constitution had been made, ready to be offered to Congress, though that constitution had not yet been submitted to the people when this law was passed. That was her condition; that was the preparation she had made. The only preparation was, that under the authority of a previous Territorial Legislature, a convention had been held, and a constitution made and published.

That was the condition of her preparation; and, because of that preparation, the Territorial Legislature had no power whatever to pass a law to take a popular vote upon the adoption of that constitution, to see what the people thought of it; to collect the evidence of the public will! What could the Territorial Legislature do, to satisfy themselves, to satisfy the country, to satisfy the just rights of the people, but to say a vote shall be taken on the 4th of January next, in which all the people shall declare their assent to, or disapprobation of, this constitution as an entire instrument? What is there in this preparation to prevent it? What force had the constitution? Could the constitution, unaccepted by you, unauthorized by you, paralyze and annihilate the legislative power which your act of Congress had conferred upon the territorial government? Does not that power, and all that power, remain as perfect as when you granted it? And could the power which your act gave be diminished or lessened by any act of mere territorial authority? It is palpable that it could not. No matter what act might be done by the people of Kansas, call it by what name you please—law of the Territorial Legislature, constitution made by the people—no matter by what name you call it—the supremacy of the Government of the United States remains untouched and unimpaired, and all the power of territorial legislation which it gave may be exercised by the Legislature.

Of what avail is this constitution until accepted by Congress, and the State admitted upon it? Whom does it bind? Is it anything more than a proposition by the people of Kansas that "we shall be admitted with this instrument, which we offer as our constitution?" What more is it? Does it bind anybody? Where does it derive its authority? The organic law authorized no legislation by a convention. The convention could exercise no legislative power which Congress had given, because Congress gave its power to a Territorial Legislature, to be elected in a certain manner, and to be exercised in a certain manner. The convention could exercise no legislative power. It bound no one. It did not bind the future State; for, until you accepted it, what prevented the people from calling a convention the next day, and altering or modifying it according to their own views? Is there anything of reason, of argument, or of law, to support such a proposition as that the people are restrained from making another constitution because they have proposed one not yet accepted and acted upon by Congress? I think not.

In my judgment, we have a precedent on our books which shows I am right in this view, in the case of Wisconsin. She presented herself here with a constitution, and asked for admission according to the boundaries which she had assumed and declared in that constitution. Congress admitted her, but admitted her conditionally only. Congress objected to the boundary. It included a portion of territory which Congress thought did not properly belong to her. It admitted her, however, as a State conditionally; on condition that she should hold another convention and assent to the new boundary that Congress prescribed; and upon that assent being thus given, the President was to proclaim it, and without further proceeding, she was afterwards to be a State in the Union. What did the people of Wisconsin do? Did they proceed according to this act of Congress, and call a convention simply for the purpose as required by the act of Congress, of assenting to this altered boundary? No, sir; we hear no more of that. They passed that act by, called another convention, made another constitution, applied to Congress, and were admitted at a subsequent session.

Was not their state of preparation greater than the preparation of the Territory of Kansas? Here Wisconsin was not only in a state of preparation, by having made a constitution, but that constitution, with a single exception, had received the approbation of Congress, and she had authority to call another convention for the solitary and particular purpose of assenting to the boundary. She passed it by as she might well do. Her people said, "it is a wise and more satisfactory mode to pass by this act of Congress and to act upon our acknowledged rights—a Territory to call a convention, make a new constitution, and submit that to Congress, passing by the President, and the President's proclamation, and receiving our adoption and admission from the hands of Congress; and they did so.

If they could do that, if, prepared as they were, that preparation did not preclude them from making another constitution, how is this less state of preparation, on the part of Kansas, to preclude the Territorial Legislature, not from performing the high act of calling a convention, but simply of taking another vote on a constitution which was yet to be proposed to Congress? Can any reason be shown? No, sir, none. That constitution was inoperative. How long would it have operated? Suppose circumstances had occurred which had prevented any application to Congress for years, how long would this instrument have retained its vitality and retained its vigor and authority? One year? A short-lived instrument. Two years? Three years? Four years? How long? Suppose the president, Calhoun, had put this instrument in his pocket and kept it there all the days of his life, would it all the days of his life have restrained the people of Kansas from taking other steps and calling other conventions, and making other constitutions?

If its authority would not have continued a lifetime, how long could it continue? No man can set a limit; and the conclusion, therefore, is that it never had any binding influence—at any rate, never such binding influence (and that is all I am required to show) as to have prevented the people, if they had changed their minds after making the first constitution, from calling another convention, and resorting to all means necessary for the establishment of another constitution, and then to offer it to you. It is theirs to offer, and ours to dispose of, and they are free up to the last moment to make known to Congress what is their will and what is their determination in relation to the fundamental law of the State which they are about to establish.

Is not this all perfectly clear to our reason? Are there any fictions of law; are there any technicalities springing out of these instruments, governing their force and effect, to prevent this conclusion? Is this constitution to be made up into a little plea of estoppel against the people? Are the little rules which we are to gather from Westminster Hall, the little saws in actions at law that do well enough to decide little questions of meum and tuum among A, B, and C, to be applied as the measure to those great and sovereign principles on which States and peoples rest for their rights and their liberties? No, sir. This is a great political question, open, free to be judged of according to God's truth and the rights of the people unrestrained, unincumbered, unimpaired by any fiction or by any technicality which could prevent the full scope of your justice and your reason over the whole subject.

Therefore, sir, this state of preparation of the Territory of Kansas for admission into the Union has no effect. The argument is not applied; the fact is merely stated that there is a state of preparation, and there it would be necessary to stop on any doctrine on that subject; for, in my own judgment, no argument can be made even of any ordinary plausibility to show that the state of preparation restrains the people of their natural and indefeasible right and their legal right as proclaimed by you to form with perfect freedom their own institutions before they come into the Union. There is no technicality about it.

Here, it seems to me, applies that great principle to which I adverted at first, that the people have a right to govern themselves. I mean of course according to the constitutions and laws such as they have. This people had no constitution, could have no constitution; and when the act of the Territorial Legislature was passed requiring a vote to be taken on this constitution, they had full authority to pass that law. Their hands were not bound. Here was a great act about to be done, an act to bind the State, to give it a new character, to give it new institutions, to put upon it a constitution—that panoply of the rights of all. This was the great act to be done; it is an act which none but the people can do through themselves or their proper representatives. It is in all cases directly or by reference the act of the people.

The laws which they establish are not of that transient character which can be made to-day and repealed to-morrow. They are made for permanency. They are the great immutable and eternal truths and principles on which all government must rest. They are expected to be permanent. The people delegate to others the power of passing your temporary and repealable laws. They reserve to themselves the great right of passing those which are permanent and irrevocable except by themselves.

Was it not of consequence, was it not of importance to know the will of the people, whether they really did approve of this constitution which was about to be offered to Congress—a law which, when Congress puts its imprimatur on it by admitting the State, is to be permanent? Would it be any harm to take the vote over and over again? What objection could there be to it? You might have said "it is an unnecessary care of the people's rights; you have had their decision once; therefore, it is not necessary to have it again;" but out of abundant care, and abundant zeal you may choose to take it again and again, and ascertain whether there may be change or variation in the public opinion. Where is the man who can say aught against it? Do you object to it because it is taking too great care of public liberty, paying too great respect to popular rights? Nobody will take that ground.

But it may be said you might delay the application to Congress by these repeated elections. Not at all. You must avoid that as far as you can. In this case it has not delayed it. In this case this vote was taken before this constitution came before you; while it yet slumbered in the hands of President Calhoun. No objection can be made, then, that this was made the cause of, or intended merely for the purpose of delay. The result shows that it was necessary and proper. The result shows that notwithstanding the vote of six thousand, though all real, here were ten thousand who were opposed to it. I say, therefore, this is not the constitution of the people of Kansas. It may in a certain sense be a constitution offered by the convention to the people of Kansas; but which the people of Kansas by ten thousand majority have rejected, have lawfully rejected in the last vote, as it was lawfully approved by the six thousand first voting in the preceding December.

I say, then, Mr. President, upon the record evidence, upon all the evidence, this is not the constitution of the people of Kansas. It is not the constitution under which they desire that you shall admit them into the Union. Now, will you, against their will, force them into the Union under a constitution which they disapprove? That is the question. You know the fact that ten thousand against six thousand are opposed to the constitution. You know that by the act of their Territorial Legislature that they entreat you not to admit them with this constitution. They tell you, moreover, as one of their reasons, not only that they disapprove of the whole constitution, but that it is particularly hateful to them because the votes given for it, or apparently given for it, were, to a great extent, fraudulent and fictitious. The Legislature tells you that nine tenths of the people there are opposed to it.

Now, would it not be strange, that under these circumstances, we should, without any motive for it that I know of, as the common arbiters of all Territories and States to the extent of our constitutional power, force her into the Union? What motive can we have, what right motive, with the knowledge of these facts, to force her into the Union, and to enforce upon her this constitution? I cannot feel myself authorized to do such a thing. Of course I do not impugn the motives and the views of others, who, taking a different view, act from different motives from mine. They act upon one view, and I upon another; but it seems to me that to do this is a plain, unmistakable violation of the right of the people to govern themselves.

I have endeavored to show you, sir, that this is not the constitution of the people of Kansas, according to the recorded evidence of their will. It seems to me, furthermore, that this constitution is a fraud. It is not only not their constitution, according to their will, but it is got up and made in fraud, to deprive them of their rights. I believe that, and I think it can be shown.

The President of the United States has furnished us an argument on this subject, and it has been oftentimes repeated here in the debate—of course a plausible and ingenious argument, as all must admit, even those who deny the solidity of the reasoning. What is the argument? The President says that the sense of the people was taken, and proved to be in favor of calling a convention. The convention was called; delegates were elected; those delegates made a constitution; that constitution was submitted to the people in part, and approved by a vote of six thousand, taken according to law. Well, all these, you will observe, constitute a tissue, a long series of little legalities, regularities, and technicalities; and the reasoning of the President is founded on technical points on each of these facts. You must admit all the facts. Yes, sir, the facts are all true; and if they alone constituted the case, the conclusion would be fair and right that this constitution has been regularly made; that this constitution has been sanctioned by the people as well as by the convention. But is there no more in the case than this? There is a great deal more in the case than this.

When frauds have been alleged and charged against this government of Kansas, gentlemen say, "ah, but these frauds were in other elections; these frauds do not particularly and specifically touch this constitution, or the proceedings which led to this constitution." But suppose there were frauds in relation to it: is it not something if I show you that, in regard to that part of the constitution which was submitted to the people to be ratified by them, and was nothing until the people had ratified it even according to the constitution itself, there was fraud in that election, and abundance of fraud? So glaring, so impudent, and so fearless had frauds in elections become there, that upon that very poll list, in one of the precincts, (I forget whether it was in Oxford, or Shawnee, or that other precinct that emulates these in its character for fraud, Kickapoo,) you find that the President of the United States, Colonel Bouton, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] were there, it seems, or fictitious votes were put in for them by somebody, and a long list of persons of that sort figure on the poll-book at these miserable precincts as actual voters. That was the vote on the constitution on December 21; that was on the part submitted to the people. They were the constitution-making power there, and there I show you the fraud.

What further frauds there were I know not; but this much is apparent—and later developments show greater frauds still—that in one single precinct, where there were only thirty or forty votes to be taken legitimately, there were over twelve hundred; and under the investigation lately made by commissioners in Kansas, that upon sworn testimony is stated to be the fact. In one precinct there were twelve hundred fraudulent and fictitious votes out of twelve hundred and sixty; seven hundred in another, and over six hundred in another; making in the aggregate twenty-six hundred votes in three precincts, entirely fraudulent and fictitious, or to a great extent fictitious, written out by hundreds on the poll-book after the election was over, put on without scruple upon the poll-book, upon the election return, put down without scruple during the election, of those who were qualified, and those who were not qualified; and that is the way this constitution in part has received its sanction.

But, sir, I think that we should take a very partial view of this subject, one very unsatisfactory to our judgment, if we were to isolate these facts which have direct relation only to the formation of this constitution, and leave out all the surrounding circumstances. It seems to me that the proper and the just mode of regarding this constitution is to consider it as one of a series of acts, and see if we can find that the whole action and operation of all those acts were to lead to one general purpose—that of maintaining by fraud and by falsehood the power and the government of the minority, and their offices to them against the will of the great majority of the voters. I say it is an act connected with all the other acts. The whole case is to be taken, and every part of it judged of in this connection.

Now, what was the first act? That is historical. We may all speak of it now, though we disputed it at the time. The first Legislature that was elected in Kansas under the organic act, was not elected by the people of Kansas. It was elected by persons who intruded into the polls, intruded themselves with arms in their hands, and seized upon the ballot-boxes, put in their own ballots, driving away the legitimate voters, and elected the members to the Legislature. That is the way the government of Kansas was inaugurated. There was an opposition to it from the first. Those who had been driven from the polls, those who were opposed to the party that was installed in power by these means, conceived such indignation and such disgust that they proclaimed aloud, whether wisely or unwisely, they renounced obedience to this spurious government, as they called it. It is not material to me whether their complaints are well-founded and true, or not. I am endeavoring to depict the course of things, to show their motives and the motives of the persons who were thus installed into the territorial government. They came to their power by violence; they came to their power by fraud. That was the complaint of the opposing party in Kansas. They renounced their rule, they renounced their laws, refused to commit themselves in any way to their support, refused to go to any election afterwards. They said, "What is the use? This corrupt minority who have got into power, who have in their hands the means of controlling the election, who are not too good to do it, and who will do it, who have done it, will practice the same means; we shall be again driven from the polls, or, if not, they, having the control of the elections, and of all the officers who conduct and manage them, will have what returns made they please. We will subject ourselves no more to the humiliation of attempting to execute a right which we know will be frustrated and defeated by fraud, or by violence, or by force." Under these impressions, and with these feelings, which it is not my part here either to justify or rebuke, but simply to state the fact, they withdrew from the elections lest, by voting according to the laws passed by this corrupt Legislature, they should seem to acknowledge its authority and their allegiance to it.

Now, what would be the condition of the men who had been installed into power in this way? They were very glad of this. In all the elections to be held afterwards, this power of the minority, however small, would be continued; as their enemies would not come up to vote, they would be reelected and would retain and perpetuate their power. So they went on—the field abandoned by the majority, and the minority ruling everything in this way. Look at the evidences that are before you from these high officers lately returned from Kansas—Stanton and Walker. They tell you of frauds regularly perpetrated there; and, although they had thought before that the people were acting factiously, that they were acting seditiously, that they were acting rebelliously in attempting to withdraw themselves from this government altogether and to act for themselves, and that their complaints of fraud and imposition upon them in elections were rather affected for the purpose of giving color to their conduct than otherwise, yet when they went among the people and heard them, and learned all about the dealings that had been practiced, they could not doubt their truth and their sincerity in the resentment which they felt and in the conduct which they pursued. However unwise, it was sincere on their part. They had been defrauded; they had wrongs enough to sting and humiliate them. This is what these officers say. I know nothing about it; we know nothing about it, except on the testimony. That these persons were capable of committing fraud, we know. They began in fraud. Has any gentleman here denied, is there any gentleman who discredits, the history which we all have of the frauds practiced in the first election that was held in Kansas? However we might doubt this, however we might have disagreed, however we might have believed or disbelieved heretofore, have not every mist and doubt been cleared away from around this fact, and is there one here now to say that the right of election was not trodden down in the first election for a Territorial Legislature in Kansas, and that a minority government was not elected? That they have continued that government by fraud since, is shown at every step of their progress.

It was in the midst of this self-suspension of the right of suffrage on the part of their opponents, that they called the convention by which this constitution was made. Look at the constitution itself. On its own face, does it not contain the amplest preparation for fraud, visible and apparent? Look at the internal evidence marked on its face. They pass by all the sworn officials of the territorial government who had before conducted elections. They authorized, by the schedule to the constitution, President Calhoun to take this whole matter into his hands, to appoint the officers to conduct the elections, giving him control over that official body, and the appointment of them all; and the returns were not to be made to any permanent officer of the government, not to the Governor, but to this same Mr. Calhoun. He was to appoint the officers to conduct the election, receive the returns, count the ballots, and declare the result. Well, Mr. Calhoun has performed all this business!

Another thing: every human being, in respect to that part of the constitution which was submitted to the people, before he could vote for or against it, was required to swear that he would support that constitution when it was adopted. In that constitution, those who framed it well knew were provisions intolerable to all the free-State men in the Territory, and they would not swear to support it. They so believed and hoped and expected. This was under the show of a fair election. Not only have they secured all the advantages resulting from the appointment of the officers to conduct it, but, to leave their consciences more easy, these officers were not even sworn. There was no provision for that. Every man voting for the constitution, or that part of it submitted to him to vote upon, was required to be sworn beforehand that he would support that constitution. This, it was supposed, if nothing else, would keep off the free-State men.

It is said, in this testimony, that Governor Walker, from the time he went there, had been diligently persuading all the people of the Territory to throw aside this inaction of theirs, come into the elections, and participate in the Government. For this, Mr. Stanton says, Governor Walker became the object of utter hostility to Mr. Calhoun's party. They did not want conciliation. They demanded, as the same witness says, repression. They wanted penalty, not persuasion. They did not know what the result of this persuasion might be in the elections afterwards to take place on the constitution. It was necessary, therefore, to make provision against the possible effect of these persuasions and arguments of Governor Walker; it was, therefore, necessary to put in, through nobody opposed them, six thousand votes for the constitution, they believing that that was a majority of the greatest number of votes ever given on any occasion in the Territory, and so it is stated here. They just went beyond the line; and for fear of rendering it more monstrous, and the fraud more visible, they went just so far as the necessity demanded the fraud. They did not choose to use it superfluously. They rather husbanded it, to be used as the occasion might require, and no more than was required. I cannot shut my eyes to this fact. These preparations, then, in the schedule of the constitution, were made in anticipation of the vague dangers that were apprehended. It was greatly important to carry through this constitution, greatly important to preserve their authority under the constitution. There were two Senators of the United States to be elected. All the officers of the State government were to be constituted. These were to be the reward of those who had labored.

These seem to me to be preparations made for fraud; and when I come to compare them with the action which took place afterwards, the design and the act, the purpose and fulfillment of it, make the proof perfect. The means of doing it, the means of facilitating it, are given in the constitution. The actual perpetration of it afterwards at the polls is seen. It is seen in the election upon the constitution. It is seen in the election of the 4th of January, for officers under the new constitution. There is where these frauds, lately developed, were practiced to such an enormous extent. There is where these little precincts distinguished themselves.

Another fact may be noticed, that this convention to make a constitution were to meet, by law, in September, and go to their work. They met then. Did they go to work? No. Why did they not? There was an election of the Territorial Legislature to take place in the October following. They wanted to know the result of that election; to know how the land lay; whether all was safe or not; whether any point was necessary to be guarded in the constitution; whether there were any unexpected majorities rising up; whether there were any obstructions in the way of ordinary frauds. They wanted to see what was the character of the new Legislature, that they might meet the emergency and meet the exigency with any constitutional provision that might be necessary to perpetuate their power. They adjourned. The Legislature was elected; and that Legislature turned out, notwithstanding all the frauds that were practiced, to be against them. What then? The Legislature being against them, now what is the provision in the schedule? The officers of election, and other officers of the Government, were, many of them, appointed by the Territorial Legislature. They said: "Now, here has come in, in October, a Legislature opposed to us. What so likely but that they who have complained of frauds from Government officials, will now change the officers and change the mode of election?" What then? They declare in the schedule that all who are in office now shall hold their offices; that all the laws in existence now shall continue in existence until repealed by a Legislature which shall meet under the State organization under the constitution. That silences completely the Territorial Legislature, paralyzes the power of the Territorial Legislature. That was certainly against them; and to take the chances of a future election under that constitution, that future election was to take place, by the same schedule, on the 4th of January, and then they were to make another death-struggle for supremacy; and then they did. I have seen the report of the commissioners lately appointed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas to investigate the frauds. There this Government party did make efforts more than worthy of all their former practices in fraud, in order to secure the Legislature, which, under the constitution, would make Senators of the United States. It was here that Oxford, that Shawnee, that Kickapoo, distinguished themselves in the multiplicity of votes, feigned and fraudulent.

And when you see such things as these in the constitution, when you see such things as these all around the constitution, when you see the same men who made the constitution rulers in the land during the whole time, do you not see that the frauds have been everywhere, that the imposition upon the people has been everywhere? And how can you exempt from the contagion (if there was nothing more than this general association from which to infer it) this constitution and those who made it? Judging from the positive internal evidence that exists in it, and the facts that surround it, I cannot. I believe it violates the right of the people to govern themselves, to impose it upon them. I believe this constitution is the work of fraud—fraud upon the rights of the people.

I do not undertake to defend this people for their conduct. It is not my part nor my province. I should agree, perhaps, with the President, that much of their conduct had been of a disreputable, disorderly, and seditious character. It may be that it deserves the epithet of "rebellion," which the President applies to it. I have nothing to do with that. I am not their advocate. I have disapproved of their conduct in many instances. There were many bad men among them, as I believe, but for that the law assigns its proper punishment. The majority of the people have their political rights, that remain, notwithstanding their legal offenses. It is in that point of view, it is in their political character as the people of a Territory, that I look at them in respect to this subject. Whether they be more or less vile on one side or the other, is not the question. I fear that neither party could take the chair of impartiality and justice, and be shameless enough to attempt to administer rebuke or justice to the other.

One great objection to their admission at all is that they have not shown, by their conduct on any side, that they are altogether fit for association with the States of this Union. A little more apprenticeship, a little more practice of honest and fair dealing, a little more spirit of submission and subordination to law and authority, would be well learned by them, and fit them and qualify them much better for citizens of the United States. That is my opinion. I have, however, spoken of their political rights as men, and it is not for me to sit in judgment to condemn and deprive them of the right of suffrage on one side or the other, because of frauds committed by one, or violence practiced by another. This is a political question.

It is said, however, that the series of legalities and technicalities, to which I have alluded, of a regular election, of a regular convention, of a submission to the people, and of votes of the people upon all these questions, have been regular; and what then? All the people had a right to vote, and those who did not vote forfeited their right to complain; and we are not to inquire whether there were any people who did not vote, or whether those who did vote voted fairly, and were entitled to vote or not. It is said we are precluded by the forms in which this transaction is enveloped; that the formal election, the formal certificate of election, the formal constitution certified—these formalities are enough for us, and that we are not permitted to look further; that we ought not to look further. Sir, I do not think so. We are applied to now to admit a new State into the Union. The instrument which she presents as her constitution is opposed by people from the same Territory. They say, "this is not our constitution; it is against our will; it is not only against our will, but it has been imposed upon us by devices and fraud. It is void for fraud. If it is not void for fraud, for that is rather a legal than a political term, we present these frauds and this opposition as a reason why you should not admit our Territory into the Union under this constitution."

That is the state of the question before you. The complainants admit all the regularities just as the President states them. Perhaps they admit the effect these forms would ordinarily have, but they urge other facts in opposition to the apparent evidence of the constitution itself, as I have before adverted to. A majority of the people have protested against it. The present Legislature, by its inquiries, have developed the vast frauds which were practiced in the convention concerning and relating to all around this constitution. They say, "do not accept that; do not admit us under it; send it back; let it be submitted to a fair vote of the people." Sir, upon such a complaint as this, are we not bound, in justice to that people, to examine the whole case? Can any Senator turn away and refuse to look at the testimony that is offered? Can he be justified in so doing by naked legal presumptions from naked regularities or irregularities?

Do not suppose that I would disparage all these conclusions and presumptions from a formal regular manner of doing business. In many cases, and to many of the transactions of society, especially to your courts of justice, they are necessary, and they subserve the purposes of justice. They were not made to sacrifice justice, but to uphold it and maintain it and protect it as an armor. That is the proper business of forms—not to crush down justice, but to promote it. We are not now sitting here governed by any technicalities. This is a grand national political tribunal, to judge according to our sense of policy and our sense of justice. That is our high province—not to be controlled by presumptions of law when we can have the naked truth. It is the truth that ought to guide it; and for that we ought to look wherever we can find it, and where you find the truth on one side, and the fiction on the other side: which is to be followed, the truth or the fiction? I take the fact; I take the truth; let the fiction return to those tribunals who are by law made subject to it. This is a question above that sort of argument. It is inquirable into. Else how can we judge that it is their constitution? It is the first time, I believe, that such a question has ever come up in the Senate of the United States. In all former applications for admission, there has been one thing about which there has been no question; and that was, the willingness to be admitted, and the constitution under which they desired to be admitted. There has been no question about the authenticity of a constitution, or about its expressing the true will of the people before this, that I know of. I am satisfied there has been none; but now that there is, we must inquire into the authenticity of the instrument offered to us; we must inquire whether it is better, on full consideration, to admit this instrument and the State with it or not; and, in the exercise of that judgment, we are bound to look abroad for the truth wherever we can find it. I think, therefore, these matters are all fairly subject to our consideration.

Now, Mr. President, convinced as I am from these imperfect views of the evidence in the case, that this instrument is not really the constitution of the people of Kansas, or desired by them to be accepted by you in their admission into the Union; believing that it is not their constitution; and believing, moreover, as I verily do, that it is made in fraud and for a fraud; believing that these matters are inquirable into by us, and that the inquiry has led us to abundant light on this subject, I cannot, I will not vote for it. Viewing it as I do, I should think that, with the opinions I entertain, I could not put my hand to her admission without violating my sense of right and justice; and I would submit to any consequence before I would do that.

Now, sir, what considerations are there, apart from these which I have stated, which could lead me to give, or could compensate me for giving, a vote against my sense of what was right and just? What is the advantage to our whole country, or to any portion of it, to result from taking Kansas into the Union now with this constitution? Is anything to be gained? Is the South or the North to gain anything by it? I see nothing to be gained by it. I think there is not a gentleman here who believes that Kansas will be a slave State. Before this territorial government was made, many of the leading men of the South here argued that Kansas and Nebraska never could be slave States. By the law of climate and geography, it was said they could not. So said my friend from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and so said Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. TOOMBS. Never.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Badger said so.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. KEITT and Mr. Brooks, of South Carolina, said so. The opinion was expressed by numerous southern gentlemen that Kansas could never be a slave State. It was for the principle that they contended; and the principle, the abstract principle, was a just one.

Mr. HAMMOND. With the permission of the Senator, I will ask him, "Did I understand him to say that Mr. KEITT had declared Kansas never would be a slave State?"

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir; so it is reported. Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, said: "Does any man believe that you will have a slaveholding State in Kansas or Nebraska?"

Governor BROWN, of Mississippi, said:

"That slavery would never find a resting place in those Territories."

Mr. DOUGLAS said:

"I do not believe there is a man in Congress who thinks it could be permanently a slaveholding country."

Mr. BADGER, of North Carolina, said:

"I have no more idea of seeing a slave population in either of them than I have of seeing it in Massachusetts."

Mr. MILLSON, of Virginia, said:

"No one expects it. No one dreams that slavery will be established there."

Mr. FREDERICK P. STANTON, of Tennessee, said:

"The fears of northern gentlemen are wholly unfounded. Slavery will not be established in Kansas and Nebraska."

The late Mr. Brooks, of South Carolina, said in his speech of the 15th of March, 1854:

"If the natural laws of climate and of soil exclude us from a territory of which we are the joint owners, we shall not and we will not complain."

Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina said, on the 2d of March, 1854:

"If two States should ever come into the Union from them, [the Territories,] it is very certain that not more than one of them could, in any possible event, be a slaveholding State; and I have not the least idea that even one would be."

Mr. KEITT, of South Carolina, in his speech of the 30th March, 1854, quoted Mr. Pinckney, of his own State, that—

"Practically, he thought slavery would not go above the line of 36° 30' by the laws of physical geography, and therefore, that the South lost no territory fit for slavery."

This is all the authority I have; it is a compilation.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to inquire what book the Senator reads from. What is the title of it?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It seems to be a book written with the most downright Democratic propensities and purposes. [Laughter.] It is "An Appeal to the Democracy of the South, by a southern State-Rights Democrat." [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I suppose the pamphlet is anonymous. No name is given.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. The name of the writer of the pamphlet is not given.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman take it? It contains a great deal of good Democratic reading. [Laughter.] The writer of it thought he was doing great service to the Democratic party.

Mr. HAMMOND. I wish to say that Mr. Keitt quoted that passage from Mr. Pinckney's speech on the Missouri question, which had been quoted on the opposite side of the case previously. His object in quoting it was to show that Mr. Pinckney did not support the Missouri compromise upon principle, but he did not indorse the sentiments expressed by Mr. Pinckney in that extract.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I accept the explanation. Certainly I had no intention to misrepresent any gentleman by reading the statements expressed in this pamphlet. I say it was not anticipated at first that Kansas would be a slaveholding State. What is the South to gain now by having it admitted? It will gain a triumph in the admission of this constitution—admitted against the will of the majority of the people. It is a triumph, but is it not a barren one? Is it a triumph worthy of the South? It is not entirely barren. It will produce increased bitterness and exasperation, perhaps, on the part of those against whose will it is forced, not only in the Territory, but elsewhere. It may give new exasperation to the slavery question; new agitation, which God forbid. It would be a victory without results, without profit, barren, sterile, as to all the ordinary and beneficial fruits. There is none of them; but it will give exasperation, perhaps, to the slavery question. It will not allay agitation. Is that policy? Is that justice? Will that gain anything to us? I do not know how anything is to be gained to the South, supposing, as I verily believe, and as every gentleman here believes, that it cannot be a slave State; that there is a majority there opposed to it, and who will put it down. Pass this, and we may have a few years longer of exasperated struggle and exasperated agitation in the country. That is all the consequence of the barren victory which would be obtained by admitting Kansas with this constitution. That is not a fruit, I think, which any one would wish to gather. Now, if you attempt to enforce it, we are told by Mr. Walker—I know nothing about it, but from all that he and Mr. Stanton tell us, and they are Democratic witnesses—there is danger of resistance and danger of rebellion.

Where is the necessity, then, for our doing it now? Can we not resort to some other means by which we may avoid all these consequences of exasperation, of danger, of resistance, of tumult, or of agitation, upon this subject; and end this contest in a short time by authorizing the people of Kansas now, under the high mandate of this Government, to form for themselves a constitution, if they want to come into this Union—a constitution fairly to be made, fairly to express the will of the people, and to bring it here, when they shall be admitted? It defers the subject but a little while. Is it not better to do that; is it not better to stand by the evils we have, than to fly to others we know not of, either North or South, to result from the rejection or the admission of this constitution? I think every prudent consideration is in favor of our forbearing to enforce this constitution on the people of Kansas, and leave them an opportunity of making their views fully and perfectly understood. This will be in accordance with the generous principles and policy that the South has pursued here.

What recommended the Kansas-Nebraska bill to the South? For one, I think it was a great blunder to pass it; but what was the recommendation that it contains? It adopts, I think, a right principle in respect to a Territory belonging to the people of the United States, and in regard to which Congress has made no law of admission or exclusion, that any citizen of the United States, with any property of his, has a full right to go there. When people go upon that Territory to make a law, to become a community, when they have the power of legislation, they may admit it or exclude it; it is all within the compass of their power. But while it is a Territory of the United States, there is no law there, I think, to divest the title which a man has to his property, whether it be a slave or a horse. If he has title by the laws of his own State to that property, he has, in a Territory, as much right to be there, and as much right to be there with his property, as any other citizen, until there is some law which shall prevent it and shall divest it, leaving to the people afterwards the right to form their own final constitution as they please for or against slavery. That is the principle upon which that bill rested; that is the principle upon which the South have always contended for the right. They contended for it in that bill; and, so far, I think they were in the right.

Now, I say, I want the full practice of that principle here. Let the majority make such a constitution as they please. That is the great American principle, that rises above all others. Let them govern themselves, and as the majority declare, so let the constitution and so let the laws be. I think we are infracting that great principle—the principle of the South itself, on this very identical subject, by forcing this constitution, at least of doubtful authenticity, upon the people. If there is a majority in favor of it, it is not much trouble for them to ratify it. If there is a majority opposed to it, they are entitled to have their will and their way. They are entitled to that upon principle; they are entitled to it by the express pledges of the Kansas-Nebraska law.

Sir, I feel that I have already occupied a great deal of your time—more than I expected to do; and yet there are some general topics upon which I wish to say something, though not so immediately connected with the direct question before us.

Mr. President, I am, according to the denominations now usually employed by parties in this country, a southern man. I have lived all my life in a southern State. I have been accustomed from my childhood to that frame of society of which slavery forms a part. I am, so far as regards the necessary defense of the rights of the South, as prompt and as ready to defend them as any man the wide South can hold; but in the same resolute and determined spirit in which I would defend any invasions of its rights, and for which I would put my foot as far as he who went furthest, I will concede to others their rights, and I will maintain and defend them. With the same feeling with which I know I would defend my own rights, I will respect theirs. I never expected Kansas to be a slave State. I believed that those at the South who expected it would be deluded. There was some vague hope that when the Missouri compromise line was taken away and abolished, slavery might be extended in that direction, but I did not believe it. I believed that the Missouri compromise line fixed in 1820, was about that territorial line, north of which slavery, if it could exist, would not be profitably employed; and our experience since has shown that the wise men who made that compromise judged rightly. We have found no instance in which it has been found profitable anywhere there. I believed that the idea of making Kansas a slave State was a delusion to the South; that her hopes would never be realized, if she entertained such a hope as that. I thought, therefore, it would have been better, without examining scrupulously into its constitutionality, to let the Missouri compromise stand. I regretted its repeal. I did not believe the South would gain anything by it, or that the North would gain by it.

That compromise was a bond and assurance of peace. I would not have disturbed it. It was hallowed in my estimation by the men who had made it. It was hallowed in my apprehension by the beneficial consequences that resulted from it. It was hailed, at the time it was made, by the South. It produced good, and nothing but good, from that time. Often have you, sir, [addressing Mr. Toombs,] and I, and all of the old Whig party, triumphed in that act as one of the great achievements of our leader, Henry Clay. It was from that, among other things, that he derived the proudest of all his titles—that of the pacificator and peace-maker of his country. We ascribed to him a great instrumentality in the passage of that law, and over and over again have I claimed credit and honor for him for this act. This, for thirty years, had been my steadfast opinion. I have been growing, perhaps, during that time, a little older, and am a little less susceptible of new impressions and novel opinions. I cannot lay aside the idea that the law which made that line of division was a constitutional one. I believed so then. All the people believed it. I must be permitted to retain that opinion still; to go on, at any rate, to my end with the hope that I have not been praising, and have not been claiming credit for others for violating the Constitution of their country.

Sir, the men who passed that measure were great men; they were far-seeing men. Without argument now, I am content to rest my faith upon the authority of those great men—Pinckney, Clay, Lowndes, old President Monroe, the last of the patriarchs of the Revolution, with his learned and able Cabinet, and then, what is more than all, thirty-five years of acquiescence in it, and peace under it in these States. Whatever quarrels you may have had about it in Congress, there was always enough to uphold and sustain that law; and never, until 1854, was it repealed, or its constitutionality questioned, that I know of. I regretted its repeal, because I feared that it would lead to new agitations and new dangers. Has it not? What has been our experience?

The authors of the measure which repealed that compromise—honorable and patriotic I know them to be, many of them my personal friends—promised themselves from it greater peace and greater repose by localizing the slavery question, as it was said. Then this act was to localize the question of slavery, and all agitation was to be at an end. It was to give peace to the country. So the President said. The President in his message at the commencement of this session, or in his special message—I do not know which—imagines the country to have been in great agitation on the subject of slavery, when the Kansas-Nebraska act came and put a stop to it until, some time afterwards, it was revived. Why, sir, exactly the contrary seems to me to be the true history of the transaction. We were becoming tranquilized under the compromises of 1850 in addition to the Missouri compromise; all was subsiding into submission and acquiescence, when, to obtain a greater degree of peace and secure us for the future against all agitation, this bill of 1854 repealing the Missouri compromise was passed. What has it produced? Has it localized the question of slavery? Has it given us peace? All can answer that question. It has given us everything but peace. It has given us everything but a cessation of agitation. It has given us trouble, nothing but trouble. That has been the consequence of it so far.

I am as anxious now as any man here to close up this scene. I would vote for the admission of Kansas upon almost any terms that would give peace and quiet. If I thought this bill would do so, I should vote for it. I would suppress all scruples for the sake of that peace. If I was sure such would be its result, I would vote for it, thinking myself justified by the price that was to be paid—the peace of my country and the restoration of good will among my fellow-citizens. I do not hope for it. I fear further trouble. We are again told that this will have the effect, at any rate, of localizing the question of slavery, and that we shall be no more troubled with it; that the mischief and clamor and agitation will all be confined to the limits of Kansas. This is the same hope that was disappointed when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed. The same hope was indulged in then, and since then there has been nothing here but agitation on the subject increasing with every day.

Again, we have the idea of localizing it presented. Now, sir, if it is to be debated anywhere, it will be debated here; and, perhaps, if it is to be debated anywhere, it is best that it should be debated here; because we might hope, Mr. President, that in this body it would be debated with a spirit of moderation and conciliation that would deprive it of many mischievous consequences if it were agitated and debated among men without our years, without our responsibilities, and without the restraints which our condition and our knowledge impose upon us. We do not debate it in the right way here. We allow ourselves to become too much excited about it. To this great country, now, what is Kansas and this Kansas question, and the two or three hundred slaves who are there, that you and I and all the American Senate should be here day and night, and using such language of vituperation and invective on this subject as we often do? Look at our great country, and the great subjects which claim our attention as her legislators; look at them all in their majesty and their magnitude, and then say, how little, pitiful, in comparison, is the question about which we are making so much strife and contention.

On this subject, and on many others, it seems to me that it becomes us, of all the citizens of this great Republic, to set to our fellow-citizens examples of moderation and conciliation. What good does the mutual charge of aggression, often fiercely repeated? What good do these invectives of one against another? Especially let me say to my friends of the North, why indulge in invectives of the most reproachful character, upon those who, in fourteen or fifteen States of this great country, are slaveholders? Does that give you any cause to traduce them? Cannot you live content with the institutions which please you better, and leave these fellow-citizens, who have just the same right to adopt slavery that you have your institutions, to enjoy their liberty in peace also? Is there anything in the difference of our institutions which ought to make us inimical to one another? How was it with our fathers? Did not they live together in peace and harmony? Did not they fight together? Did not they legislate together? Did they ever abuse and reproach each other about the question of slavery? Never, that I have read of. Why is it that we cannot do as they did? Have we degenerated from those fathers, or have we grown so much better and purer than they were? I doubt whether we are any better; and I do not believe, notwithstanding all that is said about progress, that we are at all more sensible than those fathers who made the Constitution of the United States, and laid the foundation of this great Government of ours. They gave us an example of brotherhood; and when we look at all that connects us, all that unites and makes us one people, how much more powerful would its influence seem to be to connect us together, than the power of slavery and anti-slavery to divide us? We are united by circumstances of which we cannot divest ourselves. We are united in language, in blood, in country, in all the memories of the past, in all the hopes of the future. This is our connection, leading and pointing to the brightest destiny that ever awaited any people. All the unnumbered blessings of the future are in full prospect; but there is this little, this comparatively small matter of contention, that we seem disposed to nurse up into continual occasion for philippics and for reproaches. This is not the right temper with which to regard the subject. Crimination and recrimination is not the way to strengthen our Union—that Union of brotherhood, of good will, of cooperation for all great national purposes, which our fathers formed.

I was gratified to hear comparisons made of the mighty resources of the different sections of this country. It was a proud exhibition. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Hammond] gave us, in a very interesting and eloquent manner, the mighty resources of the South. They are beyond estimate—beyond calculation. This is replied to by a gentleman from the North, who gives us the mighty resources and the mighty power of New England and the non-slaveholding States. Well, sir, if the conclusion which might be drawn from it was true, that each of those sections would by itself make a mighty country and a country that any one of us might be proud of, what a magnificent country is made when we put it all together! What a magnificent abode for man, such as the Almighty never gave to any other people, and never placed on the surface of this earth!

It seems to me the most natural union in the world—the South, with her great and her rich productions, while the North abounds with ingenuity, labor, mechanical skill, navigation, and commerce. The very diversity of our resources is the natural cause of union between us. It would not do for us all to make cotton, nor would it do for us all to work in your manufactories. Nature seems to have organized here this country, adapted to a union of people North and South. Nature has given her sanction to the Union. Nature has traced that Union, and you alone disturb it. Gentlemen, you alone disturb it by making this subject of slavery the cause of dissension. Of the dissension itself it is not so much the cause, for we seldom come to a question that calls upon us to act on the subject. Now, if we were through with this petty Kansas affair, what a summer sea of boundless expanse lies before us, where there is nothing but repose. There is no other territory that you can dispute about in my lifetime, or the lifetime of any man here. This is the last point on which a controversy can probably be made. We went through many difficulties on this subject before the Missouri compromise, but, on other occasions, the question has presented itself with practical consequences. Now we have reached the last of it, the least of it. Let us settle this matter in peace; let us settle it in good temper; and I see nothing before us but a long period of repose, and, I hope, of mutual conciliation. Of one thing I am certain, that crimination and re-crimination between the North and the South, the getting up and maintaining of sectional feeling, sectional passion, sectional prejudices, can do no good to any section; and there is not one Senator here who does not recognize and feel all this as much as I do. I am certain of it.

My vote on this subject, sir, has nothing sectional in it. The difficulty I have really in voting is, that this is regarded by some as a sectional question; and I am on one side of that section, and I am voting for the other side of it, if we divide on it as a sectional question. Now, I do not regard it as a sectional question. My allegiance is not to any particular section. I do not want to know any such thing as a section in my conduct here. I want to be governed by a constitutional spirit, and a constitutional and a just principle, in all I do, no matter whether it relates to the North or to the South. I do not want to increase the sectionality which exists in the country by placing myself or my vote upon it so far as regards this question. I want to wipe out that sectionalism. I wish that no one here would vote upon it as a sectional question. I do not. I vote upon it as a Senator of the United States of America. That is my country, and my great country. The Constitution of the United States intended to wipe out all these lines of division and sectionalism. It is we, we, that disturb our own Union. It is we that make sections; it is we that make sectional lines to divide and distract the country, whose Constitution, whose present interest, whose future hopes, all tend to unite us.

There are some doctrines which have been advanced here with which I disagree, and upon which I will briefly express my views. Some gentlemen have argued, and they have the high authority of the President to sustain them, that the Kansas-Nebraska act gave all the authority that is usually conferred by what is called an enabling act on the people of a Territory. I never considered it so. I do not believe it is to be considered so. Some gentlemen, on the other hand, maintain that, under the Kansas-Nebraska act, the convention were bound to submit the constitution to the people for the popular suffrage; indeed, that it is the right of the people to have every convention submit every constitution to them. I do not agree to that doctrine. The people are too sovereign to be required to do that. They can confer upon a convention the power to make a constitution that shall be good without reference to any other power. The sovereignty over the Territory is in this Government. It belongs to the people of the United States, one and all. The people of the States own it; and they are the real sovereigns of the Territory, and we as their representatives. They have no more power in the Territory than we give. They have no government but what we give. It is not in the nature of things that they should have. All squatter sovereignties, and sovereignties of all sorts, vanish before the sovereignty of the people of the United States.

But the President says, in reference to this Kansas constitution, that, although it contains a provision that after 1864 a convention may be called to change it, the people can, nevertheless, change it before that time. That is to say, the people, by their irresistible power, can at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of their constitution to the contrary, change it as they please. Sir, this is a very high authority, the President of the United States; but it is, in my humble judgment, a very dangerous doctrine and a very untrue one. The people cannot bind themselves by a constitution! I thought that was one of the great virtues and purposes of a constitution. We admit them to be sovereign. Why cannot they make what sort of a constitution they please? The constitution which sovereignty makes, in all its parts and in all its purposes, must be the rule of conduct for all. It cannot be abolished, except in the manner prescribed and pointed out in the constitution itself, if any manner is prescribed.

If the President's doctrine on this subject be true, what becomes of the Constitution of the United States? Instead of following the mode of amendment prescribed in the Constitution, the people, by their irresistible power, may in any other manner at any time change the whole frame of our Government. There is not a State constitution in the Union that does not impose some restraint as to the manner of change. What would a constitution be if it were just as liable to change as any ordinary act of the Legislature? It would lose its character. Those who talk to the people about the unlimited and illimitable power they possess are teaching a dangerous doctrine. That is a sort of sovereignty which the people cannot exercise. It may be made very flattering to their ears, but it is impracticable in the nature of things. It cannot be exercised at all. The people must exercise their sovereignty through agencies. They must exercise it through representatives and governments; they must exercise it safely through constitutions. If they could not make constitutions bind themselves their sovereignty never would be safe. If it were not invested in the constitution, it would be constantly escaping into the hands of some of those gentlemen who could talk most eloquently to the people about their irresistible sovereignty. That would be the end of that sort of sovereignty in the people.

The people must understand that their sovereignty, their practical sovereignty, is to be exercised through representatives and delegates, over whom they are to hold the proper control; and to hold that control, and to fix and make permanent and operative their sovereignty, they must put it in the form of a constitution. That is the only security for popular sovereignty. Therein it exists, and therein alone can it exist. It is not true that the people cannot bind themselves, and are not bound, by the restrictions of their constitution. They may rebel against their own constitution; they may violate their own law and constitution, just as they could violate the law or constitution of any other people; but it does not follow that, because they could do that, they have not created a political obligation on themselves by a constitution, only to amend that instrument in the guarded, temperate, gradual method which the constitution may have provided for and prescribed.

Sir, I am sorry to have occupied the time of the Senate so long. I can say, with the President of the United States, that on this important occasion I have endeavored to do my duty, with a full sense of my responsibility to my God and to my country. Under the conviction that the best results to be obtained under the present circumstances, unless some material amendment can be made to the bill, will be attained by rejecting this constitution, I shall give my vote against it; but so anxious am I to conclude this subject, that I intend, before it is finally acted upon by the Senate, to propose an amendment. This would not be the proper time to offer it; I am not prepared now to offer it; but the effect of it will be to admit Kansas into the Union upon condition that this constitution of hers be submitted to a fair vote of the qualified electors of Kansas, to be ratified by them; and if so ratified, the President, on information of the fact, shall proclaim it a State of the Union without further proceedings; and, if it be not ratified, to have a new constitutional convention convened. My amendment will be an enabling act in effect, but admitting Kansas for the present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, after the very eloquent and conclusive speech of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] with the most of whose remarks I heartily concur, and after the exhibition which he has given of the iniquity of the constitution that is sought to be forced upon the people of Kansas, this would seem to be the most appropriate time to take the vote. It would seem that no person could have listened to the detail of facts given by him, to his statement of the management that was resorted to for the purpose of adopting this constitution and forcing it upon the people of Kansas under color of the forms of law, without being satisfied that it was an iniquitous and infamous thing, that ought not to receive the approbation of any fair minded man in any portion of the Union. I rejoice that we have had such a speech from such a quarter. I believe it is only necessary that this question should be understood in the South to bring up from that section an opposition to the Lecompton iniquity almost as unanimous as that which we have in the North. It is because this matter has been mixed up with the slavery question, it is because the cry of abolition has been raised against those who have exposed these iniquities, that they have found advocates in any portion of the country. I think the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky will do great good. I hope they will be extensively read. If they are, I have no fear of the result with the people of this country, North or South. There is too much honesty in the South, and just as much there, I admit, as in the North—there is too much honesty among our people everywhere, knowingly to wish to deprive any people of self-government, or to force upon any State a constitution obnoxious to a majority of its people.

But, sir, although this question may seem so clear to the impartial listener to the masterly exposition of the Senator from Kentucky, the measure has many advocates on the opposite side of the Chamber, and it is sought to be consummated by the aid of the power and patronage of this Government. Iniquitous as it is, there are those—and, I am sorry to say, a powerful and a numerous party—in the country who are seeking to force this instrument on the people of Kansas, and to cause the bill now pending to be enacted into a law. Therefore it is that I feel at liberty, and deem it to be my duty, to state my objections to this constitution, and the reasons which govern me in opposing the admission of Kansas into the Union under it; although in doing this, I shall necessarily have to restate much that has been better said than I can hope to state it.

It is admitted that we are in the midst of a great excitement. It is admitted that a question is pending before us which threatens the peace and the harmony of the Union. Upon the one side it is said that if this constitution be accepted by Congress, there will be resistance to it in Kansas; a civil war will follow which may extend to other portions of the Union, and involve all the States in a conflict before it is over, leading to a destruction of the Government itself. Upon the other side it is said, and we know that certain Legislatures in the southern States have adopted resolutions to the effect, that if it does not pass, conventions are to be called to take steps preparatory to a dismemberment of the Union. Here, in the Senate, we have seen that the Kansas question is of such vast importance that everything else is laid aside for its consideration. No other business affecting the interests of the Government can receive our attention until this is disposed of.

Now, sir, what has brought us to this condition of things? What is the origin of this difficulty? We should know the occasion, the cause of the mischief, before we undertake to provide a remedy. Doubtless the slavery question lies at the bottom of this difficulty; and, but for it, I apprehend there would be no considerable party in the country advocating the admission of Kansas into the Union under this constitution. But the immediate cause of our trouble arises out of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act in 1854, which repealed the Missouri compromise. In my discussion of this subject, I do not propose to go further back than 1850. I go back to that period, and trace the history of the Kansas-Nebraska act, not for the purpose of reproaching those who were instrumental in its passage—that matter has gone by—but for the purpose of showing the correctness of the position which I occupy; and I shall be exceedingly glad, if, in the contest which is now raging, we can have the assistance of any or of all of those who were in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska act.

What was the policy adopted in 1850? It was non-intervention; that is, that Congress would not interfere with the subject of slavery in the Territories, for no one ever contended that Congress had authority to interfere with that subject in the States of the Union. The whole controversy has been, and is, in regard to slavery in the Territories. The policy adopted in 1850 was to have nothing to do with it. If we subsequently acquired territory in which slavery existed at the time of the acquisition, Congress was not to interfere for its abolition; if the territory was free by virtue of any existing law, as was the case with the territory acquired from Mexico under the Mexican laws, and of that lying north of 36° 30' of the Louisiana purchase by the Missouri compromise, Congress should not interfere to repeal those laws, but should leave the country in the condition it then was. In fact, slavery was then excluded from all the Territories of the United States by virtue of some positive law, except from that portion of the territory acquired from France which lay south of 36° 30'.

This policy gave peace to the country. All parties acquiesced in it. After a most exciting contest, and a great deal of agitation in 1850, the country became quiet, and it was not until 1854 that agitation again commenced. To show what was the condition of the country from 1850 to 1854, I will read an extract from a speech delivered in this body when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was pending, in 1854, by a Senator from Michigan, now the Secretary of State. Mr. Cass said, in language more beautiful than I can use:

"Mr. President, but four brief years are passing away, brief in the life of a nation, since this Hall resounded with angry and agitating discussions upon the very topics that now disturb and divide us, and since every breeze that spread out to the heavens the flag that waves over us—our fathers' flag, and, blessed be God, yet our own—brought us from crowded city and from lonely cabin, from hill, valley, and prairie, from ocean and lake, the echoes of anxiety and alarm, passing over the country, and which announced that a great people had reached a crisis in their destiny, which, for weal or for woe, might mark their history during long ages to come. Well, all this passed away, by the mercy of Providence rather than by the wisdom of man, and a beautiful tribute was furnished to the inestimable value of free institutions; for there is not another Government under heaven which could have entered into such a trial and come out of it unscathed. Peace and prosperity and good feeling were restored, and we looked forward to long years of tranquillity. The events now upon us are another illustration of the vanity of human expectations. But yesterday, the whole hemisphere was without a cloud, even on the distant horizon—to-day, the signs of an approaching tempest are audible and visible, and the only question which can ever put to hazard our Union and safety, presents itself for solution."

"Mr. President, I have not withheld the expression of my regret elsewhere, nor shall I withhold it here, that this question of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, which opens all the disputed points connected with the subject of congressional action upon slavery in the territory of the United States has been brought before us. I do not think the practical advantages to result from the measure will outweigh the injury which the ill-feeling, fated to accompany the discussion of this subject through the country, is sure to produce. And I was confirmed in this impression by what was said by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Dixon,] and by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. Badger,] and also by the remarks which fell from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Hunter,] and in which I fully concur, that the South will never derive any benefit from this measure, so far as respects the extension of slavery; for legislate as we may, no human power can ever establish it in the regions defined by these bills."

I have read this extract for the purpose of showing what was the opinion of a distinguished Senator at that time, and one who felt constrained to vote for the Kansas-Nebraska bill that brought these difficulties upon the country. The passage of that bill opened up, as he eloquently remarked, the discussion of that question which alone has hitherto put to hazard the safety and the peace of the Union. It was a departure from the non-intervention policy adopted in 1850, for Congress, by the Kansas-Nebraska act, intervened to repeal an existing statute which excluded slavery from the Territories then organized. Here was the mistake. Many of those who advocated that measure did not, perhaps, see the consequences which were to flow from it. I do not suppose they did.

The reasons which they gave were that by repealing the law excluding slavery from Kansas and Nebraska, the question of its existence in those Territories would be left to the people who should settle there, and that this disposition of the subject would remove it from the political arena and from the Halls of Congress, and transfer it to the people of the Territory to be affected by it, where it properly belonged. This was the argument. How ill that measure has answered the purposes for which it was designed by those who took that view of the subject, history shows. So far from removing this exciting topic from our congressional discussions, the Halls of Congress have not ceased from that day to this to resound with speeches made upon the subject of slavery. So far from transferring the matter to the decision of the people who should settle in the Territory, most of those who advocated the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act now deny wholly the right of the people of a Territory to act upon the subject at all while the territorial condition continues.

Both the objects which it was said were to be accomplished by the passage of that bill have signally failed. The right of the people of a Territory, while in a territorial condition, to act upon this subject is now denied, notwithstanding what is said in the bill about leaving to the people of the Territory the regulation of their domestic institutions in their own way, upon the ground that constitutionally they have no such right; that the Constitution of the United States extends slavery to the Territories and perpetuates it so long as the territorial condition continues. In support of this proposition, we are referred to what is called the Dred Scott decision. No such question was decided in the Dred Scott case. The only point decided in that case was that a person descended from Africans, who were held as slaves, had no authority to sue in the circuit court of the United States. The Supreme Court did not decide whether Dred Scott was a freeman or a slave, and it was wholly immaterial to the decision made whether he was the one or the other. They decided the case upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to hear him, and then proceeded, in an extra-judicial manner, without having the questions legitimately before them, to pronounce opinions upon political questions; and to my utter astonishment, the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] a distinguished lawyer, undertook, the other day, to show that that portion of their opinion upon these political questions as to the authority of Congress to exclude slavery from a Territory, and the right of slaveholders to introduce it, amounted to a decision and was properly before the court. He reproached those of us who had asserted that the only question decided by the court was one of jurisdiction. I will read a few sentences from what he said:

"It was said everywhere, 'this court is usurping power; it has no such power as that which it assumes; it first says it has no jurisdiction, and then, after declaring itself to be without power over the subject-matter, it presumes to determine it.' Every Senator on this side of the Chamber, who has spoken, has repeated this. I want to nail the assertion to the counter; the coin is false."

"Every Senator who has spoken on the subject of this decision has declared that the court said it was without jurisdiction to determine it, and then determined it. I say that all the judges declared that they had jurisdiction of the merits, and determined that point before they decided the merits; and I am prepared to prove it."

"Now, shall I detain the Senate by reading passages from the speeches which I hold in my hand, and in which every Senator in succession, who has spoken of this decision, has spread before the country the bold, plain statement that the Supreme Court first decided that it had no jurisdiction, and then went on to determine the merits?"

Every careful reader will observe the different forms in which this is stated. The Senator from Louisiana is going to nail to the counter the assertion that the Supreme Court decided it had no jurisdiction, and then decided upon the merits; and he is going to do that by showing that each judge said he had jurisdiction. Who denied that? That is not the point in issue. The question is, what did the court decide, not what each judge said about his having jurisdiction. Suppose they had said that they had jurisdiction to try the honorable Senator from Louisiana for misstating their opinion: would that have given them jurisdiction? The charge made by us, which is not refuted, and cannot be refuted, is, that the court decided that they had no jurisdiction, and then went on to decide, or rather express opinions, upon the merits of the case. I will prove this; and I will prove it from their own decision; and will show that the nails with which the honorable Senator from Louisiana has attempted to fasten to the counter the assertion that the court had authority to decide anything else than as to the jurisdiction, broke in the driving, and cannot hold the assertion to any such place. The court say in their opinion delivered by Judge Taney:

"It will be observed that the plea applies to that class of persons only whose ancestors were negroes of the African race, and imported into this country, and sold and held as slaves. The only matter in issue before the court, therefore, is, whether the descendants of such slaves, when they shall be emancipated, or who are born of parents who had become free before their birth, are citizens of a State, in two sense in which the word citizen is used in the Constitution of the United States. And this being the only matter in dispute on the pleadings, the court must be understood as speaking in this opinion of that class only, that is, of those persons who are the descendants of Africans who were imported into this country, and sold as slaves."

In the conclusion of his opinion the Chief Justice says:

"Upon the whole, therefore, it is the judgment of this court"—

Now we come to the actual decision:

"that it appears by the record before us that the plaintiff in error is not a citizen of Missouri, in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution; and that the circuit court of the United States, for that reason, had no jurisdiction in the case, and could give no judgment in it."

Could anything be plainer? The court first state the only question before them to be whether a particular class of persons can sue as citizens in the United States courts, and then decide, that the party is not a citizen of Missouri; and that for that reason the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the case, and could give no judgment in it. Now it matters not what each individual judge may have said upon matters not involved in the decision made, and it is a most singular way of proving that such sayings were not dicta because the judge said they were not. What is dictum? It is the expression of the opinion of judges upon a matter not necessary to the decision of the case and not involved in the decision made. What is involved in the decision made in this case? Not the freedom or slavery of Dred Scott, nor the effect of his residence north of 36° 30' north latitude, or in the State of Illinois. Why, sir, every judge who delivers a decision, and then goes on to express an opinion on matters not necessary to the decision of the point which determines the case, in the very act of so doing asserts his authority for his course, and yet such expression of opinion is clearly dictum. No judge ever so far stultified himself as to declare to begin with, "what I am now going to say is out of the case, and is of no authority whatever, but I will go on to say it." Because these judges say they have authority to express their opinions on questions not involved in the decision made, the Senator from Louisiana says it makes their opinion authority. So far will men be blinded on this slavery question, by their prejudices or feelings, that it seems they cannot look impartially even at the decision of a court.

What further position does the Senator from Louisiana take? He says the Supreme Court, it is true, decided that the circuit court of Missouri had not jurisdiction to determine the case, but they did not decide that they themselves had no jurisdiction. Sir, can it be possible that the Senator from Louisiana contends that the Supreme Court had any larger or greater jurisdiction than the circuit court whence the case came? It is not one of that class of cases over which, by the Constitution, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction; it is a case where it has only appellate jurisdiction. Can the appellate jurisdiction be larger than the jurisdiction of the court from which the appeal is taken? Can the stream rise higher than the fountain? When it was decided that the circuit court had no jurisdiction, and could give no judgment in the case, how idle it is to say that the Supreme Court had jurisdiction and could give judgment.

Having disposed of the jurisdiction of the court, and shown that the opinions which the judges expressed, outside of the decision which they made, are entitled to no authority, and are merely the expression of opinions upon political questions, entitled to no more weight than they would have if coming from the same gentlemen off the bench, I wish now to follow up a little further the argument of the Senator from Louisiana. He stated:

"The whole subject of slavery, so far as it is involved in the issue now before the country, is narrowed down at last to a controversy on the solitary point whether it be competent for the Congress of the United States, directly or indirectly, to exclude slavery from the Territory of the Union. The Supreme Court of the United States have given a negative answer to this proposition, and it shall be my first effort to support that negation by argument, independently of the authority of the decision."

I have shown that the Supreme Court have made no such decision, nor do I believe they ever will. Again, the Senator said:

"It seems to me that the radical, fundamental error which underlies the argument in affirmation of this power, is the assumption that slavery is the creature of the statute law of the several States where it is established; that it has no existence outside of the limits of those States; that slaves are not property beyond those limits; and that property in slaves is neither recognized nor protected by the Constitution of the United States, nor by international law."

In support of his views, the Senator stated, that

"Down to the very moment when our independence was won, slavery, by the statute laws of England, was the common law of the old thirteen colonies."

This statement seemed to me to be paradoxical. I did not know how statute law could make common law. I understood the common law to be the unwritten law which was evidenced by the decisions of courts and by treaties on the subject of law, and that there was a distinction between statute and common law. But in order to show that slavery existed by the common law in this country, he referred to various statutes in England and did show that persons had been held in slavery, both whites and blacks, in various parts of Europe. I only wish to refer to the two cases which he read, to show—I was about to say, the fallacy, but I wish to use no harsh terms—of his whole argument; they do not support the position for which he quoted them. The two cases upon which he commented at length are the Somerset case, decided by Lord Mansfield, before the Revolution, in 1771, and the case of the slave Grace, decided some fifty years later, by Lord Stowell. It was decided by Lord Mansfield in the Somerset case, that "The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself, from whence it was created, is erased from the memory; it is of a nature that nothing can be suffered to support it but positive law."

Here was a decision as to how slavery existed. It was of such a character that nothing could be suffered to support it but positive law. This is the highest evidence of what the common law of England was at that day; and that decision has never been overturned. Lord Stowell's opinion, delivered fifty years later, is not in conflict with it. The case here was as to the condition of a person who had been in England, but afterwards returned to a colony where slavery existed. Lord Stowell decided, that having gone voluntarily back into a state of slavery, she could not, in that colony, assert her freedom; but he did not decide that she was a slave in England, although the Senator read from a portion of the argument that might leave that inference, or, rather, stated it in his speech. His statement was this—to be accurate, I will read what he said:

"I have already shown to you, by the passages I have cited from the opinions of Lord Stowell and of Judge Story, how they regard this subject. They say that the slave who goes to England, or goes to Massachusetts, from a slave State, is still a slave; that he is still his master's property; but that his master has lost control over him; not by reason of the cessation of his property, but because those States grant no remedy to the master by which he can exercise his control."

I say they decided no such thing. Lord Stowell did not decide that Grace was a slave in England. He only decided upon her condition after she had voluntarily gone back into a state of servitude. To show Lord Stowell's views as to the condition of the person while in England—and I have already stated the point decided—I will read from a portion of his opinion:

"I observe that, by the papers transmitted by the Advocate General to his Majesty's Secretary of State, this notion of a right to freedom by virtue of a residence in England is universally held out as a matter which is not to be denied; but it is contested by the judge upon the ground that the residence in England conveys only the character so designated during the time of that residence, and continues no longer than the period of such residence. The person who is a freeman in England, returns to slavery in Antigua; that is the whole question in the cause; if to be decided in favor of this female, she has a right to maintain this cause, and to claim a judgment; but if, on the contrary, her freedom ceased with her residence in England, she has no right to claim it, and, consequently, no power of maintaining the present suit. The judge of the court below was perfectly correct in entering into this general question, and required no apology for so doing, for it is really the hinge upon which the whole of this case depends."—2 Haggard's Reports, p. 104.

Lord Stowell admitted the freedom of the slave while in England. The hinge upon which the case turned was whether she had a right to claim free, dom after returning back into servitude. But, sir, that slavery is the mere creature of local law, and can exist only where the local law operates, has been established by the highest tribunal in this country. The very Supreme Court to which the gentleman appeals, have settled this question, and why should we now contend about it? In the case of Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania (and I read an extract from it which I have compared with the text and found to be correct), it is decided by the court, upon which question there was no disagreement between its members, that "The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation, founded upon and limited to the range of territorial laws."

Here is a decision of the highest tribunal in the land; the very one to which the gentleman appeals to conclude us by extraneous opinions not involved in the case. I could read other authorities. The authorities are numerous in the slave States themselves, where similar decisions have been made. The courts in Kentucky have expressly so decided. But I need only read the opinion of Lord Mansfield as to what the common law was when our independence was achieved; and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered only a few years ago, to show that slavery can only exist by virtue of positive law, and is the creature of municipal regulation. I am willing to leave this part of the matter with these two decisions. They are conclusive, and there is no escape from them.

The next proposition which is sought to be maintained by those who contend for this extraordinary doctrine that slavery extends into the Territories without any law to create it, is that it goes there by virtue of the Constitution; and this seems to be the President's opinion. The clauses of the Constitution upon this subject, and the only ones which relate to it in any shape, are four. The first is that which apportions representation, and includes as the basis,

"The whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, and three fifths of all other persons."

That clause is supposed to relate to slaves, under the name of "all other persons," the Constitution not using the word "slave." But it by no means creates or makes slaves. Another clause of the Constitution is:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808; but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

It was contended the other day that under this clause the Constitution of the United States established slavery and carried it to the Territories. Now, what is the Constitution of the United States? It is a compact made between the States of the Union, establishing a government possessing only those powers which have been surrendered to it. Because here is a clause denying certain powers to the Congress of the United States, denying their authority to prevent the importation of a certain class of persons before 1808, it is therefore contended, strangely, as it seems to me, that that clause establishes property in those persons and creates slavery. The Congress of the United States, before the expiration of that period, possessed the power, under the general grant of authority to regulate commerce, to prohibit the importation of slaves, and did so in regard to the Territories of the United States. Congress also possessed power to prohibit their importation into any new States which should be created; but as to the old States they had not this authority down to 1808. Certainly this is not the establishment of slavery by the Constitution, but it is a limitation on the power of Congress to prevent the importation of slaves after a certain period. It was a refusal on the part of the States to surrender to the Federal Government the power which they had to import slaves under their own law for a limited period, and does not tend in the least to establish the proposition that of itself it creates slavery.

Another clause of the Constitution is that relating to the surrender of fugitives. That clause reads as follows:

"No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

It will be observed that this is a provision for the surrender of persons escaping from service, who are held to service by virtue of a State law. Could there have been any necessity for a provision to reclaim persons held by virtue of a State law, if the Constitution of the United States had provided that they should be held to service by any of its provisions? It is very clear that there is no provision for reclaiming a slave held by virtue of the Constitution of the United States as the President tells us slaves are held in Kansas. Suppose a fugitive escapes from Kansas, where slavery exists, according to the President, and gets into the State of Iowa; his master comes for him and claims him: what must he show? Under this clause of the Constitution, he must show that he is held to service or labor in consequence of some law or regulation in the State from which he escaped. This clause has no application to Territories; and if it did apply to Territories, still the slave could not be reclaimed, unless it was shown that he was held by virtue of a law or regulation in the Territory or State whence he escaped.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the political part of their opinion, in discussing this pretended right of a slaveholder to take his slaves into free territory, refer us to still another clause of the Constitution. They say:

"The rights of property are united with the rights of person, and placed on the same ground, by the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, and property, without due process of law.' And an act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular territory of the United States, and who had committed no offense against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law."

Let us examine this clause, which is to be found, I believe, in all the State constitutions, that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. If, under that provision, the importation of slaves into a Territory cannot be prohibited, it follows, as a matter of course, that their importation into any of the States cannot be prohibited. The law against the slave trade would be unconstitutional; for, if a citizen of any of the slaveholding States, having a slave in Cuba, were to bring him to the United States, you could not deprive him of that slave, because it would be depriving him, in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, of his right to property, if that is the meaning of the Constitution. What becomes of that provision in the Constitution which authorizes Congress, after the year 1808, to prohibit the importation of this class of persons? The Constitution would be inconsistent with itself if this were the meaning of the clause quoted. What becomes of the law in the District of Columbia—for there was a statute, passed here in 1850—one of the compromise measures—declaring that if any person brought a slave into this District, for sale or with a view of placing him in a depot, and afterwards removing him elsewhere to be sold, the slave should become free? Did anybody suppose this act was a violation of the Constitution of the United States? They have had a similar law in Virginia ever since it was a State. Similar laws exist in Mississippi. It was part of their constitution to prevent the bringing of slaves into the State, except by persons who came there to settle; and the courts of Virginia have decided that a person born in Virginia, taken subsequently into the State of Maryland, and afterwards purchased and brought back into Virginia, was thereby made free.

It is not a deprivation of the right to property to declare that the introduction of a particular class of persons or things, into a State or Territory, shall operate as a forfeiture of the person or thing imported; and this is what the Missouri compromise amounted to, and nothing more. This is the penalty for importing a forbidden article. We pass laws forfeiting goods which are imported in violation of our revenue laws. Apply this principle to the act of 1820, to the territory lying north of 36° 30'. At that time it was uninhabited. No white persons, no slaves, lived there. Had Congress then authority to pass a law prohibiting the importation of slaves into that territory, and providing, as a penalty, that if they were introduced they should be free? It clearly had, if it had any authority to pass the law prohibiting the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or if any of the States of the Union have authority to pass laws prohibiting the importation of slaves. Many of the slaveholding States have such provisions in their constitutions, and many of them have laws against the importation of negroes, and declaring them to be free when imported in violation of such laws. It is a penalty to prevent the importation of persons whom they do not want. On this point, let me refer to an opinion of Judge Taney himself, in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, page 449, where he says:

"In my opinion the power over this subject is exclusively with the several States, and each of them has a right to decide for itself, whether it will or will not allow persons of this description to be brought within its limits from another State, either for sale or for any other purpose."

So, sir, when you come to examine each and all of these clauses, it will be found that none of them establish slavery or prohibit to Congress the right to pass a law preventing the importation of slaves into the Territories.

There is, however, another argument, which perhaps I may denominate the common blood and treasure argument. It is that the Territories of the United States belong to all the people of the United States, that they were acquired by the common blood and treasure of all, and that every citizen has the same right to go into the Territories. I admit it. A citizen of South Carolina has precisely the same right that a citizen of Massachusetts has to go into a Territory—no greater, and no less; and if there be a law prohibiting the importation of slaves into a Territory, it is equally obligatory on the citizen of South Carolina and of Massachusetts. There is nothing in the position we take in conflict with the common rights of all; but no citizen, as a citizen, has a right to go upon the public lands, or into any Territory of the United States, appropriating to himself any portion of the common property of the Union, unless Congress authorizes it. Congress exercises its discretion in organizing territorial governments. It may prevent their settlement by white men or black men, as it has done for a series of years. Congress might have refused to organize territorial governments in Kansas and Nebraska until this day, and thus have prevented the settlement of a single person, white or black, in either of those Territories. The fact that the property belongs to the United States, gives no individual citizen a right to take it and possess it.

This Capitol belongs to the United States; the White House belongs to the United States; but what would you think of a citizen of South Carolina coming here with his negroes, and taking possession of the White House, because it was acquired by the common blood and treasure of the whole country; or of a citizen from Massachusetts coming here, and taking possession of the Senate Chamber, because it was acquired with the blood and treasure of the whole country, and he has equal rights? He has equal rights in subordination to the Constitution and laws of his country. This Capitol and the White House are for the benefit of the citizens of Massachusetts and of South Carolina, and of each alike; but the citizen of neither has a right as such to come and occupy them. So it is with the Territories. They belong to the United States to be taken care of and governed by Congress so long as the territorial condition continues, and citizens are to go there and settle in subordination to such laws as Congress may pass.

It is incumbent on those who say that the Constitution of the United States extends slavery to Kansas, to point us to the clause. We deny it. Not only does the Constitution of the United States not extend slavery into any of the Territories, but the Constitution itself does not go there until it is extended by the operation of law. The Constitution was made between the States and for the States. It has nothing to do with the Territories, except to confer on Congress the power to govern them. The Constitution was made by the States for their own government, and power was conferred by the States, through that Constitution, on the Congress which they created to regulate and govern the Territories. But the Constitution itself does not operate over Territories unless Congress extends it there by law. This was the view of those who passed the Kansas-Nebraska act, for it contains an express provision extending the Constitution over these Territories.

Now, sir, what power has Congress over the Territories? I answer, such power as the Constitution has given, which is to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them—no greater and no less. I am not going into the history of the legislation of Congress from its organization down to the present period, to show that under all administrations Congress has exercised power over the Territories, and that, too, on the subject of slavery. But I will make a little time to prove, if I can, that the Supreme Court of the United States has itself established the doctrine firmly that Congress has authority over the Territories; to govern them in its discretion, and to prohibit slavery therein. I would ask those who deny this power, and who at the same time sing hosannas to the court below, and who assail us for refusing to indorse the extra-judicial political opinions of its judges, to stand by the decisions of that court on this subject. As long ago as 1810, Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Sere vs. Pitot, (6th Cranch, 336,) used this language:

"The power of governing and legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and hold territory. Could this position be contested? The Constitution declares that 'Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' Accordingly, we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of Orleans."

In 1828, in the case of Canter vs. the American Insurance Company, (1 Peters, 511,) which has been often referred to, the same distinguished judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"In the mean time, Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, governed by that clause of the Constitution which empowers Congress 'to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' Perhaps the power of governing a Territory belonging to the United States which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government, may result necessarily from the facts, that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence this power may be derived, the possession of it is unquestioned."

In another part of this opinion the court say, that in legislating for the Territories, "Congress exercises the combined powers of the General and a State government."

Again, in the case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, (4 Wheaton, 422,) Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the whole court, and in another case decided in 1840 by Judge Thompson—the United States vs. Gratiot, reported in 14 Peters, 537—both refer without qualification to the clause and power in Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting Territories, as the true undoubted source of the power of Congress over Territories. In a late case, that of Cross vs. Harrison, reported in 16 Howard, 193, Judge Wayne, in delivering the opinion of the court in regard to a case from California, uses this language:

"The territory has been ceded as a conquest, and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. That sovereignty was the United States under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress 'to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.'"

Here are five decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, reaching from 1810 down to 1854, every one of them affirming the sovereignty of the Territories to be in Congress, and the authority of Congress over the Territories to legislate for them. Now, if the sovereignty of the Territories be in Congress, and if they may make all needful rules and regulations for them, may they not pass a law prohibiting slavery in them? Who is to judge what is needful and necessary? That is not a judicial question. It is a question for the discretion of Congress, to determine what laws are needful, necessary, and proper, for the government of the people who are to settle in the Territories, till they become sufficiently numerous to form a government for themselves.

Now, sir, what shall we say of those gentlemen who assail us for attacking the obiter dicta sayings of the Supreme Court of the United States when they are denying the authority of five decisions of that court, reaching through a period of nearly fifty years? What shall we say of the opinion of the court in this Dred Scott case—I do not mean the decision, I mean the opinions of the judges—when they say that this clause giving to Congress authority to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory of the United States applies only to the territory which we held at the time the Constitution was formed, directly in the teeth of as many as three of the decisions on that point, to which I have referred, which related to territory acquired after the Constitution was adopted? Florida, Louisiana, and California were all acquired subsequently; and yet the Supreme Court of the United States in cases relating to those Territories has said that Congress had the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them under the clause of the Constitution which I have quoted. Shall the opinion of certain judges of the United States overturn the settled decisions of that court? What right have Senators to attack those decisions? Where was their reverence for the Supreme Court when they were calling upon it here, a year ago, to overturn its own settled decisions for a period of nearly half a century? Are we to be reproached when we say that these last political opinions outside of the case before the court are not to be treated as authority, and that we will not abide by them, when they assail its settled decisions?

We expect to show, if a case involving the question should ever arise, that the opinions lately expressed by some of the judges in the Dred Scott case are in conflict with the decisions of their own court, in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and I do not believe such a decision as has been indicated will ever be made. Congress have the power, as I insist and as the Supreme Court has repeatedly decided, to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, this extending as well to territory which should be acquired as that which we then held; for it is idle to contend, as some of the judges do, and I believe Judge Taney, that because the definite article "the" is used in this connection it only applies to "the" territory which we then had. The same reasoning would apply the authority of the President as commander of the Army and Navy, to the Army and Navy in existence when the Constitution was made. It is "the Army and Navy," of which the President is made Commander-in-Chief. Does not that mean any army and any navy which the United States may ever raise? Would it not be absurd to confine it to the one which was then in existence? Equally it seems to me is it absurd to confine the language which I have quoted in regard to the authority to govern the territory of the United States, to that territory which we then possessed.

Congress, then, having this authority, in its exercise ought to use a sound discretion and establish for a Territory such a government as it believes will be best for the interests of the people who are to settle it; and this brings up the question of slavery. If slavery, as an original institution, is a good one; if it is a benefit to the slave and to the white people, then Congress in its power to establish all needful rules and regulations for the government of the Territory, would not be required to pass a law to keep it out. If, however, in the opinion of Congress, it is better to have no slavery where it does not already exist; if as an original question in this country, it would have been better had no slaves been introduced; then Congress, in opening a free territory to settlement, ought to provide against its introduction.

I believe it to be better for the white race that negro slavery should not exist among them. If that be so, it is the duty of Congress to provide against its spread wherever it has the power, and here is the whole question; that is all there is of it. Nobody proposes any interference with slavery in the States of the Union where it exists under the laws of the States. All that any one proposes is to prevent its introduction into the Territories so long as the territorial condition continues, and if it be excluded for that length of time the result will be that our new States formed from such Territories will all be free States. Why should this be so objectionable to the South? The South is not settled entirely by slaveholders. I believe only about one in twenty of the white population in the southern States own slaves. I know that those who do not own them help the slaveholders to sustain the institution. Why? Because they do not want negroes to be placed on an equality with themselves. If laborers themselves, they wish at least to keep up the distinction between them and the laboring negroes, that the latter have a master. But, sir, I believe to-day that if it were practicable to get rid of the black population, the great mass of the laboring people of the South would be in favor of such a measure. Then labor would be elevated. Then the laboring man of the South, like the same class in the North, would occupy an honorable position in society.

That, however, is a matter with which we do not propose to interfere. Our only object is to prevent the extension of slavery among the people of the new Territories. We find that emigrants from the southern States, of moderate means, who have come into our northwestern States where slavery did not exist, have been as much opposed to introducing it as emigrants from other portions of the country. A large portion of the State of Illinois is settled by persons from the slaveholding States. Nearly all the early settlers were from Kentucky and Tennessee, and North Carolina, persons not of large wealth, gaining their livelihood by their own labor, and the great mass of that population is as much opposed to slavery as the emigrants from New England. Such would be their condition at home if it were not an existing institution. Now, sir, when Congress comes to form a government for a people which is to last only until that people becomes numerous enough to establish one for itself, is there anything wrong in excluding slavery from among them?

When the Missouri compromise was repealed, and strife arose as to what should be the future condition of Kansas, those of us who opposed that repeal were anxious that the inhabitants themselves should make it a free State. People went to the Territory from the North who did not desire the existence of slavery among them; persons came from the South who owned slaves and desired their introduction. Hence arose strife and contentions. The history of those difficulties has been given here to-day. I will not take up the time of the Senate by detailing it again at any length. I wish merely to say that it has been a history of usurpation from the beginning. The territorial government was usurped in the first instance, and that usurpation has continued, and the people have been wrongly blamed for not voting, and not taking the government out of the hands of the usurpers, when they were utterly powerless to do so while the usurpation was upheld by the Federal Government and Federal troops. The whole difficulty existed in the original usurpation. Men having once got into power, and having the whole control of the government, and then having the Federal Government to back them, had the ability to perpetuate their power, if they were unscrupulous enough and dishonest enough to do it. How they have done it has been shown to-day. As an illustration of the condition of things in Kansas, I will refer to one case.

A young gentleman, by the name of Phillips, went to Kansas as a settler, at an early day. I knew him some six or eight years ago, in the State of Illinois, when he was studying law. He was a modest, unassuming, unobtrusive young man. He went to Kansas as early as 1854. In the fall of that year I met him upon the Mississippi river traveling on a steamboat; learned from him that he had settled in Kansas, at Leavenworth, and was going to make it his home. Knowing that fact, conversation sprang up between us in regard to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. The difficulties had not then commenced. I ascertained that he was in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska act. He took the ground which was common to persons in the northern States who advocated the measure at that time, that the people of the Territory ought to have the right to settle the slavery question for themselves. He said that he was opposed to slavery; that there was no danger of Kansas being made a slave State; but that the people there wanted to settle that matter for themselves; they did not want Congress to settle it for them; they would take care of it. I remonstrated with him, and said to him, "if you are opposed to slavery, and if the people of Kansas are opposed to the introduction of slavery, why are you not willing to let well enough alone? The law of Congress excluded it, and why do you want to do it yourself? Why not allow it to be excluded by virtue of the act of Congress? Because you have power, it is not always wise or advisable to exercise it." I referred him to the language of a celebrated orator in the English Parliament, who, replying to the argument that, because England had the right to tax America, therefore she ought to tax America, illustrated its absurdity by relating the story of the man who insisted on shearing a wolf because he had the right to shear the wolf. When remonstrated with as to the impropriety and danger of undertaking to shear the wolf, he insisted that man had dominion over the beasts of the field; that he had a right to shear the wolf, and therefore he would shear the wolf. [Laughter.] It was so, I remarked to him, with the people of Kansas. They insisted upon exercising the right of excluding slavery themselves, without considering the dangers and the difficulties that would arise from its exercise. However, I was unable to satisfy him.

The next I heard of Mr. Phillips was shortly after the election of March 30 following. He resided at Leavenworth; and being a believer in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and the right of the people to regulate their own affairs, and to exclude slavery for themselves, he was very much astonished when the Missourians came over and carried the election, and drove him and his friends from the polls. He immediately made an affidavit of the facts, went to Governor Reeder, who very properly set the election aside, and ordered a new election.

Phillips, from that day, was a marked man. He was seized upon directly after this by a mob, taken across the river, his head shaved and he blacked, set up at auction, sold by a negro as a negro, and other indignities heaped upon him. He continued to reside at Leavenworth, and was joined there by a brother, I think. During the reign of Governor Shannon, when military companies were parading that Territory and expelling free-State settlers under the pretense of searching for arms, a company assembled about the house of Phillips, and demanded entrance. Phillips having once fallen into the hands of these men, and been treated with all sorts of indignities, did not care to surrender himself up a second time. He refused to open his doors. The company demanded entrance, and commenced forcing the doors. He defended himself as best he could, killing two of the assailants, and fell himself, pierced, I believe, by a dozen balls. That was the kind of government they had in Kansas. His wife was taken from Leavenworth, and the last I heard of her, she was in the lunatic asylum at Jacksonville, in the State of Illinois.

Who do you suppose commanded that military company? Captain Emery, who was subsequently indicted for this killing—indicted even by a grand jury, while the usurpers had authority in Kansas; and while laboring under that indictment for the murder of Phillips, he was appointed by the President of the United States to a land office, which, I understand, he now holds. A nolle prosequi was entered on the indictment, I believe, as was generally done throughout the Territory, during Governor Geary's time. Emery was never brought to trial. He had no process authorizing him to enter the house of Phillips—no sort of authority.

This one case is an illustration of the condition of things in Kansas, under the despotism which has prevailed there from the day of the organization of the territorial government down to 1857, or, I may say, down to the meeting of her last Legislature.

Governor Walker went to that Territory and blamed the people for not voting; for not going to the elections and taking the control of the government; taking it out of the hands of these men. The President of the United States blames them. He says they ought to have been registered and voted. What chance would the people have of carrying an election? The quantity of fraud, the number of votes returned was measured by the quantity and the number necessary to win. The people knew that it mattered not whether they polled five hundred or five thousand votes; the returns would be against them. Governor Walker told them that that should not be so, and urged upon them to vote, and he so far prevailed as to induce them to vote at the October election in 1857; and what was the result? Do you say they succeeded? No, sir; they did not succeed by the returns. They did not succeed by what they did; but providentially, as it were, Governor Walker, to their utter astonishment, stepped in to their relief. Their all was risked upon him, because, had he carried out the frauds and iniquities of the returning officers, and counted the votes they returned, the same usurpers would have perpetuated their power. He threw out the Oxford votes and some others, and by that means the control of the Legislature was given to the real citizens of Kansas; but such a storm of indignation did that raise that his life was threatened, and provision was made that a rejection of fraudulent votes should not happen a second time. The usurpers then went on, under their convention, which had been previously called, to form a State constitution, and provided, through its machinery, to take the canvassing of the votes out of the hands of Governor Walker, and hold the conducting of future elections, and their returns, in their own hands. They intended, for the future, to provide against an honest count of votes. Although it so happened that the free-State men got the control of the Legislature, by the vote in October, yet it was an accidental circumstance. The frauds were sufficient to have defeated them if allowed.

I say that the people of Kansas are not to be blamed for not going to these elections. The registry law, fair enough on its face, was to be executed in such a way as to retain control in the hands of the usurpers. They appointed all the officers to execute it; and it is a notorious fact that they not only left out whole counties and districts of country in the registry, but I am told, and I have no doubt of the fact, that thousands of names were put on that list of persons who did not live in Kansas at all. Nine thousand persons were registered as voters, but these were not real citizens of Kansas. I do not suppose one fourth of them were citizens of Kansas. These names were registered to be used for ulterior purposes, while thousands of citizens known to the officers taking the registry were not put on the list. As part of this system inaugurated in 1855, and continued by heaping fraud on fraud, a constitution has been framed, and admission into the Union asked. Who asks it? Is it the people of Kansas? I deny it. There is no evidence that the people of Kansas ask to be admitted under this constitution. There is evidence that they do not.

That matter has been so fully and so clearly presented this morning by the Senator from Kentucky, that I should hardly be pardoned for going over the facts again. They show a concerted scheme of the usurpers to keep the control in their own hands. They have taken the appointment of the judges of election, and the counting of the votes, out of the hands of the territorial officers, and placed the whole thing in the hands of men selected by themselves; and we do not know to-day the result of the election held on the 4th of January last. I do not suppose we shall know until after this bill is acted upon. I apprehend we shall know very soon if Kansas be admitted into the Union under this Lecompton constitution.

Mr. SEWARD. But if it is not, what then?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is not, I presume we shall never know. There will then be no occasion to commit fraud; and men without a motive are not likely to commit great crimes.

This constitution is sought to be maintained on the ground of legitimacy—the old doctrine set up by monarchs, who claim to have been born to rule, to trample upon the rights of other people. We deny this legitimacy entirely; but if it were all true, still it would not alter the case. Congress may admit Kansas as a State. It has a discretion on the subject. It may admit a State under a constitution formed without authority, but there is no legitimacy in the proceedings here. The Territorial Legislature clearly had no authority to call a convention. The Kansas-Nebraska act is not an enabling act. It is an act for the organization of a territorial government, and did not authorize that territorial government to destroy itself. Although the Legislature thought proper to call a convention, and delegates were elected by those who thought proper to vote, their proceedings would have no legitimacy about them, even if the Legislature had been valid. It would simply not be illegal, and it might be the means of satisfying Congress that the people desired to come into the Union, and that this constitution expressed their wishes, and was the government of their choice. We have ascertained, however, by the votes taken in January last, that the people are opposed to this constitution. A legal, orderly election has been held since it is said a part of the constitution was voted on by the people on the 21st of December. It matters not, so far as we are concerned, when the election upon the constitution was held. That election is a manifestation of the wishes of the people, and it shows that they are opposed to this constitution.

Then, what excuse have we for admitting Kansas into the Union in this mode? This constitution was not made by the people of Kansas, because they did not participate in the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention. I know it is said they ought to have participated in it, but I have given the reason why they did not. Frauds were practiced upon them; the apportionment was not fair; the registry was not fair; the officers having charge of the poll-books were not men in whom they had the least confidence; and that they judged rightly is manifest from subsequent events. Under such circumstances, the great body of the people did not go into the election; and only some two thousand persons voted for delegates. I grant that if all had a fair opportunity to vote, and two thousand out of twenty thousand voted, those two thousand would control the others; but in this case the others had no such fair opportunity. They did not stay away from the polls for the reason that they were willing that the two thousand who did vote should act for them, but they stayed away because they believed their voting would do no good; they would be outcounted, at any rate. Is it not idle to say that this constitution was made by the people of Kansas, when it was made under such circumstances as those? That it has never been ratified by the people of Kansas, we all know. They have never had an opportunity to pass upon it by the authority of the convention. It is said they have passed upon one clause of it; that is, those who thought proper to vote.

Why should Kansas be admitted into the Union at the present time under this constitution? The President tells us it should be done in order to get rid of this exciting question. Sir, that is exactly what we were told in 1854 when the Missouri compromise was repealed. We were told, if you will repeal that compromise, you will localize the question of slavery, and transfer it to the Territory, where it properly belongs. We are told now, if you will admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, you will localize it. Sir, I believe the promise now will be as futile as was the promise before. This will not remove the slavery agitation from the Halls of Congress. We shall be as greatly disappointed if we put faith in the assurances now given by the President, as we were in the assurances which were given in 1854.

Now, sir, what have been some of the assurances which have been given by Mr. Buchanan heretofore, and how has the present state of things been brought about? I desire to call your attention, for a few moments, to the manner in which this constitution is sought to be forced through Congress, and to some of the contradictions and inconsistencies of its advocates. A few years ago, as was shown the other day by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER]—and I shall not trouble the Senate by reading again the extracts which he presented—Mr. Buchanan gave it as his opinion that the Missouri compromise excluding slavery in what is now Kansas, was constitutional, and he stated that he had supported it. Within the last year, he has said that it was a mystery to him that anybody should ever have questioned the right to introduce slaves into Kansas under the Constitution of the United States. In his letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency, he distinctly avowed the doctrine that the people of the Territory had the right to exclude slavery while in a territorial condition. I have that letter before me. In it he says, after alluding to the legislation in regard to Kansas and Nebraska:

"This legislation is founded upon principles as ancient as free government itself, and, in accordance with them, has simply declared that the people of a Territory, like those of a State, shall decide for themselves whether slavery shall or shall not exist within their limits."

That does not mean that they shall decide it when they form a State government, but it means that they shall decide while in the territorial condition whether slavery shall exist within their limits as a Territory. This is manifest from what follows:

"How vain and illusory would any other principle prove in practice in regard to the Territories! This is apparent from the fact admitted by all, that, after a Territory shall have entered the Union and become a State, no constitutional power would then exist which could prevent it from either abolishing or establishing slavery, as the case may be, according to its sovereign will and pleasure."

So that he was speaking in regard to the right of the people of the Territory to exclude slavery from their limits while in a territorial condition. It was with this letter before the country that he was elected President. No sooner was he elected Chief Magistrate than we find him uttering this doctrine in one of his messages:

"It has been solemnly adjudged by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States."

I have already shown that no such decision has been made. He assumes that it has been.

"Kansas is, therefore, at this moment as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Without this, the equality of the sovereign States composing the Union would be violated, and the use and enjoyment of a Territory acquired by the common treasure of all the States would be closed against the people and the property of nearly half the members of the Confederacy. Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas, except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under its present constitution."

He does not explain how slavery is to be prohibited, except he says the people may change their constitution. First admit them as a slave State in order to afford them a quick means of becoming a free State! He says further in his message that the convention "did submit the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State."

Is that true? Did they submit any such question to the people? They submitted whether a slavery clause should be stricken out or retained in the constitution, but they did not submit to the people of Kansas to decide whether it should be a free State or a slave State, because it was a slave State to all intents and purposes, whether the slavery clause was stricken out or not. If stricken out the constitution still provided that the slavery existing there should never be interfered with. I could not make this clearer if I were to talk about it for an hour. The constitution is before us declaring that the existing institution of slavery shall not be interfered with even if the slavery clause be stricken out. In the face of this record the President has the assurance to say to the Congress of the United States that—

"The question can never be more clearly or distinctly presented than it is at the present moment."

Is that true? Was it clearly and distinctly presented? We know the impediments that were thrown around the right of franchise, that no matter how the people voted on the question submitted to them, Kansas was to be a slave State in any event.

The difficulties attending this question are not to be got rid of by the admission of Kansas under this constitution, as the President supposes. I know that support of this measure is now sought to be made a test of Democracy; a test of party faith; and in this respect it is the counterpart of the Kansas-Nebraska act. I remember very well when that act passed, and the attempt was first made to make it a test of Democracy. I had no idea then that it would succeed. I had myself always been a Democrat. I disapproved of that measure, as did most of the Democracy, as far as I know, in the State of Illinois. Some thought it injudicious; some thought the principle right enough, but doubted the policy; and nearly all concurred in expressions of regret that the Missouri compromise was interfered with. I had no idea at that time, when I expressed my dissent from the measure, that I was to cease to be a Democrat. But, sir, then was inaugurated that test of Democracy which had never before obtained in this country. It was then determined that as a man acted in regard to the extension of slavery into the Territories of the United States, he was to be considered a Democrat or not. I chose to adhere to my position, and oppose a measure which I thought would lead to the spread of slavery, although it should be followed by excommunication from a party calling itself Democratic. I deny that after it set up this new test, it was the real old Democratic party. Admission to its ranks or its offices did not, after 1854, depend upon the principles which a man individually entertained in regard to any of the great measures which formerly distinguished Democrats from Whigs, but depended entirely upon his views on the slavery question; and hence we see that many of the champions of the old Whig party are now the trusted leaders of the so-called Democracy.

Now another test is sought to be introduced; a test involving not only the question whether slavery shall go into Kansas, but involving also the principle of self government, and whether the free white people of Kansas shall be permitted to form a government for themselves. I do not believe we should have had this test but for the slavery question. If slavery were not connected with this Kansas matter, I think there would be no considerable party in the country advocating the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State under this constitution. Slavery lies at the bottom of the difficulty. But there is involved in this issue another principle besides that of African slavery; a principle reaching to white men. For the purpose of carrying out the views of this so-called Democratic party in regard to slavery, we see them now willing to force upon a people a constitution they never made, abandoning the professed principles upon which they passed the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That bill never could have been sustained; that measure would have met with utter condemnation throughout the northern States, if it had been understood at the time it passed, as it is understood now—that is, as denying to the people of the Territory the right to exclude slavery while in a territorial condition. It was the self-government principle; it was the supposed right to regulate the matter for themselves that induced many of the people of the North to approve that measure. I was not one of those who believed that the bill established any such principle, but there were others who did; and although, when the Kansas-Nebraska act passed, they had not the sagacity to foresee the consequences to which it would lead, I commend their honesty, now they do see them, in coming to the rescue of the country, and to the great principle of free government which has now, at all events, been brought into peril.

Sir, I look upon this as a great question. It is no insignificant matter, as has been intimated; it is a question vital to the existence of this Government. You pass this Lecompton constitution, and what is the example which you set to the country and to the world? You refuse to investigate these frauds, you bring a State into the Union with the evidence staring you in the face that it comes in under a constitution formed in fraud and in iniquity, and against the will of the people, upon whom it is sought to be enforced. Do you suppose that the example will not be contagious? There is already too much cheating at elections.

We hear of it in Philadelphia. We have heard of ballot-box stuffing in California. We have heard of fraudulent returns in Minnesota. To cap the climax, here we have these fraudulent returns from Kansas, of which we not only have heard, but which have been proved to exist. Do you believe, if they are sanctioned, that they will not lead to other frauds in other parts of the Union? Will not bad men everywhere, who love power, resort to similar means to attain or to perpetuate it? Will not those holding the ballot-boxes and making the returns of election in other parts of the Union, follow the example set them at Delaware Crossing, Kickapoo, and Oxford, and sanctioned by Congress? I tell you that the purity of the ballot-box is necessary to the preservation of republican government; and when you cease to regard it, or protect it, you sap the very foundation upon which the Government rests.

Therefore, I regard it as an all-important question in its consequences, not only upon Kansas, for I will not undertake to say, nor do I know, the consequences which will result there. I think I do know the consequences which would result from a defeat of this measure. There would be peace. All that Congress has to do is to cease from legislation—do nothing. The people of Kansas will now manage their own affairs in peace if let alone. The government has been wrested from the hands of the usurpers who had control of it. The people themselves have taken possession of it. They will go on, and in due time form a constitution and be admitted into the Union. But, sir, if you pass this constitution, I will not undertake to be responsible for the consequences; nor can I foresee what they will be. No good can result from it—nothing but evil. The South itself will have gained nothing, for surely the South does not wish to perpetuate injustice and wrong. The South cannot wish to bring a State into the Union upon fraudulent returns. Then, if you are not satisfied that the returns are fraudulent, why not investigate them? If you are satisfied that they are, why not refuse to have anything to do with this constitution, and leave the people in their territorial condition?

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] told us the other day that this was an unimportant question; that we ought not to be engaged in it; that greater questions should receive our attention. He pointed very beautifully to the eastern world, where the spoils of accumulated ages were attracting the cupidity of the European Powers. The spoils were there ready, and the eagles, he told us, were prepared for the banquet, except one, the youngest mother of them all. She was at home watching her nest lest the young should not live together in peace. He thought this state of things could not long endure, but that she would burst her manacles; and I suppose he meant the inference to be drawn, that we should join with these European Powers who are about to despoil eastern nations of their wealth and their rights.

Sir, I disagree with the Senator from Virginia on that subject. I believe it better, far better, that we should be at home watching the nest, preserving the ballot-box and our free institutions in their purity, rather than joining with the crowned heads of Europe to seize upon the spoils of empire upon the eastern continent, and subject to our rule an inferior class of people. God forbid, sir, that republican America shall ever be united in any unholy alliance for the partition of another Poland, and the subjugation of its inhabitants. Better, far better, to remain at home and preserve our institutions as our fathers made them, and above all, preserve the elective franchise pure and uncontaminated. Then, sir, we shall set an example to other nations which they will not be slow to follow; and the time will come when republican institutions will prevail, not only throughout the American continent, but throughout the world; and every man of every clime will be permitted to sit down beneath his own vine and fig-tree, without any to molest or to make him afraid.

Mr. FOOT. It has been my purpose to submit some remarks to the Senate upon this question, at some time during the progress of the debate. I have been willing to defer my own personal convenience in the matter, to the convenience and wishes of other gentlemen. We have had a long session to-day. I think I may say we have had an exceedingly interesting session, an instructive session. We have reached a rather late hour this afternoon, and if it be agreeable to those members of the Senate now present, that the further consideration of this question be deferred until to-morrow morning, I will regard it as a personal favor; not, however, to be accorded to me to the prejudice of the public business.

Mr. CLARK. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FOOT. With the understanding that this subject will be taken up as the special order at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion for a moment, I wish to have taken up and considered now a resolution I offered some days since, to meet at eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. GREEN in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his motion?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move to take up the resolution to change the daily hour of meeting to eleven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator that he vary his resolution, so that instead of meeting at eleven o'clock, we shall hereafter have evening sessions.

Mr. HOUSTON. We cannot do that under the rules. I hope that the Senate will now act on the resolution I have offered, that the daily hour of meeting be eleven o'clock until otherwise ordered.

Mr. FOOT. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Texas that we can hardly entertain the resolution this afternoon. Certainly there can be no consideration of it for want of a quorum. The manifest want of a quorum is in the way of any action upon that resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. The absence of a quorum is not manifest unless the yeas and nays are called. It is a rule that a Senator is always presumed to be in his place.

Mr. WILSON. By agreeing to this resolution, and resolving to meet after to-morrow at eleven o'clock, we can have this question come up at half past eleven o'clock. There are quite a number of gentlemen who desire to address the Senate, and we must press the matter now, if we intend to act up to the understanding.

Mr. SEWARD. A great number of Senators are absent, and I think that there is unmistakably a minority now present. We have had no notice of such a resolution, and we have no quorum present.

Mr. WILSON. I understand, by common consent or conversation among members, that it is understood three or four gentlemen will speak to-morrow. If we meet to-morrow at the hour suggested in the resolution, we shall be able to take the subject up at half past eleven o'clock, and we thereby gain an hour. Those Senators who intend to speak to-morrow can be informed of the change in the hour of meeting. I think the matter can be settled by common consent.

Mr. SEWARD. I will not agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts make a proposition?

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Maine suggests to me that we can have an evening session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To commence after to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether evening sessions will be necessary or not. Perhaps they will not be necessary until after to-morrow. When we meet to-morrow, we shall be able to see whether we ought to have an evening session on to-morrow and the day after. If the Senator from New York objects, we cannot act on the matter. I think, therefore, we had better adjourn, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SEWARD. I object, simply because the Senator who, it is understood, will take the floor to-morrow morning, is not prepared to take it earlier, inasmuch as he is not in his place.

Mr. HOUSTON. He could be here by twelve o'clock, and then go on with his speech. By meeting at eleven o'clock we can dispose of all the morning business before twelve o'clock, and he can then proceed.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. Say twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Half past twelve is the motion.

Mr. CLARK. There may be petitions and other morning business which will occupy the first half hour.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to make a suggestion, if the Senator will allow me. With a view to make this subject the unfinished business, so that it can be taken up at twelve o'clock, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn. It will then come up as the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. A. HARROLD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I yesterday rose to what I regarded as a question of privilege. I do not design calling up that question now. I may do so at some future time; but I desire to say, that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in reference to the conduct of Commodore Paulding was not authorized to be published by that committee. I say this much now. I may bring the subject regularly before the House on some other day. I will say further, that I should have made that report yesterday, if the committee had been called on to make reports. The report, however, as I have stated, was not directed to be published by the committee, and a minority of the committee dissent from the views there expressed.

Mr. RITCHIE. I wish to say that I dissent from the views expressed in that report. I think

Commodore Paulding was justified in the course taken by him in arresting General Walker and bringing him to this country; and I shall endeavor to show it to the House when the proper occasion presents itself. That is all I have to say now.

MEMORIAL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] yesterday to lay on the table the memorial of the Territorial Assembly of Utah.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I made the motion yesterday to lay on the table this memorial. Upon consideration, however, in order that that document may go on the records of the House, I propose to withdraw my motion, and make another motion which will accomplish that object. I desire, therefore, to withdraw that motion.

Mr. MILLSON. I demanded the yeas and nays yesterday upon the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, because I thought the Chair had announced the vote in the negative upon the motion to lay on the table. I wanted that motion to prevail. I was utterly opposed to any reference of a document so insulting, so insolent, and so defiant. But, sir, if it is desired to have the memorial printed, and then laid on the table, I have no objection; and I therefore withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I now move that the memorial be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business next in order to be the bill (H. R. No. 313) reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; upon which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. QUITMAN. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, I would ask the attention of the House for a moment to a few suggestions which I desire to make. This bill seems to have been peculiarly unfortunate in its position. It has been obliged to give place for many others, and still drags its slow length along. I believe that gentlemen in this House, both those favorable to the bill and those opposed to it, desire to see it finally disposed of.

Now, I will not move to make it a special order, because the interposition of a single objection would prevent me from making the motion, and prevent the House from acting upon it. But I desire to appeal to the House to allow the debate upon this bill to go on, for it is in the power of the House, at the expiration of the morning hour, to refuse to take up other business. I would suggest that that course would facilitate the transaction of public business. My own opinion is, that we can bring the debate to a termination in the course of the day, and take the vote to-morrow morning. I hope, then, the House will decline to take up other business at the expiration of the morning hour.

EXCUSE FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I made a motion some days ago to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] was excused from serving on the Committee of Accounts. I am aware of the fact, if the motion be withdrawn it cannot be renewed by another member, in consequence of the time provided in the rules having expired; that it cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent. I therefore desire the House to understand precisely what I say. I am informed that the effect of the pendency of the motion is to prevent the committee from being filled, and to prevent them from acting. The accounts are postponed, and it is producing confusion. I had hoped that on Monday I should have been able to have called up the bill fixing the number and compensation of the employes of the House; but not having obtained the floor for the purpose, unless some gentleman desires the motion to remain pending, I now propose to withdraw it.

Mr. KEITT. What will be the effect of granting the permission asked for? Will it excuse the member?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the effect would be to excuse the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Then I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the motion be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have the floor when it is called up.

Mr. PENDLETON. I yielded only for a moment. I shall object to this being taken out of my time.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor when the motion is called up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If you proceed with the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] will it be in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether this bill can consume the morning hour, morning after morning, under the rule as amended at the convenience of this Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it can. The amendment to the rule is in the following language:

"That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees have been called in their turn."

A committee occupying two mornings in submitting reports could not occupy the third; but when the subject-matter is before the House, it must be disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would it not be a better practice, that when a committee has reported a measure occupying two morning hours the House should go on with the remaining committees and then come round to the question left undecided?

The SPEAKER. That might be so; but the Chair has to administer the rules as he finds them.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, when I obtained the floor last Thursday I had no intention of detaining the House at any length. I did not design to follow my colleague [Mr. STANTON] through the many surmises which he made as to the intended use of the Army in case it should be increased, nor to argue with him the constitutional and legal power of the President to use the Army in the way in which he asserted it was intended to use it. I designed merely to express my gratification at the notice which was given to us by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] that pending this discussion he would introduce a bill as a substitute for that proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which should provide for a permanent addition to the Army of the United States. I hope, sir, that the gentleman will mature his bill; that he will mature its details in such a way as to obviate, as far as possible, the objections of members of this House, and at the same time secure the greatest efficiency to the Government. I hope that he will avail himself, too, of this opportunity to carry into effect the suggestions of the Secretary of War for the amelioration of the condition of the Army; that he will facilitate promotion from the ranks; that he will regulate promotions by merit, not by seniority; and provide that, in the organization of this additional force, the appointments of one half of the officers shall be made from civil life. When he shall have done that, his bill will receive my cordial support.

I speak, Mr. Speaker, with unfeigned diffidence on the subject now before the House. My taste has not led me to have any experience in military affairs, and I know but little of the movements and organization of the Army, except that which the current history of the country affords; that which I have derived from an examination of the official documents upon our table—an examination, sir, which I found it necessary to make, in order that I might vote intelligently on the subject under discussion. I came to that examination with the strong impression that no augmentation of the military force was necessary, and that the suggestions, or rather the recommendation to that end, from the Executive Government, arose, not from an actual necessity, but from that inevitable tendency in our system, no matter by whom it may be administered, to aggrandize the General Government and to accumulate within its control constantly-increasing power. That examination has removed this impression; and I desire to state, as briefly as I can, to the House, the considerations which have led me to the conclusion that we ought to increase the Army of the United States, if we expect the Executive Government to perform faithfully, promptly, and efficiently, the duties confided to its charge by the Federal Constitution.

Let me ask you, sir, why is it that we have an army at all? For what purpose is it that we organize and equip and maintain it? I take it to be this: that it may defend the country from all those attacks which leave no time for preparation for defense; that it may protect our people in the West from the incursions of the Indians; that it may man our posts and keep up our fortifications, and be at all times a nucleus of military knowledge and discipline, around which may gather in times of danger the myriad hosts of citizen soldiers, who, at the first blast of the bugle, will rise from every mountain and valley, from every city and village, and from every farm and hamlet, to resist invasion and repel attack.

Sir, no gentleman upon this floor, I think, will say that I have overstated the purpose for which we should have an army. No gentleman, I think, will disagree with me in the opinion that, if the Army is not large enough to subserve these purposes, it is not large enough for any useful purpose whatever.

I have said that the first duty of the Army was to prevent attacks which would leave no time for preparation for defense. I have before me, sir, a military map of the United States, upon which the boundaries of our country are delineated, and I ask you for one moment to trace the external boundary of our magnificent domain. Commence, sir, at Maine, and follow it along the Atlantic coast, past Massachusetts and New York, by Virginia and the Carolinas, around the Cape of Florida, along the Gulf of Mexico, across the plains of Texas, across the desert wilds of New Mexico, until it dips into the waters of the Pacific. Follow it thence northward along the whole length of California, across Oregon, across Washington, until it intersects the line of the British possessions; and then, sir, your eye will weary as it follows it for miles and miles, over hill and mountain, through valley and plain, by lake and river, until it strikes the initial point in the Atlantic. And in that round you have more than eleven thousand miles of external boundary, of which one half is sea-coast, and liable to the incursion of any maritime Power, and the other half marks the boundary of two nations, with each of which, in the period of your existence, you have had long and bloody wars, and with each of which you have outstanding, difficult, and troublesome questions. Look across the country beyond the teeming bosom of the States, to your western frontier, and you will find that the march of civilization has received a check, and that a line of more than two thousand four hundred miles on both sides of the Rocky Mountains divides the habitations of your people from the abode of those savage tribes which roam the plains of the great central basin. That line extends from Canada to Mexico; and throughout this whole extent, from Minnesota, where Ink-pah-dutah holds his bloody revels, at Spirit Lake, to the banks of the Rio Grande, where the Camanches murder and pillage, is subject to incursions of the Indians.

Sir, between these two lines, and on each side of the Rocky Mountains, lies the great central tract of this continent—a tract of barren, sandy desert, inhospitable for man and beasts, the fit abode of the Digger Indian, whom its poverty has dwarfed, (if, indeed, he were ever a man,) to the being which runs upon all fours, and lives on roots and grass. That country extends a thousand miles to the west; and across its trackless plains extend the three great routes, which alone, within your control, unite your domains upon the Atlantic with those upon the Pacific; the pathways of that on-crowding emigration through whose influence alone you will be able to subdue the Indian and subjugate the soil to the plow and the scythe. Beyond this line lie your Pacific possessions—an empire of themselves—Oregon and Washington, and the young and vigorous California, that new empire whose golden treasures dwarf into insignificance when compared with the fertility of its soil and the magnificent returns of its commercial enterprise.

That country is all our own. Step by step we have acquired it. The thirteen colonies which skirted the Atlantic coast have extended their possessions westward, until now, from British America to Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, every acre of this country is covered by the flag of the Union, and every acre of it must be defended by the Army of the Union.

Sir, you have difficult questions pending with England and Spain. They may present now a peaceful surface, as they do; but you know, and I know that, underneath this apparently peaceful surface lie smoldering fires which may burst out into the flame of war. These are contingencies; but if you will look at the West you will see a sad reality. I have spoken of the great central portion of the continent. It extends one thousand miles, from east to west, and twelve hundred miles from north to south, and is the abode of two hundred and fifty thousand Indians. They hold that country by right of occupation, by the traditions of their tribes; and it is with emotions we can well understand that they claim that you are intruders, and the lives and property of your citizens forfeit to their vengeance. Sir, they are gathering for the war; they have attacked your people in Washington; they have invaded the Mesilla Valley; they are hovering upon Iowa and Minnesota; and they have, as my friend before me will tell you, [Mr. BRYAN,] carried desolation to the very heart of western Texas. They are as brave, cunning, and treacherous, as their forefathers. They are determined to resist, if they cannot prevent, that immigration which they feel is encircling them, to their own destruction. In their midst is Utah in rebellion. That Territory is inhabited by more than eighty thousand people, brave, hardy, resolute, accustomed to bear arms, well supplied with munitions of war, well supplied with necessities of life. They are led on by a cool and determined leader; one who is ambitious to be prince as well as prophet; one who holds in his hand all the powers of the government and the church; one who, as said by the gentleman over the way, wields at the same time the sword of State and the anathema of God. They and he block up your pathway to Oregon; they bid defiance to your Government; they mock at your authority; they murder your citizens; and they combine and discipline, and incite to deeds of devilish cruelty, the Indians by whom they are surrounded.

Sir, it is the imperative duty of the Government of the United States to protect its frontiers, to protect its emigrant routes, to vindicate its own dignity, and the power of its law. The only instrumentality by which you can do these things is the Army of the United States.

Now, sir, what is your Army to which you intrust such gigantic interests? By reference to the official documents laid upon our tables, you will find that on the 31st day of June last, the Army of the United States amounted to seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four men. That is to say, if every company had been full; if every man had been at his post; if every sick man had been well; if every weak man had been strong, officers and soldiers all told, the Army of the United States would have amounted to seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four men. How was it in reality? Upon that day the Army of the United States, officers and soldiers, those who were on duty, and those who were on leave, those who were able to perform duty and those who were not, amounted to fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-four souls—an Army less than that of any State of Europe; less than that of almost any State on these American continents; an Army less than General Washington sent to Pennsylvania, for the purpose of quelling the Whisky Insurrection; less than the body-guard of a European Emperor to keep watch and ward over his palace when he sleeps.

Now, sir, how is that army posted? The first military department embraces all the territory of the United States which lies east of the Mississippi river, except Florida. On the 1st day of July the army of the United States, charged with the duty of that department, amounted to 1,082 men, officers and soldiers included; and I see, by a foot-note appended to the document giving us that information, that the army, then embracing seventeen companies, has now been reduced by removal to twelve companies; leaving in that department not more than eight hundred men. In the department of Florida, on that same day, there were nine hundred and fifty-four men. It then embraced thirteen or fourteen companies; but since that time the army there has been reduced to less than four hundred men. The department of Texas embraces a territory which, by your law, is large enough to make five States. It is charged with the protection of the Mexican frontier, and embraces within its limits the most warlike and hostile tribes of Indians upon the continent. And yet the whole army that has been there for several years does not amount to more than two thousand men. In the department of New Mexico, which lies entirely surrounded by Indians—the Mexican Indians on the south, the Camanches on the east, and the Apaches on the north—and which we cannot reach in less than a six weeks' journey, we have eighteen hundred men. In the department of the Pacific, which extends from the Gulf of California to the British possessions, and where we could not send reinforcements in less than three months, the army that is to defend the honor of our flag and the interests of our citizens is less than twenty-five hundred men. While all that great central tract extending from the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains, from Texas to British America, including the whole Territory of Utah, is intrusted to the guardianship of about forty-six hundred men.

Let me, for a moment, recapitulate. To defend the whole frontier of the country from Maine to New Orleans; from New Orleans, along the Mexican frontier, to the Pacific coast; and thence to Puget Sound—more than ten thousand miles—you have an army of less than six thousand men; while, for the purpose of protecting that vast interior country, you have an army of less than seven thousand.

I had supposed that our Army was in a state of profound repose, and that the troops in the West would stagnate in their posts for want of exercise. It was a most egregious mistake. The territory of the United States lying west of the Mississippi river contains more than two million square miles. It is greater than France, Spain, Italy, Holland, England, and all the German States. It is subject to peculiar dangers, danger from the character of the climate, danger from the character of the country, danger from the paucity of provisions, from the scarcity of water, from the wide and barren region over which emigrants must travel. It is dotted with military and trading posts, intersected with emigrant routes and mail routes, subject to be overwhelmed by the ordinary pressure of these extraordinary dangers. And yet if you will concentrate within it the whole Army of the United States, leaving not a drummer boy east of the Mississippi river, you would not have a force there in the proportion of one man to every hundred and fifty square miles, a territory nearly twice as large as the District of Columbia ever was.

Sir, we are told by competent authority that the Army of the United States, of fifteen thousand men, performs more service than any army of a hundred thousand that the world has ever seen. The country that it protects is larger than all Europe together. Marches are made longer than all the marches of the armies of Napoleon. Look at the report of the Adjutant General; and you will see that, in the last year, three divisions of troops were to have crossed the continent; one from the Pacific to Fort Leavenworth, constructing a military road on their way; another from Fort Leavenworth back to the Pacific; and a third from Fort Laramie, by the South Pass, to California. Look at the general orders that accompany the report of the General-in-Chief, and you will see an account of a march of three hundred and fifty miles in seven days, in pursuit of Indians—marches at the rate of eighty miles a day; and that, too, while the men were three days without water, and lived on coffee and rice. Look at the report of the march of Colonel Sumner last summer, and you will find that, after the 18th of May, he marched eighteen hundred and fifty miles, and transferred his army, without the least repose to men or horses, to the army of Utah, to commence a six weeks' journey to Fort Scott.

Look at the report of the Quartermaster General, and you will see that last year you paid more than two million nine hundred thousand dollars for the transportation of troops, and that that sum will be infinitely increased for this year, and that you will not be able to diminish the cost the subsequent year.

Look, again, at the losses of the Army of the United States, and you will find that it lost last year six thousand men—two thousand nine hundred being from desertion, and the rest from deaths and discharges. Look at all these circumstances, and tell me whether you do not overtax the energy and courage of our Army, and whether you do justice to them or to yourselves, when you commit these gigantic interests to powers so inadequate? And if these things do not convince you, I point to the smoldering villages of the West; to the bleached bones of murdered pioneers; to the trails of emigrants, marked with white and red, the ashes and blood of Indian depredations: I point to your army, fifteen hundred strong, shut up in the mountains of Utah, cut off from succor and supplies, in the face of a legion of ten thousand armed men.

Now, why should not the Army be increased? I think the necessity is apparent.

One gentleman tells us that the increase would be too expensive. Now, an official document, which was used in the discussion of this subject in the other end of the Capitol, tells us that every regiment of infantry costs $308,000; and the expenses of five regiments of infantry would be $1,500,000.

Mr. CURTIS. That document is shown to be erroneous. The annual cost of the Army of the United States is about $19,000,000, which would make the average cost of each of the nineteen regiments just about $1,000,000; and that has been so for the last forty or fifty years.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am aware that the expenses of the military department of the United States have gone as high as the gentleman says. I am aware that we have nineteen regiments, and that the military expenses of the Government have been nearly nineteen million dollars. But I am yet to learn that there are not included in that sum many expenses which do not extend to every regiment of the Army. The expenses of fortifications, of the ordnance department, of the various departments of the military service of the Government are included in it, and these expenses would not be in any degree increased by the addition of men. If gentlemen will take up the official report, they will see that the expense of the Army is increased comparatively little in proportion to the increase of men, and that you may add one or three thousand men without enhancing in any considerable degree the cost of the Army. Now $1,500,000 is a large sum of money. This is no time to expend such a sum unnecessarily. This is no time for extravagance. But $1,500,000 is not more than we appropriate every year to the expenses of this legislative body. $1,500,000 is the sum that you have appropriated to build the dome of this Capitol; $1,500,000 is about the expense of the Japan expedition; $1,500,000 will not cover the cost of printing the three books to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] alluded the other day, and I say that although the expense may be great, if an increase in the Army is necessary, neither the practice nor precedents of the Government will justify us in refusing to incur it.

Another gentleman, my friend from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON], said he could not vote for an increase of the Army, or that he would object to an increase of the Army, because troops have been used as a posse comitatus in Kansas. Sir, I will have no quarrel with my friend about terms. I do not believe it is in the power of the President to use the regular Army as a posse comitatus. The right to use the Army begins where the power of the posse ceases. The power to use the troops of the United States is regulated by law, and the law gives the President power to use the troops in the execution of the laws of the United States in all those cases in which he might call upon the militia. He has the right to call upon the militia whenever combinations exist sufficiently formidable to obstruct the judicial process under the power of the marshal. My friend from Ohio makes no difficulty about the construction of that law. He has read it as a lawyer, and understands it. It is plain in giving the President power to use the regular troops in all those cases in which it is proper to call out the militia. But the gentleman says that law is unconstitutional; that he can find no warrant for it in the Constitution, either in that portion which makes the President Commander-in-Chief, or in that provision which says the President shall see that the laws shall be faithfully executed.

Sir, I do not find the power in either of these clauses, but I find in the Constitution power given to Congress to raise and support an army, and I take it for granted that the right to raise and support an army includes the power to dispose of it, and to use it for all proper and legitimate purposes for which an army may be used. But admitting that the power "to raise and support" implies the power to control the Army, the gentleman tells us that the power is limited by another clause in the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power to call out the militia for certain purposes; and that the expression of the power to call out the militia in those cases excludes the power to accomplish the same objects by any other means. Sir, that construction will not do. It is not a grammatical construction of the clause. That clause contains a limitation upon the right of Congress to call out the militia for any other purpose than those expressed there. It implies no limitation upon the power of Congress to accomplish the same object by other means.

The argument of the gentleman would prove too much. He says you cannot call upon the Army to execute the laws of the United States because the Constitution has conferred upon Congress the power to call out the militia for that purpose. I would ask my colleague if the same construction of the same clause would not prevent Congress from using the regular Army under any circumstances for repelling invasion. The Constitution says that Congress may call out the militia to suppress insurrection, to repel invasion, and to execute the laws. The gentleman says that because the Constitution confers the power upon Congress to call out the militia for those purposes, it cannot use the regular Army for the same purposes. Then, according to that construction, the Congress of the United States cannot repel invasion by our regular Army. I know the gentleman will not be led to that conclusion.

I say, then, that the President of the United States has power to use the Army in certain specified cases; and I am not prepared to say that such a case has not arisen in the Territory of Kansas. I know the President, in his discretion, thought it had arisen. I know the Governor whom he sent there thought it had arisen. I know the result of their use there has been good. Not one drop of blood has been shed. No man has been interfered with in the enjoyment of his civil rights; and for the first time in the history of that Territory, the two political parties have met at an election upon an issue joined, and have conducted it peacefully.

Another gentleman tells us that he objects to the use of an army because he is dissatisfied with the condition of affairs in Utah. Sir, I make no question with him upon that point. I have not read the voluminous papers which have been sent us on that subject; but I am prepared to say from the examination which I have been able to make, that, in my opinion, much of the difficulty in that Territory has arisen from the character and conduct of the officers who have been sent there; that, if other men, pursuing a different line of conduct, had been sent as Federal officers, the position of the Mormons toward the Government would have been different.

But that is not now the question. The President, in the exercise of his undoubted authority, has seen fit to remove certain officers from that Territory, and has appointed others in their places. He has, in the exercise of a like undoubted authority, erected Utah into a military department of the Government, and sent the troops there. The people, led on by their Governor and legislative body, have refused to these newly-appointed officers admittance to the Territory. They have refused admittance to the troops; they laugh when you talk of the allegiance due to the Government of the United States.

Sir, it is a case of flagrant rebellion; and the recommendation made to us by the President in his annual message was the suggestion of a humane, as well as a wise policy—the recommendation that while we should go there with the olive branch in one hand, imploring them to return to the allegiance which they have forfeited, conjuring them by every tie which binds man to man, to remain with us, loyal citizens of a common country, we should go there carrying the sword in the other hand with power sufficient, if they spurn our appeal, to crush out the rebellion even if it should be with the entire extermination of the rebels.

Sir, if there is one sentiment more deeply engraven upon the hearts of the American people than any other, it is this: that they will obey law, and will require obedience in others. The public sentiment of this country will never justify the American Legislature in withholding from the Executive a sufficient power to enable him to assert its dignity, and to execute the law.

We are told that a standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the people. I will not quarrel with that maxim. I know that its truth is sustained by history. I know that in ancient Rome the people and Government were the sport of the cohorts of the Prætorian camp; but before that time arrived the imperial purple had been stained with the blood of its victims, and liberty had disappeared forever from the seven-hilled city. I know that in modern times a usurper, in one night, by the power of his army, seated himself upon a throne which seems firm; but before that night the liberties of the people had been crushed out under forms of a free government, and the presidency was as great a despotism as the empire now is. But sir, was it ever heard that an army of twenty thousand men, scattered over three millions of square miles, coming from the people, returning to the people, supported by taxes raised from the people, and voted by their Representatives, was dangerous to the liberties of twenty-five millions of freemen? It is the suggestion of a weak imagination, and not the sober apprehension of a manly judgment.

The history of our Government gives us an instructive lesson on this subject. In the days of the elder Adams the Army of the United States amounted to four thousand one hundred men, and then you had scarcely a post west of the Alleghany Mountains. In 1815 the peace establishment of the United States amounted to ten thousand men, and yet at that time we had scarcely a military post as far west as the Mississippi. In 1839 the Army of the United States amounted to nearly thirteen thousand men, and at that time you had but two posts west of a line drawn north and south from Fort Leavenworth. Now, sir, in 1857, you have an Army of fifteen thousand seven hundred men, having acquired all that vast reach of territory west of this line, with the consequent duty devolving upon you from its possession to defend and take care of it; a territory which in process of time, as independent and sovereign States, is to add new beauty and glory to your political system.

These are the considerations which have induced me to think that the Army of the United States should be increased—considerations which have led me to the conclusion that now is the time when we should construct the skeleton, of which Mr. Calhoun spoke, upon such a scale as that, in any emergency, we can fill it with nerves and sinews, and flesh and blood, to the full proportion of a large and vigorous life. Other considerations have had their effect—considerations, sir, which connect themselves with the pending questions with Great Britain and the relations of Central America to this Government; considerations which connect themselves with the questions pending with Spain and the relations of Cuba to this Government. I believe, sir, that the time has come when Cuba will fall, as has been said, like a ripe apple from its parent stem. I believe now is the time to break the ground and sow the seed in Central America, which shall mature to the perfection of American fruit.

To drop the metaphor: I believe that it is the duty of this Government, demanded alike by its own dignity and by the just expectation of the American people, to demand peremptorily from Spain, indemnity for the past and security for the future; and if she fails to give them, to consider whether, as a means of self-defense, as a measure of prudence, we ought not to take from her that island by which she has been enabled to command our commerce, to outrage our citizens, to confiscate their property, and to insult our national flag. I believe that the time has come when we should abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because of its constant infraction by Great Britain, and notify that Government and all others concerned, that henceforward the interests of this country and the interests of this continent require that American influence, American interests, and American policy should predominate throughout the land covered by the treaty, and that we will assert that policy even if need be with the persuasive tones of the cannon. I believe, sir, that Mexico has failed, unaided, to attain the high destiny to which she is by nature entitled; and that the time will come when she will approach you for aid, and ask the assistance of a friendly hand and a strong arm, and I think they ought to be given to her.

Sir, these things cannot be done in a corner. They will be done openly. They will be done in daylight. They will be done under the disapproving eye, perhaps the frowning batteries of interested nations. But, sir, I believe they will be done, and I think they ought to be done; and I, for one, am in favor of putting ourselves in such position as that, at the right time and in the right way, they shall be done.

When I turn from all these facts and considerations which have led me to the conclusion that the Army should be increased, I find that the President of the United States, who certainly is not ambitious for military glory; I find the General Commanding, who is certainly a prudent man on subjects of this kind; and I find the Secretary of War, who is especially charged by law with the discharge of these particular duties—I find them all uniting in the recommendation that the Army should be increased. And their recommendations meet the entire approval of my judgment, and shall have my cordial and hearty support.

I have not said one word derogatory to the volunteers. I do not design to do so. I could not do it with justice to myself or the truth of history. I believe, as was told us by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] that a body of volunteers ingrafted upon a body of the regular Army makes the best troops the world has ever seen; that they impart to it vigor, and receive from it discipline; that they have the courage, the patience, the obedience, and the discipline which belong to the soldier, and that they have, at the same time, the independence and dignity of the citizen, and a just appreciation of the rights and liberties of the people. I would say no word depreciatory of them; I know that around their history cluster the choicest glories of the Republic; that their exploits are written upon the brightest pages of its annals. It is only because I find myself constrained by the convictions of my judgment to support a permanent increase of the Army, that I shall be compelled to vote for the bill presented by my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] rather than for the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. QUITMAN.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to address the committee to-day; for when I yielded to my young friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] I thought he and I were on the same side on this question. If this measure fails, and the country understands the reasons, I shall be satisfied. The opposition which thus far has displayed itself presents two fronts, each of which is led, singularly enough, by a member from the Committee on Military Affairs. On the one hand, the Administration, represented by the member from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] is not pleased because the bill does not provide for an increase of the standing Army; on the other, a class of statesmen, represented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] is not pleased because the military force is increased at all. In medio tutissimū. The committee thought the force should be yielded to the call of the Executive, to meet the exigencies of public affairs known to exist, but that the standing Army should not be increased. Hence the bill which is under discussion, which provides the five regiments called for by the War Department, but selects them from the citizen soldiery rather than from regularly enlisted recruits.

The speech of the gentleman from Virginia was an elegant amplification of the same views which had been presented by the report of the Secretary of War. He treated the subject in two points of view: first, without regard to the condition of affairs in Utah; second, embracing the condition of affairs in Utah as a proper element in the decision of the question. I propose briefly to follow his argument, and to make, in military phrase, a close reconnaissance of his positions, for I am impressed with the idea they have no great strength.

The gentleman commenced by stating the actual strength of the Army at about thirteen thousand men. How strong the Army is depends upon where it is; for, under the laws, the company may be composed of only fifty-two privates, or it may contain seventy-four members. The President has the legal right to expand the companies whenever the Army is posted in certain localities; otherwise he has no right. "The Army, as posted," says the Adjutant General, "is seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four; its actual strength on the 1st of last July was fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-four." The gentleman from Virginia says a deduction should be made from this statement of the Adjutant General by taking off engineers and ordnance men. Well, that would reduce it some three hundred and fifty; indeed, if he were to subtract the whole general field and staff, as well as engineers and ordnance department, it would not reduce the number to fifteen thousand men. He thinks the non-commissioned officers should also be deducted; but since these serve in the line, they are to be counted, and are the best and most effective of all the troops in the Army; so that the gentleman failed at the beginning to tell us the strength of the Army. His first position is this: the Army is overworked. The extended field of its labors so demands the presence of force at a variety of points at the same time, that it is quite impossible for the existing Army to meet the public requirements. Its efficiency is impaired by the subdivisions to which it is subjected, and its energies are exhausted by the constant toils, fatigues, and sufferings to which it is exposed. Hence it should be increased.

To demonstrate this statement the testimony of Generals Scott and Jesup is appealed to; incidents of service are recounted from the Army reports; we are told of hard marches; rapid and long pursuits of the enemy; extreme suffering from thirst and hunger; exposures to the inclemencies of weather; and of brilliant achievements under all these difficulties. Yes, exclaims the member from Virginia, these men have been compelled to sleep upon the snow; to eat their horses which had given out under the toils of service; and yet they have stormed three Indian encampments in a single day! The arsenal from which he derives all this artillery of declamation is the special order of General Scott, to be found accompanying the report of the Secretary of War. In that order the commanding General introduces twenty-five cases of actual conflicts between detachments from the corps of the Army and the Indians of this country. He says these "are all which have occurred since the beginning of last year, to which my attention has been directed." It is fair to infer that the list comprises all that have in fact occurred; for, as these have been selected to grace the annals and to illustrate the exploits of a gallant Army through eighteen months of service, surely none of equal moment or brilliancy have escaped the vigilant eye of the brave old veteran who kindly indorses them to the applause and gratitude of the country.

Marked for a place in the Pantheon by the chief of the Army, and reproduced for special admiration here, under the fervid and glowing declamation of the gentleman from Virginia, you will be surprised, sir, when I declare to you that the impression I received from a perusal of the statement of these "gallant exploits" was far different from his. When I saw the number of men on detachment, the time employed in service, the rank in command, the ultimate achievement, and the manner of the history, I could but exclaim, If this is all, if this is the best, then indeed does "Peace tinkle on the shepherd's bell, and sing among our reapers."

If a whole year of service brings forth no more of toil, of hardship, of conflict and conquest, than this hunting down of "a few lone Indians," we are a happy people, and our Army is as innocent as an army can well be. No wonder that the President has determined to use the Army in the civic employment of a posse comitatus to keep the peace at popular elections!

It is not my purpose to depreciate the gallantry of our Army officers or men, or to detract from a proper estimate of their public services. The

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 74.

Army has no friend to its true interests warmer than I am, for no one knows better than I do the sterling worth, the accomplished education, the disciplined intellect, the chivalric sense of true honor, that pervades the officers of that Army. It was well enough to mention these cases in an order from headquarters, if there was nothing else to mention, for I know such honorable remark is a spur to young ambition, and has a most beneficial effect upon the esprit de corps of the Army; but, sir, it is out of the question to draw on such an order, addressed to the Army by General Scott, as material to be gravely introduced into debate here, to influence the nation's judgment to an increase of the Army! Overworked! Why, Mr. Speaker, of these twenty-five cases of "conflicts," it appears thirteen occurred during last year in the military department of Texas. The actors in each case, except two, were detachments from the second cavalry; the whole number of days in the aggregate of service, specified in these reports, was sixty days in the eighteen months; and the whole number of men employed in all of these exploits, when aggregated, was less than two hundred and fifty. Usually, the "gallant exploit" was that of a young lieutenant with his platoon, or of a sergeant with his squad, and most frequently the expedition or the pursuit did not last through more than four or five days. Now, sir, as I said before, it was kind and considerate in the Commanding General to stimulate the ambition and rouse the pride of these young officers, by letting their names and gallant service be attested by his signature to their comrades and the country; but what do you think must be his emotions when he beholds the uses to which they have been put in this debate? Let me illustrate the whole by that which the gentleman from Virginia selected as the climax for one of his rounded periods—that in which he says three Indian encampments were surprised in a single day! If members will look to the record, they will see that this expedition consisted of about sixty men under a captain, and that, from its commencement to its close, it lasted all of one day; that it went forth from Fort Clark on a September morning in 1856, when everybody knows it was more pleasant to be out of doors than in the house, and it returned before the dews of evening tarnished the luster of their sabres. In the course of the day, this expedition surprised three parties of Indians; but whether they were together or separated is not stated; of what force they were, respectively or in the aggregate, is not stated; how many actions took place is not stated; but it is stated that they were all surprised "between the Rio Grande and the Pecos, near their junction," and the returns from the field foot up thus:

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.
Americans	none	none	none
Indians	4	4

And I suppose all the rest were missing, for the report concludes with this account of capture and confiscation: "Their animals and other property were taken or destroyed;" from which, I take it, the inference is clear that there was no regular capitulation, but that the captain made "a clean sweep;" and that so many of the Indian armies as escaped went, "nor stood upon the order of their going," but went like the Roman legions who passed the Caudine forks, stripped of arms, baggage, property, and clothes. It is from the history of this adventure that my friend from Virginia rises, all enthused with military ardor, to exclaim, in tones of gushing eloquence, "Let the Army be increased!"

The Army overworked! Where? How? When? What foe has it encountered worthy the name of an enemy, except in the service performed by Lieutenant Colonel Buchanan in Oregon, and possibly in a gallant repulse given to the Indians in Washington by Steptoe and Keyes? None; I dare say, none, sir; for I do not suppose Colonel Sumner regards his pursuit of the Cheyennes, in Kansas, as worthy of mention among his deeds of real war.

But Quartermaster General Jesup is cited as having said that our Army travels over more ground than any hundred thousand men in any other service, and therefore the Army should be increased, argues the gentleman from Virginia.

The Quartermaster General forms his judgment upon the length and magnitude of his own transportation accounts, I suppose; and I quite agree with him, that they would seem to represent the movement of a hundred thousand men rather than of the little corps of our skeleton Army. I do not believe such amounts for "transportation" can be exhibited in any other service in the world; but I confess my inability to perceive how the public burden, in this particular, is to be alleviated by adding to the number of men to demand additional transportation! I do not mean to impugn the integrity of the accounts, for I have no doubt they are all right upon the requisitions they have filled; their magnitude is occasioned by the long voyages by sea and river, and by the long distances overland by which supplies have to be furnished to outposts. But the Quartermaster General would concur in my opinion, I imagine, that the only remedy for this misfortune would be such an increase of the Army that divisions of it might be permanently assigned to military departments, to remain therein for a term of years; so that, when detachments might be required to move from one point to another of the department, the movement might be made by marches instead of by steam and rail over great distances, and so that the soldiers might earn their subsistence, in great part, by working fields and raising stock around their permanent military homes. Then his transportation accounts would diminish; but the Paymaster General's pay accounts would increase; and we should probably find, in the result, that transportation was only exchanged into pay for additional personnel to the Army corps. I doubt whether such an exchange would be either a sound or wise economy.

So much for the first position of the gentleman from Virginia. He assumed another, thus: the policy of Government having concentrated the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, as the emigrant routes to the Pacific traverse the region through which the Indians now roam, the safety of the emigrants demands a military police of the paths of emigration, which the existing Army cannot furnish, but to which the public faith is implicitly pledged by the obligation every Government owes to afford protection to its people when legitimately employed. When the policy was adopted of removing the Indians to the west of the Mississippi, the chief motive was to concentrate them so as to avoid the requisition of an additional force to guard against their hostilities. This was General Jackson's avowed policy; and it seems to me singular that this very concentration of the Indians should afford the especial reason upon which now to base the application for an increase of the military force. If the argument succeeds, the vote will be a pointed condemnation of Jackson's administration, and a rectification, at the public expense, of the errors to which he subjected the country. Is that a point the Democratic party now proposes, under the guidance of the gentleman from Virginia, to attain?

But, independently of this view of the question, let me ask what amount of force and what kind of force will meet the demand for a military police of the paths of emigration from our Atlantic to our Pacific shores? The routes are numerous—the points of destination for the emigrant as various nearly as the differing latitudes of neighborhoods in our western and southern country. We are told by the gentleman that, as a police force, we now have scarcely one man to every two miles of these emigrant routes. What additional security would five regiments yield, if disposed in detachments along the same lines? But when you commence the system, in response to the alleged governmental obligation, where will you stop? Directly the tide of emigration will flow towards Arizona, and possibly to Dacotah. Will you also respond to these routes? Will you apply this military police to the route from Bexar to El Paso; from Arkansas to Santa Fe; from El Paso to San Francisco; from Dacotah to Washington Territory? Where will the emigrant go, that he may not with equal justice demand your protection, provided he has to travel over wilderness and wastes? The men who settled the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi had no such protection thrown around their adventures in search of new lands. They had no army to watch their footsteps, or to ward off the ambuscade of their savage and relentless foes. They went forth from the Atlantic settlements with their wives and children, depending upon their own sagacity, prudence, and courage, for success, and there established that great domain beyond the mountains which is now the heart and power of this Republic. Who is it that calls for help to go to Oregon and California? What native American has ever complained or filed his petition here for a safe-guard of regular soldiers to escort him across the continent? I am disposed to afford whatever security Government can render to the American citizen, wherever he may be; but the idea is not welcome to me that the people demand a cordon of soldiers to police a wilderness through thousands of miles that they may be protected who leave their homes in one part of the country to seek their fortunes in another. It involves the idea of an enormous and exhaustive expense; for these troops must be supplied; they must be sheltered from the snows of winter and the rains of summer; their clothing and provisions must be transported to them; and, after all, they will be of little or no service in preventing small bands of roving and starving Indians from crossing the route of the emigrant when no soldiers are near. You now have a number of posts in Texas, but the Indian goes wherever he feels an inclination to pass, turns your forts by a detour of a mile or so from the direct path and swoops down upon the traveler, or upon the homestead almost with impunity. It cannot be otherwise, where the frontier is so extensive. This bill provides the best kind of force for Texas that the condition of her settlements will allow. It is a provision with which she is content, I understand. It will relieve her of the regulars, and afford a considerable disposable force of these to meet the other wants of Government, so far as regulars can supply a force.

I have thus reviewed the gentleman's speech, so far as it excluded the condition of affairs in Utah from consideration in the discussion. I trust I have proved to the House that the evidence has not been even persuasive that the regular Army has been overworked, or that any practical good could be accomplished by increasing it, under the notion of affording a military police to the emigrant routes across the continent.

There was another view taken by the gentleman, in which he includes the condition of things in Utah as a proper element in the decision of this bill, and of the general proposition to increase the military force of the country. I propose, as briefly as the nature of the case will permit, to follow his lead through this part of his argument also. It will not be necessary, for this purpose, that I should discuss the question whether the Territory of Utah is in a state of rebellion. For the sake of the argument, we will assume that Utah is in a state of rebellion, and that an addition to the military force of the country is demanded for the service in Utah. This brings forward the questions, what amount of additional force is required? shall it consist of regulars, or of the citizen volunteers?

As to the amount of force, the Committee on Military Affairs has adopted the basis presented by the Executive. He demands five regiments; the bill provides for five. But the gentleman from Virginia says we do not furnish such troops as the President desires; that he asks for one sort and we offer him another. Sir, the bill leaves to the President the option to have the troops mounted or afoot, as he may prefer, armed as riflemen or musketry, as dragoons or light cavalry, voligeurs or lancers, just as he may wish. Congress could not be more liberal. That is not the point of complaint with the Administration. It demands regulars—regulars, sir; and the bill provides for citizen volunteers. The gentleman from Virginia acknowledges this to be the difficulty, and, as I think most unfortunately for the Administration, has undertaken to prove, by reference to the reports from the War Office, that the citizen soldiery of this country is less efficient, more expensive, less worthy of confidence in every military point of view than troops enlisted in the regular Army. I deny this proposition in the name of the American people. It is not sustained by the history of our country; it is not sustained by the facts in any war in which the United States have ever engaged. Unroll the roster of the military names of America, and for every one that is conspicuous for gallantry, service, or skill belonging to the regular Army, I will furnish two from those who sprang from the body of the people to meet the crisis, were actors at the head of your forces in the same campaigns, and stand the peers in every respect of the regulars who now seek to institute this invidious comparison. It was the young Virginia volunteer who saved the wrecks of the British Army from utter destruction drawn upon it by the folly and ignorance of Braddock, its regular commander. It was that same officer who conducted our war of independence to its great result. The Tennessean, drawn from civic pursuits, illustrated the valor of American volunteers upon the plains of Chalmette. The leading spirit of the North—Jacob Brown—in the same war, came from the pursuits of civil life to recover ground lost by the regular general theretofore in charge of your armies. It was Old Tippecanoe who left his territorial government to fight in the second war of independence, and to win the battle of the Thames.

I will not multiply instances. They crowd upon the memory to illustrate the truth of my general proposition; but I will stand upon the results of the Mexican war to vindicate the claim of the citizen volunteer to the confidence of his country against the aspersions which have been cast upon his efficiency. It may be possible that the list of the dead and wounded of the regulars, including the charge on Molino del Rey, exhibits a greater number of regulars than of volunteers in the valley of Mexico; but does it exhibit that superiority in proportion to the numbers of each engaged in the actions? If it did, I ask whether it proves the point of the gentleman from Virginia, to wit: that the regular walks to death where the volunteer soldier fears to tread; or that the volunteer is not selected in the service for dangerous and destructive efforts, when the regulars are at hand? I say no such deduction can be fairly drawn from the facts, and that the history of the Mexican war does not exhibit a single instance in which the regular soldiery of our Army recovered ground that the volunteer had abandoned, or led into the deadly and imminent breach which the volunteer shrank from. I defy the War Office and those who have got up this assault upon the volunteers, to bring forward a single case which can truthfully illustrate such a statement. On the contrary, I think the history of that war affords the proudest vindication of the title of the citizen soldiery to the confidence of their country.

How many volunteer corps were in the valley of Mexico? Only some two or three regiments, I am informed by the gentleman who so gallantly commanded them. And, sir, nearly all the regulars you had in Mexico were there. Is it just to the volunteers, when you come to consider the numbers of the one and of the other, that you shall assume upon such data the superiority of the regular over the volunteer?

Mr. QUITMAN. There were three regiments of volunteers in the valley of Mexico: the second Pennsylvania, the New York, and the Carolina regiments. The first Pennsylvania was at Puebla, and there met the assault of Santa Anna.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The right plan is to take equal numbers of both. It is said that the volunteers are more sickly than the regulars, and the letter of the Surgeon General is paraded to prove that fact. In addition to the reason given by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I will make a special reply to the reference of the Surgeon General to the Kentucky cavalry, which regiment was in that service under my own command. That corps was mustered into service on the 9th of June, 1846, at Louisville. It was not moved until after the 4th of July; and young men who had left comfortable homes were exposed at once for nearly a month to the inclemencies of the weather without sufficient tenting to cover them from the storms of the season. The corps was embarked on steamers and transported to Memphis, and there encamped for two weeks between the Arkansas swamps and the Mississippi. It would have been strange had not the fevers of the climate begun their ravages upon the troops. Finally, without orders, except as I gathered them from the general directions of the Department of War, I put the regiment in motion on the 15th of July, and, in the depth of the southern summer, marched from Memphis through Arkansas and Texas, on towards San Antonio; when I was commanded in September, at a time when the regiment was in first rate health and order, to move to Port Lavacca, in Texas, and there to halt, and to await orders from General Taylor, who was at Monterey, in Mexico. At such a season, after months of daily activity in the saddle, to be brought to a state of repose, and so exposed on the shore of the Gulf of Mexico for another month to the autumnal sun, and in the lowlands of that region, it would have been very wonderful if that regiment had not become sickly. In that situation, it is true, sir, we had, some days, two hundred and fifty on the sick list, and the southern fever passed with such fierceness through the command that again, on my own responsibility, I determined to move the regiment on towards Mexico; and I found, as I expected to find, that with action came renewed health to my troops. So soon as the corps left the Gulf, the condition of the men improved; and when we reached the Army at Monterey, the health of the regiment was reestablished; though the bitter experiment to which the corps had been subjected had cost the lives of many gallant sons of Kentucky.

The facts in my case are the history of nearly every case in the service. Every one who was in that service will remember that the volunteer regiments were not pressed to the front, until the regulars were ordered to Vera Cruz; and therefore, sir, a comparison of health instituted between them might be expected to exhibit the natural tendency to disease, by persons sheltered in a high and healthy region, and of others exposed in a low and sickly region. I do not now complain of the positions assigned to the troops in that service; but I mention these facts merely to prove how utterly absurd it is to attempt to arrive at a general conclusion by comparison, when the data from which the calculations are made present such widely differing circumstances. Why should not the volunteer soldier be as healthy as the regular, under the same circumstances? Do they not feed upon the same rations? Are they not entitled to the same camp equipage? Does the healthy man, whose habits have been regular, and whose life has been devoted to the pursuit of honest industry, present a constitution more predisposed to disease than such men as enlist at your recruiting stations for service in the regular Army? It is said the regulars undergo a physical examination before they are accepted; so do the volunteers, when they are mustered into service; and such an examination can be ordered in the one case as well as in the other.

As to expense, you may say that the men waste their rations, and do not know how to take care of them; but I tell you if they do they get no more on that account. It is useless then to talk about expense. I saw some of my men at the commencement of the campaign, throw away their rations. I well recollect when I crossed at Fulton upon the Red river, I had to make a march of twenty days through a wilderness. Putting all my rations upon the wagons, I plunged into the wilderness. One day one of the captains came to me, saying it was impossible for his men to eat such bread as was given to them. Said I, "Call a board of survey and have it condemned. You are entitled to have your rations commuted for money." "What shall I do here," said he, "with money? We want bread." "Open another barrel," I replied. He opened another barrel, and it was no better. "Well, we will pay you in money." "We want no money," he replied, "we must eat this, or die."

The idea that it is more expensive to feed, clothe, and give shelter to a volunteer will not be sustained by any gentleman who has seen service. I have not gone into an examination of this matter, but if you will take fifty regulars and fifty volunteers, and serve out to each company the same amount of rations, give them exactly the same place to sleep in, it is inconceivable to me how one company will cost more than the other; and I respectfully submit to my friend [Mr. FAULKNER] that his arithmetic is quite as bad as his logic.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that Congress should have witnessed this onslaught by the Administration upon the volunteer soldiery of the country. I have never met a volunteer officer, in or out of the service, who has exhibited a disposition to snatch a leaf from the laurels of the regular Army. But this is not the first time I have seen the attempt to condemn the efficiency of the volunteers by those who are the constant advocates of an increase of the standing Army. The effort will fail this time—fail signally; for in both wings of this Capitol are men who have served both as regular and as volunteer officers, whose united verdict will resist the attempted distinction. They would be untrue to the interest of the Army itself were they to fail to frown upon this unwise mode of influencing the opinion of Congress to vote an increase of the regular Army.

The gentleman made an extraordinary declaration, to which I desire to recur. He characterized the citizen volunteer as the representative only of popular passions; and preferred the regular because he is "the child of obedience"—"the mere machine that can be wielded by superior intelligence." I listened to this sentiment with great surprise; for, though I had been prepared, by events which have heretofore transpired, to expect the action of the absolutist from the Executive, I did not presume that, in the call for more troops, it would be urged as an argument that the Administration objected to the intelligence of the citizen soldier, and wanted a machine only that could be wielded to any purpose by command of the superior. When Napoleon assumed the empire, he proposed to do so "to preserve the liberty of France." I do not remember the occasion when heretofore the Executive has boldly advanced, as a reason for choosing a particular kind of troops, that he wanted a soldiery without sensibility, which he could handle as a mere machine by the exertion of executive will. There was a time, within my recollection, when Democracy rejoiced in the sentiment that the citizen soldier is the main strength of the Republic, and a well-regulated militia the chief bulwark of popular liberty. Shade of Patrick Henry! what voice is this from your Virginia that now rejects the citizen soldier because he is the child of passion, and adopts the regular because he is the mere machine in the hands of power? Shade of Jefferson! look upon this example and sample of Democracy, and tell us if these sentiments are the same you inculcated, and by yielding to which the American people will preserve long the liberty which they have inherited!

In my judgment, given as that of a man somewhat conversant with military affairs, the force provided for by this bill will be as efficient in service as any ever mustered by the United States. That judgment rests first upon the general capacity of the American citizen to make himself a soldier when his duty calls to arms. He brings health, physical vigor, courage, activity, capacity for endurance, intelligence, patriotism, and a stake of personal reputation in the community to which he expects to return when the service shall have terminated; that, taken altogether, afford the best possible guarantees for his military efficiency. He combines, in his own person, all these qualities of the true soldier to as high a degree, certainly, as the kind of men who usually enlist in the regular service. The length of the term for which this force will be mustered into service—eighteen months, if necessary to the public interest—avoids the objections of gentlemen to short enlistments upon economical considerations, and insures the Government, in the material point, that the service of the volunteer will be continued long after he has, by drill and discipline, become accustomed to the duties of the soldier. The length of time fixed by the bill for the engagement of the volunteer, was determined by the nature of the expected service. It insures his service to the Government for a second campaign if the public interest shall demand it, yet avoids the hardships and expense of wintering the force the second year in the snows of Utah. Suppose the regiments were ready for muster by the 1st of April. Their engagements would extend to the 1st of October, 1859, which would give the country the benefit of their service, not only for the campaign of this year, but of next year; for, after October, in that climate, the troops must go into winter quarters. The volunteer, discharged in Utah in the fall of 1859, could return to the States before the winter usually sets in with severity in this climate. The Military Committee considered all these points in establishing the length of time for their service.

The regiments will probably be called from the western States, because these are nearest to the locality at which the troops will be wanted, and afford the men whose modes of life and customs promise those qualities which fit them peculiarly for the expected service. The Mormons of Utah are inured, by fifteen years of experience in border life, to all the hardships of the frontier, and they have become experts in the use of the rifle and in the management of the horse. Doubtless they can muster a formidable force, which, being perfectly familiar with the general topography of their country, and accustomed alone to scout the mountain ranges of that frontier, would be most efficient light troops in a war upon our transportation, which, at that distance from the general depots for the Army, becomes a most important part of our actual strength. These volunteers will be as familiar as the Mormons with the rifle, as expert in horsemanship, and as ready of device in all the strategy of border men. They will be as capable of action individually, or in small parties, as quick on the trigger, and as ready to pull it. In these respects, which are all important, should the tactical operations of a campaign determine a resort to a guerrilla war, the volunteer force would be far superior to the regular Army, in which it is apprehended there is a deficiency in these very qualities, that, in the event referred to, would be so essential to success. If, on the contrary, the campaign should demand the evolutions of troops in masses, the volunteer corps would possess all the activity, valor, intelligence, and endurance which constitute the best elements on which to make the successful application of military skill.

There is another consideration which should control the decision of the choice between volunteers and regulars. The volunteer regiments are ready to-day; they can be moved on the instant; the regulars would have to be recruited, and afterwards drilled and disciplined in the schools of the soldier, the company, and battalion, before they would be ready to be in the field. This necessity would cost the United States the loss of this year's campaign, and, possibly, protract a struggle in Utah until it became chronic and most difficult of adjustment. The gentleman from Virginia supposed that the additional recruits authorized in case of an increase of the Army, would be maintained at the posts for the purpose of learning the duties of the soldier, and thus the veteran regiments, already disciplined, might be moved immediately to the theater of these disturbances. But this supposition fails to have practical point for the reason that the veterans cannot leave the posts until the raw recruits shall have been enlisted; and this process must consume so much time as to leave none for a campaign this year. You cannot enlist the men for five regiments in a week, or a month, or two months. The statistics of the recruiting service prove that the business goes slowly on, and that it is unequal to the task of providing men to fill up the ranks of the Army to its present authorized strength. How can it be expected, then, that the increase of the Army by five additional regiments, will so stimulate the recruiting service as to enable the veterans to leave the posts at once for Utah! If they can leave at once because the law shall authorize recruits to be raised to supply their places at the posts, then they can leave also without such a provision, for their places at the posts cannot probably be supplied by the process of enlistment in the lapse of a whole season. For the last year the returns show that the aggregate of enlistments for the regular Army was only five thousand five hundred and nine, while the casualties in the Army, by deaths, discharges, and desertions, were five thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine; so that the process of enlistment failed, by more than two hundred, to supply the present wants of the service. How can it be expected, then, continuing at the same rate, ever to fill up the new regiments in time for immediate service, or so as to release the old regiments from their present duties at the existing posts? Pass this bill, and the ranger regiment for Texas will immediately place at the disposal of Government more than two thousand regulars, who are returned as posted in that military department so late as July, 1857. If these are wanted for immediate service in Utah, is it not astonishing that the gentleman from Virginia should oppose a bill which provides Texas with the troops which, according to her experience with both, is preferable to regulars for frontier service, and which, at the same time, gives the Administration the immediate use of two thousand men?

But there is another reason: We do not know that there is going to be a Mormon war; but I think prudential considerations suggest to us the propriety of reinforcing the troops now in that quarter, and of doing so rapidly. But suppose that when they reach Utah the Mormons be all found in their fields engaged in the daily avocations of common labor. We cannot commence, under such a state of things, to exterminate them on account of the past; and you perceive that we can get rid of the volunteers by marching them home, that the President may discharge them. Not so with the regulars. If we want troops at all, we want them now. And that consideration determines in part this bill. More than five regiments of volunteers are now ready for the service. They are ready to march to-morrow, so that you may be assured of the benefit of a summer's campaign with them.

We propose to give you men who will be the equals of their foes, in the knowledge of horsemanship, in the use of the rifle, and in individuality of character. You cannot act with masses of troops on a scattered and dispersed population like the Mormons. They will harass your trains, they will cut off your straggling parties, and they will sweep down on small bodies of men wherever they are found unprotected. It will be a war of transportation. It will be a war in which your unprotected messenger or express who carries orders from point to point will be garroted in the mountains; and you will never know the hand that struck him. Your men from Ireland and your men from Germany may be gallant. I do not pretend to detract from their reputation for gallantry. They have not, however, been accustomed in their former life to this thing. It does a western man's eye good to see one of them get into a saddle. It would be absurd to send such men to act against the Mormons, who furnished a battalion in the California war, and who, I understand, have got the very finest cavalry.

If, therefore, you want to act instantly, take the volunteers. If you want troops for the occasion, take the volunteers. If you want troops who will execute evolutions in masses, begin with men who will have all the aptitude to learn, who have all the energy to execute, who have all the interest to perform effective service. I can speak for my own State. They have there raised a regiment by order of the Legislature, to be tendered to the President for this very service. I personally know that there is not a field officer in that regiment who has not seen a year's service in Mexico, and there is scarcely a captain in it who has not also served his year in Mexico. And these officers would be as ready to-morrow to march into the field, and as ready to drill the troops as any officer of the regular service. If you wait here to recruit, what will be the season by the time you get recruits?

By the by, this Mormon war is going to exhibit some very strange peculiarities. I heard to-day from one who is well informed that it was likely the Mormons would bring a larger transportation train from the States to Utah than General Jessup's train; that they have one thousand three hundred wagons now prepared in Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, I find myself a good deal exhausted, and I will bring my remarks to a close. But I want first to notice the power claimed by the President, and the censure that was administered to this House the other day, by the gentleman from Virginia, for its apathy. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to protract this debate unnecessarily;

but, as at present advised, I shall cast my vote against the bill offered by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, as also against the substitute proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER.] And I desire, inasmuch as my vote shall be so recorded, to state, as briefly as I may, some of the reasons that will control that vote.

It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of War has said enough to determine me, at least, in my opposition to the bill reported by the majority of the committee. The President of the United States is, under the Constitution, charged to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. It is his business to advise this House, by his message, and through the proper Departments, not only of the measures which are needful to the execution of the laws; but also of the measures the cheapest and most efficient to that end. The American people have a right to demand not only an efficient administration, but an economical execution of the laws. I take it that no gentleman on this side of the Chamber, or on that side of the Chamber, will be swift in objecting to that proposition.

Well, sir, the President of the United States, in the proper discharge of his duties through the channel of the War Department, has advised us officially, and has officially advised the country, against the very bill which the majority of the Military Committee are now pressing upon the consideration of the House. The bill reported by the majority of the committee, as the House has been advised, is a bill temporarily to increase the Army of the United States, by a volunteer force of some four thousand men. That project is condemned by the Administration, notwithstanding the ingenious attempt of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] the other day, to throw the weight of the Administration in favor of this bill. I undertake to say that the bill is condemned, emphatically condemned, by the Administration.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to correct the gentleman. I am not at all certain that the Administration is in favor of this bill, and I did not intend to assert that it was. What I said was that the Administration asked us to authorize the raising of four or five additional regiments, and did not say of what character of troops. But I did not say the Administration favored the volunteers. On the contrary, I am afraid they are not right on this question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no disposition to misstate the argument of my friend from Iowa; but, sir, I attended very carefully to what he said at the time when he addressed the House, and I am certain that I am not mistaken in saying that he sought to press the Administration into his service in the advocacy of this bill; because his reported speech, corrected by himself, states that the President is entirely silent as to the description of troops that he wants! The gentleman from Iowa argues, from this alleged silence of the President, that the Administration is not opposed to the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from Iowa was right, so far as the President's message was concerned, in saying the President was silent as to the character of the troops. But the President has further advised us on the subject through the Secretary of War; and by looking to the official report of that officer you will find that he expressly condemns the project which is recommended in the bill of the majority now before the House. The Secretary says:

"It will not be denied that an army properly organized and of sufficient strength, constitutes at once the cheapest and most efficient means by which the indispensable services it is designed to perform can be secured by the Government."

That is the general proposition; and it would seem, from what follows, that the Secretary of War designed that the attention of Congress should be especially called to it, in anticipation that this bill, or some kindred measure, would be presented to Congress. The Secretary further says:

"It will be seen from a paper carefully prepared in the office of the Adjutant General, that no increase of forces is so efficient or near so cheap as the augmentation of our regular Army."

Now, sir, if the Secretary of War be right in this, it is very apparent that the majority of the committee was wrong, altogether wrong, in recommending this bill to the House at all.

Efficiency and cheapness in any increase of the Army, whether that increase be permanent or temporary, ought not to be lost sight of. The opinion of the Secretary of War condemns the proposed measure of the majority because it lacks efficiency and economy.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman has the opinion of the Secretary of War as to his belief against that of the committee. That is true. But I would not give the opinion of the committee for that of three such Secretaries of War upon the subject of efficiency and economy, because he has not had as much experience as three or four of the members of the committee. I say this with due respect to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Iowa is mistaken if he supposes that I undertake to hold the scales of justice here in any judgment to be passed upon the comparative ability—the comparative military ability, if you please—of the Secretary of War and the honorable gentlemen who compose the Military Committee of this House. I am perfectly willing that that grave question shall be settled elsewhere and by a different tribunal. I am willing to leave that important question for settlement to the calm, dispassionate judgment of the future historian. At all events, sir, I respectfully decline the office of arbiter or judge upon the relative merits of the military achievements and experience of the honorable three to whom the gentleman refers, and the military achievements and experience of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. I believe the gentleman was in command of a volunteer force in the Mexican war?

Mr. CURTIS assented.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will he be kind enough to tell me of any civilian in this country who has happened to have command of a volunteer force in any war, who did not, through his self-pride, prefer the force he commanded, and contend that it was superior to a regular force? We have volunteer gentlemen on the Military Committee, and they, forsooth, are better judges of what the military defense of the country requires than the officers of the regular Army!

Mr. CURTIS. I will say that I do not think so. I do not think the volunteers claim to be better soldiers, but they always claim to be equal to the regular forces.

Mr. QUITMAN. The modesty of the gentleman from Iowa has prevented him from stating that he was educated at West Point as an officer of the regular Army; and I believe that before the close of the war he commanded a regiment of regulars.

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Mr. QUITMAN. At any rate, he was regularly educated to the military profession.

Mr. SAVAGE. I think it quite unfortunate that this comparison should be made. It devolves upon me now, however, to answer also as to my position. In the late war with Mexico I belonged to the regular branch of the service. I had the honor first of being a major in the fourteenth division, and of being at Molino del Rey a lieutenant colonel in the eleventh division. Prior to that time, many years ago, I had been a very high private; and that is the sum of my experience.

Mr. CLEMENS. I understand this to be a question between the military department of this Government and certain gentlemen of the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire to know from the gentleman from Mississippi, how many other members of the Military Committee who have reported against the plan recommended by the Department for the increase of the Army, happened to be educated at West Point? I would like to know whether the whole of them, with the exception perhaps of the gentlemen from Iowa, were not in command of volunteers in the last war, and whether whatever military reputation they have has not been derived from that war, and that war alone?

Mr. QUITMAN. If I am permitted, I will answer the gentleman. I will say that I believe that two members of the committee were educated at West Point for the profession of a soldier, and that four have commanded regulars. As the gentleman appears to be unacquainted with my poor military history—

Mr. CLEMENS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am familiar with it, and the country is familiar with the great deeds it sets forth.

Mr. QUITMAN. I, of course, as a major general, belonged to the regular service of the United States. I trust that I have never shown any hostility to that service. I do not regard this as a controversy between gentlemen, but as a controversy as to the great powers of this Government. I felt it to be my duty, as a member of Congress, to advocate what I believe the country wants—a temporary increase of its military force. The high duty is devolved upon Congress of raising, organizing, and equipping armies. For doing this, the responsibility rests with us; and we are not to be judged by the opinion of the Secretary of War, or the President, or anybody else, in the discharge of that duty.

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi. Every member, in his official action on this question, as upon all other questions, should be governed by what, in his judgment, is needful and right and just in the premises, irrespective of any opinion of the Secretary of War or any executive officer. But, sir, when I made the remark which I did, it unexpectedly called from my friend from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] a comparison of the military qualifications of the Secretary of War and the honorable gentlemen of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. It was furthest from my purpose to make any suggestion to the gentlemen that they ought to be controlled in the discharge of their official duty here by the mere dictum of the Secretary of War. I wished to have this conflict of opinion understood. I thought I spoke plainly enough. By the Constitution of the United States, the executive department of this Government is especially charged with the execution of the laws of the United States. In time of peace, the Army of the United States is kept organized chiefly, if not exclusively, to enable the President to discharge that duty. If, therefore, any increase of the Army of the United States, either temporarily or permanently, be needful in this time of profound peace, (for it is a time of profound peace between the United States Government and all foreign nations,) it is for the President, above all others, to know it, and to bring that fact before Congress; and also to suggest and recommend such necessary increase, as well as the kind of force required. I say that the increase of the Army is an Administration measure. If an increase had not been recommended by the President, does anybody suppose that this House would, upon its own motion, have proceeded to increase the Army of the United States? I think not. The remarks which I have submitted upon the kind of forces recommended would not have been indulged in by me at all, if one of the members of the committee had not attempted, as I understood him, to press the weight of the Administration into the support of this bill. In answer to that attempt I thought it perfectly legitimate to present to the House the fact that this bill stands condemned by the war officer of the Government.

I do not know whether this ought to have weight with other gentlemen. In my view of the subject, I allow it to have weight with me. I shall vote for no increase of the Army, as at present advised. I will hold the Administration responsible for any increase that may be made. Unless the Administration needs an increase of the Army, it ought not to have it; and unless it asks it, it ought not to get it. The Administration has taken particular pains to condemn this bill. It has said in express terms, through its war officers, that the increase of the regular Army is the most efficient and least expensive to the country. I state this that it may have its due weight with the House and the country.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? It seems to me that we differ as to our duty as members of Congress. We have before us the application of the Legislature of the State of Texas, and that is reported on in a part of this bill. We have, also, advices from General Twiggs that the Indians are committing depredations on the frontier. This was brought directly before us from the Legislature of Texas. I ask the gentleman whether he would refuse to act upon it, although he might believe some additional force was required for the defense of Texas, or wait to act upon it until he received a recommendation from the Administration?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion. He will observe that in my remarks, I used the words "as at present advised." The case of Texas had entirely escaped my mind at the moment. The truth is, that in the remarks I have been making, I was directing my attention especially to that section of the bill which provides four additional regiments of volunteers temporarily to be employed, not in Texas, but in Utah and the northwestern frontier. I had not in my mind the application of the State of Texas. I am ready to respond to the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi. On the petition of the State of Texas, setting forth that additional force was necessary for the protection of life and property in that State, and being satisfied that such force was necessary, I trust I would be as ready as the gentleman from Mississippi to vote that additional force. I shall come to that part of my argument presently, which covers the application of Texas, and that section of the bill which provides for volunteers for Texas.

Allow me to remark, in passing, that the language of the Secretary of War, which I have quoted in condemnation of the provisions of this bill for raising four additional regiments, applies with equal force to the first section, which provides for raising one regiment of volunteers for Texas. My chief objection to this bill does not originate in the report of the Secretary of War by any means, and applies alike to the bill reported by the majority and the substitute proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER.] That objection is, that I am not advised of any condition of things in Texas, in Utah, or anywhere else within the limits of the United States, which renders it necessary that there should be any increase of the Army, either temporarily or permanently, either by means of volunteer regiments or by means of regulars. Until that necessity is made apparent, I shall vote for no increase of the Army.

It is well understood and conceded on all sides of the House, that the Army of the United States numbers some fifteen thousand efficient men, and liable to be increased, I believe, by addition of recruits, eighteen thousand, under the existing laws. How is this force employed at present? In the eastern department, I believe, there are only about eight hundred of them; in Florida there is only a small number—not to exceed a thousand. Where is the residue—where the remaining thirteen thousand efficient men? In the departments of the Northwest and of the Pacific. What condition of things exists in that section of the country, which requires there the immediate presence just now of this force of thirteen thousand men? Can anybody answer? Three thousand of those efficient soldiers of the Army of the United States are within the limits of the Territory of Kansas, or in its immediate vicinity. Does anybody know that there is any necessity at all for the continuance of that force in that Territory? Two thousand troops have been thrown forward toward the Territory of Utah, in the direction of Salt Lake City, under command of Colonel Johnston, for the purpose of enforcing the law in that Territory; and the four additional regiments provided for in this bill were recommended by the President, solely upon the ground that there is threatened insurrection in Utah, and this force is necessary to suppress it. For that purpose alone does the President ask for this increase. The majority of the committee, of course, speak for themselves, and they say that this additional force is wanted for some other purposes. They want it not only for Utah, but to defend the emigrant trains, and the northwestern frontier. I deal with this matter, however, not as a measure which particularly belongs to the majority of the Military Committee of this House, but as an Administration measure. When it is proposed to increase the Army on the recommendation of the Executive, I want to know the necessity for it; and to the President it belongs to show to the House and the country that necessity. That showing is the more needful when the committee report no facts in support of their bill. How does the President show this necessity? What does he say about it? In his annual message, he uses this language when speaking of the insurrection in Utah:

"Governor Young has, by proclamation, declared his determination to maintain his power by force, and has already committed acts of hostility against the United States. Unless he should retrace his steps, the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion."

What those acts of hostility are, the President has not been careful to tell us. The President further says:

"A great part of all this may be idle boasting; but yet no wise Government will lightly estimate the efforts which may be inspired by such frenzied fanaticism as exists among the Mormons in Utah. This is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories; and humanity itself requires that we should put it down in such a manner that it shall be the last. To trifle with it would be to encourage it and to render it formidable."

There is no rebellion in Utah, according to that passage of the message first cited. The President, however, says, in the last passage cited, "this is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories." I do not intend to impeach the veracity of the President at large; but, sir, when he is the sole witness upon the stand to satisfy the House of the necessity of this increase of the Army, I will apply to him strictly the rule of the law of evidence, that when he is false in one material matter in issue, he is to be treated as false in all; and I shall so hold, whether his falsity arises from corrupt motives, or from a simple want of the necessary information to enable him to tell the truth. The President says further, in relation to this increase of the Army to suppress the alleged insurrection in Utah:

"We ought to go there with such an imposing force as to convince these deluded people that resistance would be vain, and thus spare the effusion of blood. We can in this manner best convince them that we are their friends, not their enemies. In order to accomplish this object it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments; and this I earnestly recommend to Congress."

For what object? To subdue these Mormons that threaten rebellion. I have already read from the message the words of the President that, "unless he (Young) should retrace his steps, the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion." These words clearly import that something remains yet to be done before rebellion shall take place; that Young must pursue his course, must advance, or there will be no rebellion in Utah. "Unless he retrace his steps the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion."

Now, he says, in order to "put down this rebellion," in order to enforce the law, it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments; and this he earnestly recommends to Congress. It would have been very satisfactory to me, Mr. Speaker, as I doubt not it would have been to every gentleman on this floor, now that we are required to vote on this bill, if the President had advised us whether or not the people of Utah, as a people, have done any act that would justify us in committing against them, as the President proposes to do, an act of war?

Disguise it as you may, the proposition underlying this whole project—this recommendation of the President, this bill of the majority—is a proposition to wage war upon the people within the valley of Salt Lake. Now, I am just as ready as any other gentleman on this floor, when the proper occasion arises, to vote the necessary supplies of men and money to suppress rebellion in Utah, or anywhere else within the limits of the United States; but I must demand, on my oath and my conscience, before I vote any such supplies, the evidence of their necessity. And I but echo the voice of the civilized world, when I say that no nation should wage war, either foreign or domestic, but upon absolute, stern, inevitable necessity. It is the teaching of one of the greatest of all jurists, "that war is one of the highest trials of right." Sir, a rius must be involved before this highest trial can be justly invoked. What right is involved here? The right, I suppose, of killing indiscriminately the men, women, and children, of Salt Lake City. I have no other information than that which appears in the message. It strikes me that the chief ground of all this quarrel, the chief ground of this attempt to be made with your Army and four additional regiments to subdue the people of Utah, is their having established in their midst the institution of polygamy—an institution abhorrent to the whole civilized world, a shame and burning disgrace to the people of the United States. I am willing—and, I trust, as desirous as any one can be—that this institution of polygamy in our midst shall be abolished. Every good citizen of the United States must feel a sense of shame that such an institution has been permitted—nay, fostered—under the protection and sanction, if you please, of the Government of the United States.

But, I would ask, was not this Brigham Young appointed Governor of that Territory and superintendent of Indian affairs by the late Democratic President, (Pierce,) when Young was the chief and head, as he still is, of the institution of polygamy? Young is no more a polygamist to-day than he was the day he received his commission. The only real ground of complaint that appears against him, so far as I know, is that he refuses, for the time being, to surrender the power thus voluntarily conferred upon him by the Government. The reason of this refusal, as made known here by their petition, is that your Army now invading their Territory threatens their destruction. I do not know that, even if they have violated, as I admit they have, the laws of morality and decency in establishing such an institution, that puts them entirely outside of the pale of humanity, or subjects their women or children, who have had, perhaps, as little hand in the matter as the President of the United States himself, to massacre.

I do not see any necessity for it. There is an easy way for suppressing polygamy in the Territory of Utah. That is for the Government of the United States, through Congress, to resume and exercise its rightful authority over that Territory. I need not be told here that it would be unconstitutional to legislate against polygamy in Utah. Why would it be unconstitutional? Because the Constitution is entirely silent on that subject? You may make all needful rules and regulations for the government of that Territory. You propose now to make one alleged needful rule and regulation for its government, and that is, to organize four additional regiments for the purpose of holding it under military rule. The Constitution of the United States is, I admit, silent as to the crime of polygamy; but it is equally silent as to the crime of murder, or the crime of robbery, and yet you have spread upon your statute-books laws prohibiting the crime of murder anywhere within the Territories of the United States, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and punishing it with death; and you have also United States laws prohibiting the crime of robbery within the Territories or exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and punishing it by fine and imprisonment. It is equally constitutional to enact that polygamy, committed anywhere within the Territories or exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be held a crime, and that, on due conviction thereof, the party committing it shall be punished with appropriate penalties. I believe there is not a State within the Union in which polygamy is not made a crime by statute, and punished as such.

Why should not this offense be at once prohibited by law within the Territory of Utah before we make it the pretext for exterminating that people by the sword? I think it does not become the American Congress to imitate the pernicious example of Caligula in punishing as offenses against the law, acts done before the law was passed, or before the subject had the opportunity of knowing what the law was.

I will say further touching this controversy with Utah, that the people of that Territory were literally told by the law of 1854—told by the Democratic press from Maine to California—told by the official communications of the Democratic Chief Magistrate of the United States, that they, in common with the people of every United States Territory, were perfectly free to establish their domestic institutions in their own way, and whatever domestic institutions they chose, even that of polygamy. They were further told, sir, that they would be protected in their domestic institutions whatever they might be, by the Army and Navy, if need be, of the United States. That was the real position assumed heretofore in regard to this question. In this loathsome institution of polygamy you may see one of the legitimate results of that demagogue cry of "squatter sovereignty" or the right of the first fifty or five hundred adventurers in any Territory of the United States to set up any domestic institutions not expressly in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Young has literally acted upon your suggestions, and now you propose to destroy him and all his people for doing precisely what you said he might do.

I would, then, in this emergency, as the case now stands, say this: that so far as that great offense has anything to do in this matter, let us reach it by statute; at least let us start in the right direction, by prohibiting it in the future. Let us do that, and then let us go a step further. Let us first try in the language of the law of nations—that law which ought to govern our municipal regulations, and apply to the domestic wars as well as to national wars—let us try all peaceful means. To suppress polygamy we are asked to resort to the sword. Have their people otherwise offended? We have before us the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, in which they say they are ready to receive any civil officers that may be appointed by the Government of the United States, recognizing the authority of the Government of the United States, and praying that the Government of the United States will not subject them to the ravage and destruction attendant upon an invading army. Why not try the experiment of first sending out civil officers to Utah before you send your Army? Send your Governor and send your chief justice, without any military parade, into the Territory, and see if the people there will not peaceably receive them and recognize their authority. If they do, then these four additional regiments are unnecessary.

But suppose they are unwilling to listen to the voice of reason, or, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] the other day well said, they have become blind to their own interest, and willing to provoke an extermination by the sword; suppose that to be the actual condition of things, of which I protest I am not advised, nor is any gentleman in this House so advised: still I aver there is already a sufficient force of the Army of the United States in Kansas, which is not needed there, to supply the required four regiments; and which, in conjunction with the force now under Colonel Johnston in Utah, would be sufficient to exterminate all the Mormons in the Utah valley.

Mr. Speaker, if I were alone in this opinion, although it would suffice for myself, I would not impose it upon any man with a view to affect his vote upon this bill. But, sir, the sufficiency of this Kansas force is not my opinion alone. The late Secretary of War, now a distinguished Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] a man as distinguished in the field as in the Cabinet, has recently spoken to the country upon this question. I think that gentleman fully competent to judge upon this point. He has recently made this distinct announcement: "that the force under the command of Colonel Johnston was, in his judgment, sufficient to put down all resistance in that Territory if they could reach Salt Lake City." He says further: "if Colonel Johnston has the transportation which will enable him to move, he will subdue resistance with the force he has." Colonel Johnston's force is now two thousand men. An additional force of two thousand or twenty-five hundred men would enable him to move. That is the opinion of the late Secretary of War. The President only asks for four additional regiments, or about three thousand men. There is that force of three thousand men, or more, in Kansas and its vicinity. The President may supply the four regiments from that force now wrongfully kept in Kansas. This is clear. Where, then, I beg leave to ask, is the necessity for these additional four regiments of seven hundred and forty men each? There is no necessity for it, unless you deem it necessary to keep the four regiments of the regular Army in Kansas perpetually, to enslave, in the future as in the past, her free citizens.

The argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Curtis] proceeded upon the hypothesis that the President of the United States is already armed with sufficient authority, under existing statutes of the United States, to employ the Army of the United States in the suppression of insurrection or resistance to the laws in Utah. The argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Quitman] proceeded upon the same hypothesis. I think those gentlemen were right in their assumption, and that my colleague [Mr. Stanton] was wrong in suggesting that the law which gave the President that power was unconstitutional or inoperative. I believe the statute of 1807 is valid and in full force, authorized by the Constitution of the United States, and in accordance with the plain letter of that instrument. The Constitution authorizes Congress to raise an army, and to provide all necessary rules and regulations for its government, and to provide for the common defense. That is a plain and express grant of power to Congress. Where words are plain, there is an end to all construction. The act of 1807, which authorizes the President to employ the Army to suppress obstruction or resistance to the laws of a Territory, is valid. He may, therefore, draw from Kansas three thousand men, if needed to reinforce Colonel Johnston, and enable him to move and subdue all resistance in Utah. These three thousand men are now subject to that service, and useless where they are; I might say they are offensive where they are, but by reason of no fault of theirs.

Let Governor Cumming, then, take care, at the proper time, to make requisition on the President for the troops, and that is all that is wanting to give the President full authority to act during the vacation. This bill, of course, is not intended to go into operation until after the close of the session. There is, therefore, nothing in the present condition of things in Utah, nor in the present regular force of the Army, to create a necessity for the proposed increase of either volunteers or regulars. At all events, Mr. Speaker, with the distinguished ex-Secretary of War, [Mr. Davis,] I say of the deluded people of Utah, "I want not their blood shed by the Government of the United States." Sir, I do not intend that the blood of that people, or any other people, shall be upon my hands, or upon the Army of my country, by any act or vote of mine, until the necessity for it is not only apparent, but absolutely unavoidable. Let the Government of the United States act affirmatively. The Government should not occupy a mere negative position in this matter. Let us first try peaceable means for the settlement of this difficulty. Let us try negotiation. Let us try the organization of a civil government. Let us try to bring that people back to their allegiance, not by force of arms, but by civil, peaceful, quiet, and just means. When every peaceful measure has been faithfully tried, and has failed, then, and not till then, let us try the dread arbitrament of the sword.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the proclamation of Brigham Young and the resolutions of the Legislature of Utah to say distinctly that no officer shall be permitted to exercise power in that Territory, unless an officer of their own choosing.

Mr. BINGHAM. I must say to the gentleman from Iowa that I understand the very converse of that. I have not had the opportunity to read the petition of the Legislature of Utah, sent here and presented yesterday. I do not know that the gentleman has. I heard that petition read from the Clerk's desk. I understand that it asks that the Government of the United States shall appoint good and true men over them—not men who will abuse and libel and slander them. Be that as it may, so far as the proclamation of Brigham Young is concerned, I do not know how the gentleman knows anything officially concerning it beyond what the President knows and states; that is, that Young says he shall maintain his power in Utah by force. It is not that he will maintain his power wrongfully against the United States by force, but merely that he will maintain his power by force; of course, against any power wrongfully brought against him or his people!

Mr. SAVAGE. Here are the concluding words of the proclamation of Brigham Young, to which I would direct the gentleman's attention:

"Therefore, I, Brigham Young, Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Territory of Utah, in the name of the people of the United States in the Territory of Utah, forbid,

"First. All armed forces of every description from coming into this Territory under any pretense whatever.
